Former U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton lays out the troubling case of changing American intelligence judgments toward North Korea on the opposite page. His point about the need for an intrusive inspection and verification regime is especially important. Under the six-party agreement announced on February 13, North Korea has 60 days to account for all of its nuclear programs. If it doesn't, or if Kim attempts to renegotiate the terms at the last minute, we'd like to think the U.S. would show at least as much fortitude as the United Nations, and tell Kim to take a hike.

Key Lawmakers Complain Of Weak Intelligence (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139663

American intelligence agencies are not providing adequate information for Congress to make policy decisions on key foreign-policy areas including Iran and North Korea, according to the top House Republican on the issue.

"We still don't have the intelligence community overall to give us, as policy-makers, the information that we need to make good decisions in North Korea, Iran and other places," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, the ranking Republican on the House Select Committee on Intelligence.

When told by "Fox News Sunday" host Chris Wallace that he was making a "pretty striking indictment" of the intelligence community, Mr. Hoekstra said, "Well, it is."

Mr. Hoekstra blamed the bureaucratic leadership in the intelligence community for what he said are delays in implementing necessary reforms after September 11 and intelligence failures in Iraq.

"We've had problems in standing this up and developing more bureaucracy, and it's a concern about the leadership in the intelligence community, not the folks who are working this 24/7," he said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat and her party's second-ranking member on the intelligence panel, acknowledged the difficulty of obtaining workable intelligence from Iran and North Korea, but praised the administration for diplomatic progress with both regimes.

"I am very pleased to see the shift in the administration," she said during her own appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "When Secretary [of State Condoleezza] Rice came before the Senate Appropriations Committee and talked about this regional summit in which the United States would take part and the G-8 nations, I think that's exactly the way to go, to bring the light of day and the preponderance of nations into this effort."

Meanwhile, several leading Democrats said they are building support for a bill that would overturn the original Iraq war resolution. Still, they remain short of the 60 votes necessary to block a Republican filibuster.

"If we can focus on this purpose -- keeping American troops out of the middle of a civil war with the understanding that there needs to be a limited mission that remains after that -- I believe we can get almost all the Democratic votes, plus we can pick up some Republican votes," said Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation."

"We want to change it, to have a much more narrow focus," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, during an appearance on ABC's "This Week." "We have a very broad consensus. We're hoping to get close to unanimity, like we did on the surge resolution, that requires the president to change that mission."

However, one leading U.S. commander said the surge was showing progress and could be completed within a year.

"We're starting to see some progress, but it's very slow," Maj. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. military commander in Iraq, said in an interview with CNN's "Late Edition."

"I think that will take some time. I don't want to put an exact time on it but a minimum of six to nine months."

Sen. Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, told ABC that the various resolutions to force a withdrawal of U.S. forces or the troop "surge" are just represent "Congress trying to micromanage the situation."

"When the going gets tough, they're trying to figure out how to get out. And they can't get their act together on how to defund the troops, so they're having all these different approaches. ... I mean, they can't get it together."

North Korea Climbdown (WSJ)

By John R. Bolton

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Washington's most important person -- the Anonymous Senior Official ("ASO") -- was busy last week, briefing reporters on North Korea's uranium enrichment program.

The North's pursuit of nuclear weapons through uranium enrichment, an alternative to reprocessing plutonium from spent fuel at the Yongbyon reactor, constituted both a material breach of the 1994 Agreed Framework and an enormous challenge to the hope that it could ever be negotiated out of pursuing nuclear weapons. Based, however, on one public comment and much work by Mr./Ms. ASO, the media last week set about deconstructing a critical strategic concern underlying Bush administration Korea policy. According to their breathless reporting, yet another threat to America was disappearing, revealed as simply more intelligence hype from an administration that apparently did little else in its first term.

The reports raise three separate issues. First, what exactly is the intelligence judgment about North Korea's enrichment activities, and how valid was it in 2002? Second, what are the implications for the administration's ongoing negotiations with North Korea? And third, is Mr./Ms. ASO speaking for the Bush administration, or for those elements in the permanent bureaucracy that have consistently opposed key elements of the Bush foreign policy, at least as conducted until recently?

On the first question, concerning North Korea's enrichment activities, there is actually less here than meets the eye. The only attributable public comment is from Joseph DeTrani, mission manager for North Korea for the Director of National Intelligence, who said that he now had a "mid-confidence level" about North Korea's program, down from "high confidence." Mr. DeTrani's testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee recounted how, in October 2002, the U.S. confronted Pyongyang "with information they were acquiring material sufficient for a production-scale capability of enriching uranium," and how North Korea "admitted to having such a program." Mr. DeTrani continued, "we've never walked away from that issue." Indeed, in 2002, intelligence community officials told me that new evidence erased existing, long-standing disagreements within the community about what the North was up to since the mid-1990s, producing a remarkable consensus that has not, to my knowledge, broken down since.

DOJ_NMG_0139664

Neither in Mr. DeTrani's testimony, nor in any of Mr./Ms. ASO's backgrounding, is there any reversal on actual facts, only an apparent shift in the "confidence level." My understanding is that the decrease in confidence stems from the absence of significant new or contemporary information about North Korea's activities. This lack of new information may be attributable to a loss of sensitive sources and methods, or it may be attributable to the effectiveness of President Bush's Proliferation Security Initiative, or its creative financial sanctions, in drying up North Korea's procurement activity. But there has been no suggestion that the intelligence from 2002 and earlier has been contradicted or discredited. Mr. DeTrani's testimony is expressly to the contrary. Indeed, on Saturday he reiterated this precise point in a second public statement.

Moreover, as Donald Rumsfeld likes to say, "the absence of evidence is not evidence of absence." If we lack new intelligence, analysts should say so explicitly, and policy makers can draw appropriate conclusions, one of which might well be that the North is simply better at concealing its clandestine nuclear activities, not that those activities don't exist. What analysts should not do is to cast doubt on earlier intelligence, or change confidence levels, if there are no other reasons to do so. In any event, there is nothing here to allow anyone to conclude that the 2002 intelligence conclusions were flawed or hyped.

This raises the second issue. Mr./Ms. ASO's backgrounding is really about the ongoing six-party talks, and less about what happened in 2002. In any arms-control negotiation, the need for verification is directly correlated to the propensity of the other side to lie, cheat and conceal its undesirable activities. In the present case, the greater the likelihood that North Korea will make commitments it has absolutely no intention of following, the more intrusive and pervasive should be the verification mechanism we insist on. Determining in this or any other case how invasive the verification process must be obviously depends in large part on the historical record.

North Korea's aggressive mendacity puts it near the top of the list, perhaps tied with Iran for the lead, of countries that need the most transparent, most intrusive, most pervasive verification systems. For America to agree to anything less would be to make our national security, and that of close friends and allies like Japan, dependent on North Korea's word -- never a safe bet. And yet, it is precisely this extensive verification system that the North cannot accept, because the transparency we must require would threaten the very rock of domestic oppression on which the North Korean regime rests. North Korea's negotiators understand this contradiction. So do ours.

The only way around this problem is to conclude it doesn't exist, or is so minimal it can be "fixed" in negotiations. That's why Mr./Ms. ASO was busy, laying the foundation to argue that further deals with North Korea do not require much, if any, verification beyond what little the International Atomic Energy Agency can provide. If we continue this approach, what is already a bad deal will become a dangerous deal, whether we make it with North Korea directly or in the six-party talks. (As Nick Eberstadt has put it, a bad agreement with six parties is no better than a bad agreement with two parties.)

And that brings us to the third issue: Where exactly is the administration headed? Mr./Ms. ASO's identity is by definition unknown, but the view is spreading that this backgrounding is more than the bureaucracy's ruminations. I have my own unnamed senior officials who tell me it's not so, but the question remains. President Bush himself must speak, and sooner rather than later, to tell us what he thinks of the intelligence, and the direction of his own policy. Recent polls show his approval rating near 30%, with support among Republicans falling precipitously. If the president's conservative base erodes further, where will his support come from? From liberal editorialists enthusing about his newfound foreign policy "pragmatism"? Based on my personal experience, the president will not have both.

Mr. Bolton is a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. and the author of "Surrender Is Not an Option: Defending America at the U.N. and Abroad," forthcoming this fall from Simon & Schuster.

Saudi-Iran Meeting Yields Little Substance (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, March 4 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran and King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia concluded an extraordinary meeting early Sunday promising a thaw in relations between the two regional powers. But they stopped short of agreeing on any concrete plans to tackle the escalating sectarian and political crises throughout the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0139665

Mr. Ahmadinejad said that the two countries had agreed to try to curb tensions between Shiite and Sunni Muslims and that they had discussed in detail issues related to the Palestinians and Iraq.

The leaders are believed to have focused on finding ways to end the political standoff in Lebanon between Hezbollah, backed by Iran, and the government of Fouad Siniora, which is supported by the United States.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's first official visit to Saudi Arabia, which began Saturday, was marked by decidedly public shows of warmth and friendship between the leaders, as the men embraced, at times held hands in an Arab sign of close friendship, and smiled to cameras. The event marked the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts between senior Saudi and Iranian officials to ease the political standoff in Lebanon, cool sectarian violence in Iraq and possibly avert a looming Iranian confrontation with the United States.

Analysts were divided on Sunday over the ultimate impact of the summit meeting, held at the behest of the Iranian president.

To some, it promised to break the spiraling cycle of brinkmanship in the region, focusing both countries on constructive solutions to their differences.

Skeptics, however, said the absence of any tangible resolutions or initiatives, coupled with Mr. Ahmadinejad's continuing aggressive speech, suggested that the meeting was more a public relations offensive meant to help Iran improve its image at home and in the Arab world as its confrontation with the United States appears to be escalating.

On Saturday, diplomats from Germany and the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council discussed trying to impose tougher sanctions on Iran for its continued uranium enrichment efforts in defiance of the Security Council. The diplomats, speaking in a conference call, ended their discussion without an agreement.

But after Mr. Ahmadinejad landed in Tehran on Sunday, he repeated earlier warnings of a "conspiracy" to divide the Muslim world. This time, he included Saudi Arabia as one of his partners in resisting the plan.

"Both Iran and Saudi Arabia are aware of the enemies' conspiracies," Mr. Ahmadinejad told reporters. "We decided to take measures to confront such plots, and hopefully this will strengthen Muslim countries against oppressive pressures by the imperialist front."

Saudi officials had no comment about that. But there was conflict over another issue. The Saudi Press Agency reported that Mr. Ahmadinejad had expressed support for a Saudi-led land-for-peace initiative that would have Arab states recognize Israel in return for the establishment of a Palestinian state in the lands occupied by Israel in 1967. Arab foreign ministers meeting in Cairo on Sunday agreed to revive the plan ahead of the Arab League summit meeting in Riyadh later this month.

An Iranian official, speaking to Iran's state-run media, reportedly denied that the initiative was discussed during the summit meeting.

State Department officials on Sunday had no immediate comment on the meeting. But Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Friday, before the talks, that "it's going to be up to the Saudi leadership to decide how they interact with the Iranian president."

Mr. McCormack said, "We would hope that they send a message to the Iranian president that across a wide spectrum the Iranian behavior in the region and around the world is just unacceptable, whether it's their support for terrorism or their pursuit for weapons of mass destruction or their efforts to block any sort of progress in building a democracy in Lebanon or in the Palestinian areas. We would hope that the message to the Iranian leadership is that they need to change their behavior."

A Saudi analyst with close ties to the government said, "In the end, they both know this is a geopolitical struggle," adding, "They can offer big words about ending sectarian strife, but what can they really do about it? Ahmadinejad simply undertook this visit to make himself look cooperative with other Persian Gulf states."

Mr. Ahmadinejad has come under increased pressure in recent weeks to tone down his comments. In Tehran on Saturday, Akbar Alami, a member of Parliament, said members intended to ask him to appear before them to answer questions about his policies. Mr. Alami said the lawmakers wanted to question his "provocative speeches, positions that are against diplomatic norms and against the country's national interests," the ISNA student news agency reported.

Sunni-Muslim Saudi Arabia and Shiite Iran have vied for regional dominance, each carrying the banner of Islam and seeing itself as defending its majority sect. At the same time, the region's calculus has changed significantly with the American invasion of Iraq and the fall of Saddam Hussein.

Saudi Arabia in recent months has led an aggressive diplomatic effort to counterbalance Iran's growing influence in the region, most recently serving as a host for the major Palestinian factions at a meeting in which they said they had agreed to form a unity government.

Saudi Arabia is also said to be working to bring Lebanese parties together to arrive at a peaceful settlement of the three-month crisis. An important part of the discussion on Saturday, some analysts said, was how to bring Syria back into the Arab fold after two years of isolation.

DOJ_NMG_0139666

For much of the 1980s, Saudi Arabia and Iran had an adversarial relationship. Their relations thawed with the election of a reformist president in Iran, Mohammad Khatami, in 1997. But relations have cooled significantly since the election of Mr. Ahmadinejad in 2005.

The meeting on Saturday, though initiated by Iran, was an example of Saudi Arabia's muscle-flexing in the region.

"Saudi Arabia did what people have been asking the U.S. to do for so long, which is to extend a hand out to the Iranians," said Abdel Monem Said Aly, director of Al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "The Saudis seized on the right time to give the Iranians a window of opportunity to get out of their mess."

Mr. Aly said the test of a détente between Saudi Arabia and Iran is yet to come. "Will the Iranians be willing to give the Saudis what they didn't give the Europeans, which is to stop their nuclear activity?" he said. "That will be a litmus test."

Iran, Saudi Hail 'friendly' Meeting (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

Returning from Riyadh on Sunday after meeting King Abdullah, Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad said "friendly consultations" between Iran and Saudi Arabia would continue with the two countries sharing identical views on developments in Iraq.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's visit appeared designed to ease tensions between the leading powers of the Persian Gulf, mainly Sunni Muslim Saudi Arabia and mainly Shia Iran.

Suspicions have risen in recent months both over Iraq, where the Saudis are wary of a Shia Muslim-led government friendly with Iran, and over Iran's nuclear programme.

SPA, the official Saudi news agency, reported the two leaders had agreed "the greatest threats against the Muslim nation are attempts to spread strife" between Sunnis and Shias.

The two sides have also been at odds over Lebanon, where a Saudi-backed government faces an opposition led by Hizbollah, the Shia Muslim party allied to Tehran.

Nabih Berri, leader of Amal, a second Lebanese Shia group, was quoted on Sunday by Sharq al-Awsat newspaper that a deal on a national unity government could come "within 48 hours".

In Tehran, the state-owned Kayhan newspaper, which has criticised Saudi Arabia over alleged support for Sunni insurgents in Iraq, splashed Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's visit to Riyadh as the "centre of world attention".

The chances of Iran attending a conference in Baghdad later this month, at which the US will join other UN security council permanent members and Iraq's neighbours, also increased as Mohammad-Ali Husseini, Iran's foreign ministry spokesman, claimed the idea had come from Tehran.

Similar optimism was evident in Damascus, where al-Baath, newspaper of the ruling party of president Bashar al-Assad, said the conference could lead to direct talks between Syria, an ally of Iran, and the US.

The United Nations Security Council is due this week to consider imposing further sanctions on Iran after a series of discussions in the past few days among the five permanent members and Germany.

The US said that "a few outstanding issues" still needed to be resolved after the latest telephone conference between top diplomats from the six countries, on Saturday, adding that the issue would now move to New York.

South Africa, currently president of the Security Council, has said it expected a draft resolution to be discussed in the early part of this week.

The US shows little sign of lessening pressure on Iran, especially over its nuclear programme.

Dick Cheney, the US vice-president, said on Saturday that military force against Iran remained possible.

"It would be a serious mistake if a nation like Iran were to become a nuclear power," he warned during a visit to Australia. "All options are still on the table".

A report released on Monday by Oxford Research group, a London-based security think-tank, argues US attacks on Iran's nuclear facilities could encourage Iran to develop speedily a nuclear weapon.

Would Air Strikes Work? argues military strikes could not "both encompass all key facilities and be surgical and brief."

The author Frank Barnaby, a former scientist in Britain's atomic weapons programme, writes that attacks could embolden hardliners, bolster Iranian public support for the programme, and lead Iran to a crash programme for a bomb.

"If Iran devoted maximum effort and resources to building one nuclear bomb," he writes, "it could achieve this is a relatively short amount of time: less than the two years mooted as the time military strikes would set back the current programme."

Iran President, Saudis Vow Cooperation (AP)

By Donna Abu-Nasr

DOJ_NMG_0139667

AP, March 5, 2007

Following their first official talks in Saudi Arabia, the Iranian and Saudi leaders on Saturday pledged to fight the spread of sectarian strife in the Middle East, which they said was the biggest danger facing the region.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and King Abdullah also stressed the importance of maintaining Palestinian unity and bringing security to Iraq, the official Saudi Press Agency said.

The agency quoted Ahmadinejad as saying he supported Saudi efforts to calm the situation in Lebanon and end its political crisis. Iran supports Lebanon's Shiite Hezbollah group, which is trying to topple the U.S.- and Saudi-backed government.

The talks between the two leaders have been touted as a possible means to defuse sectarian tensions in Iraq and Lebanon, and prevent Iran from sliding further into isolation.

"The two leaders asserted that the greatest danger threatening the Muslim nation at the present time is the attempt to spread strife between Sunni and Shiite Muslims and that efforts should be exerted to stop such attempts and close ranks," the Saudi Press Agency said.

Iran and Saudi Arabia have had chilly relations since the 2005 election of Ahmadinejad, whose refusal to suspend uranium enrichment has led to U.N. Security Council sanctions and made Iran's Arab neighbors increasingly wary of the country's nuclear program.

But Abdullah personally met Ahmadinejad at the airport before the two headed into a meeting. The king later threw a banquet in his guest's honor, the Saudi Press Agency said. The Iranian leader left Riyadh late Saturday after the talks.

Saudi and Iranian analysts said cooperation will benefit both countries, as well as the whole region. Shiite-majority Iran and Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia are on different sides of the two conflicts that are threatening to ignite the Middle East — Iraq and Lebanon — and the Saudis have expressed concerns over Iran's nuclear program.

Dawood al-Shirian, a Saudi analyst, said the kingdom would not have agreed to receive Ahmadinejad "if it didn't know that the visit would add to its political achievements."

Top diplomats from the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany were negotiating Saturday on possible new sanctions against Iran.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said in an e-mail late Saturday the diplomats had "a good discussion," although there was still work to be done on a few outstanding issues. He said the negotiations will now move to envoys at U.N. headquarters in New York.

A breakthrough on the Muslim sectarian divide could also pave way for the success of the March 10 conference in Baghdad of Iraq's neighbors — Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia — as well as the United States and other Western powers, and the annual Arab summit, which will be held at the end of the month in Riyadh.

"Iran has proved its capability of destabilization," wrote Ghassan Sharbil, the Lebanese editor of the Saudi-owned Al-Hayat daily. "Now, it's time to prove its ability to participate in creating stability."

"Ahmadinejad can invest in this summit to calm down the Arab world, the Islamic world and the whole globe in order to protect Iran against isolation, the dangers of an American strike and a new resolution by the Security Council," he added.

Riyadh broke off ties with Iran in 1988, accusing it of supporting terrorism and subversion. They were restored shortly after the 1991 Gulf War, but relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia plummeted again following Ahmadinejad's election in 2005.

Since then, Arab Gulf countries have offered quiet support for moves against Iran's nuclear program that the United States and its allies fear is aimed at creating weapons. Iran says its program is solely for peaceful purposes.

The chill in relations is partly due to Ahmadinejad's tough anti-Western talk, which has raised suspicions among Sunnis that Tehran is trying to expand its influence in the region.

"Since Ahmadinejad's harsh rhetoric is partly responsible for the cooling in relations, he is (now) taking this step to redress (the situation)," said independent Iranian writer Saeed Leylaz.

Saudi Arabia, Iran Target Mideast's Sectarian Discord (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

TEHRAN, IRAN

The leaders of rival regional powers Iran and Saudi Arabia are vowing to curb the sectarian strife that is increasingly defining conflict across the Middle East.

The pledge to calm tensions, as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad made his first official visit to meet Saudi King Abdullah in Riyadh on Saturday, illustrates the growing regional alarm over Shiite-Sunni violence. Sectarian bloodshed has soared in Iraq – often at the hands of allies and coreligionists of these rival nations – and is threatening stability in Lebanon.

DOJ_NMG_0139668

Yet while both leaders prefer to blame outside actors for the increase in sectarian tension – their promises to support peace notwithstanding – elements in Iran and Saudi Arabia have helped to finance sectarian militias in Iraq and, in the case of the Saudis, engaged in heated sectarian rhetoric. Still the leaders stated that the "greatest danger" to Islam is the "attempt to fuel the fire of strife between Sunni and Shiite Muslims" and called for unity, the official Saudi Press Agency reported.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said the pair discussed "the plots carried out by the enemies in order to divide the world of Islam." The two leaders, he said, "were fully aware of the threats of our enemies and we condemned them."

The archconservative Iranian president was almost certainly referring to the US, which has accused elite Iranian units of supplying weapons to Shiite militias in Iraq to target American soldiers. The militias are behind many sectarian killings.

Though Saudi Arabia is a close US ally, some Saudis and other Sunni benefactors have backed Sunni insurgents and Al Qaeda in Iraq, which has fueled the civil war there. The Iran-Saudi promise to lower sectarian passions comes after months of public warnings against Iran's rising power.

"[Talks] with Saudi Arabia could allay Arab and US uneasiness," says Davoud Hermidas Bavand, a professor of international law at Alameh University in Tehran. "Before this new strategy, the main problem [in Iraq] was Sunni elements ... behind the scenes, Jordan, Egypt, and Saudi are supporting [them]," says Professor Bavand. "But there was a change: All of a sudden, Iran appears the main troublemaker in Iraq."

The White House, which charges that Iran's commitment to nuclear power is a cover to make atomic bombs, is adding pressure with saber rattling, often repeating that "all options are on the table." Sunni leaders have warned ominously of a destabilizing "Shiite crescent" in the region, though in Iraq the worst violence by far has been carried out by Sunni militants. Ahmadinejad's uncompromising rhetoric, in which he most recently compared Iran's drive for nuclear power to a hurtling train without brakes, has raised concern anew among Sunnis.

But to speak of a Sunni-Shiite divide is not so simple.

"Iran has historically, and clearly in recent times, wanted to pose as a Middle Eastern leader that stands up to more powerful world actors," says Joost Hiltermann, the Mideast director for the Brussels-based International Crisis Group. Iran's support of Shiites in Lebanon and Iraq is "awkward," he says, because Iran's ambitions go beyond mere sectarianism.

"[Iran] wants to have the greatest influence possible, and it can only do that if it is not a sectarian actor," says Mr. Hiltermann, contacted in Amman, Jordan. "It can be more effective if it does not play the Shiite card. [Iran] has every interest in talking to Saudi Arabia, to suppress that aspect of its rise."

The visit to Riyadh comes a week before Iraq's neighbors and the US will hold crisis talks in Baghdad. Iran's foreign ministry said Sunday that Iran had not yet decided to attend the meeting though it "would spare no effort" to help bring peace.

"What good is our [Islamic world's] common cause if we waste our energies and resources on self-destruction rather than self-preservation?" asked an editorial in the Saudi Gazette newspaper. "Mr. President, your visit signals your best intentions." But Sunni-Shiite reconciliation will not be easy.

As Iran is seen to back its fellow Shiites – as well as Sunni Palestinian groups like Hamas – aspects of Wahhabism, the extremist salafi ideology embraced in Saudi Arabia, lead to conflict. "Wahhabis regard Shiites as heretics," says Bavand in Tehran. "Political necessity requires containment of this behavior. But the rise of militant Wahhabism is a sore point for Shiites." Indeed, visceral anti-Shiite preaching hasn't vanished from Saudi Arabia, where two clerics in January called Shiites "the most vicious enemy of Muslims."

By contrast, Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Sayed Ali Khamenei, delivered a warning in mid-January to a group of Sunni and Shiite clerics. He warned that "the colonial front" (meaning the US and Israel) was seeking to play up sectarian differences. "The issue is not that Shiites and Sunnis should accept one another's beliefs, [but] they should not listen to the enemy's enticements," Ayatollah Khamenei said. "They should not be enemies."

Palestinian Leaders Try To Resolve Split Over Key Posts (NYT)

By Isabel Kershner

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

JERUSALEM, March 4 — Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president and the leader of the Fatah faction, arrived in Gaza on Sunday to meet with Ismail Haniya, the caretaker prime minister from Hamas, in another effort to iron out differences over a possible Palestinian unity government.

Spokesmen from Fatah and Hamas expressed hopes over the weekend that the new government would be formed this week. But nearly a month after agreeing at Mecca, Saudi Arabia, to create a new government, Hamas and Fatah still disagree on important posts, including interior minister.

DOJ_NMG_0139669

The problem is not just the Interior Ministry portfolio, which controls some of the Palestinian Authority security services, but also the potential inclusion of representatives of other factions that are considered terrorist groups by the United States. Nor is it clear that the factions are agreed on a political document that is supposed to guide the government's work.

Fatah and Hamas signed the Mecca agreement on Feb. 8, paving the way for a unity government. Under the terms of the agreement, Hamas can nominate an independent candidate for the Interior Ministry, but the appointment has to be approved by Fatah. Two candidates proposed by Hamas have been rejected by Mr. Abbas.

Mr. Haniya officially resigned as prime minister on Feb. 15 and declared that he would form the new government within three weeks. Palestinian law gives him another two weeks' grace after that.

The process has already hit delays. Mr. Haniya had asked the factions to submit the names of their ministerial candidates by this past Friday, and he was supposed to have met with Mr. Abbas on Saturday.

Hamas announced Saturday that it had submitted its names to Mr. Haniya. But Fatah officials have suggested that it will take several days until their party presents its nominees.

A Fatah spokesman, Ahmad Abdul Rahman, told Palestinian radio that Mr. Abbas would stay in the Gaza Strip for several days.

The purpose of the unity government is to end internal Palestinian fighting, which has claimed about 100 lives in recent months, and to try to end the international economic boycott that crippled the previous Hamas-led government. Hamas came to power after winning elections in January 2006, but it is defined as a terrorist group by Israel, the United States and Europe.

The countries of the so-called quartet of negotiating partners — the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia — have laid down conditions for a resumption of direct aid. In order to qualify, the new government would have to recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce violence and accept previous signed agreements.

Hamas has so far failed to meet the demands in any explicit way, though Palestinian leaders argue that a unity government would come some way toward doing so.

A Hamas spokesman, Ismail Radwan, said that in their meeting, Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya would discuss the "broad outlines" of a political program for the proposed government.

Mr. Radwan told Palestinian radio that Hamas's ministerial candidates "were chosen from the first, second and third ranks" of the Hamas leadership and were "far from the frame of political symbolism," suggesting a lower Hamas profile in the new government. Most have not served as ministers before and are not members of the Palestinian parliament, he said.

A Fatah "young guard" leader, Hatem Abdul Qader, said the candidates would also include new faces.

The post of finance minister has already been promised to Salam Fayyad, a political independent and a former finance minister who has gained the confidence of the West.

In a new development, the militant Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command has apparently asked to join. The Popular Front is a Marxist splinter group based in Syria and is classified by the State Department as a terrorist organization.

Like Hamas, it rejected the Oslo accords that gave rise to the Palestinian Authority in the mid-1990s. Unlike Hamas, it has not run for election in the Palestinian territories and has practically no constituency there.

Mr. Radwan said that if its participation were approved, the Popular Front could be assigned one of the portfolios allocated for independents and smaller parties, or one of Hamas's own. "We are frankly interested in convening all the Palestinian factions in the national unity government," he said.

Small factions like the Popular Front are "in a struggle for survival," said Mahdi Abdul Hadi, director of Passia, a private Palestinian research center in Jerusalem. "They don't want to be forgotten."

Being in government would give them legitimacy, he added, and would empower them for the next round in the post-Mecca reshaping of the Palestinian political system — namely, the reconstitution of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

"This is like a business relationship, in which principles are put aside," Mr. Abdul Hadi said.

The small, radical Islamic Jihad faction is an exception, having announced that it would not participate in elections or in any unity government.

School Linked To Hamas Gets U.S. Cash (WT)

By Joel Mowbray

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

Millions of dollars in U.S. foreign aid have been given in the past several years to two Palestinian universities -- one of them controlled by Hamas -- that have participated in the advocacy, support or glorification of terrorism.

The funding -- principally in scholarships to individual students -- is being eyed by several members of Congress and their aides, who say it may violate U.S. law.

DOJ_NMG_0139670

The U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) has provided more than $140,000 in assistance to the Hamas-controlled Islamic University in Gaza -- including scholarships to 49 of its students -- since Congress changed the law in 2004 to restrict aid to entities or individuals "involved in or advocating terrorist activity."

No U.S. assistance was directed to Islamic University last year, but USAID continues to fund multimillion-dollar programs through American Near East Refugee Aid (ANERA), which is building a high-tech facility for the school. U.S. law requires that any recipient of U.S. aid have no association with terrorists.

USAID also gave $2.3 million in aid last year to Al-Quds University, which has student groups affiliated with designated terrorist organizations on campus and last month held a weeklong celebration of the man credited with designing and building the first suicide belts more than a decade ago.

"It is outrageous that U.S. taxpayer dollars are going toward institutions that support terrorists," said Rep. Gary L. Ackerman, New York Democrat and chairman of the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on the Middle East and South Asia.

"These loopholes must be closed so that taxpayer funds are used for their intended purpose and not to subsidize terrorism and the promotion of hatred toward Israel and the United States."

Rep. Nita M. Lowey, New York Democrat and chairwoman of the committee responsible for USAID funding, said, "It goes without saying that U.S. taxpayer dollars should absolutely never be used for advocating or honoring terrorist activity. Support for terrorists and terrorism in any shape or form is unacceptable."

USAID adamantly denies that it has violated any laws.

"Every grant we give, every bit of assistance we provide, we do in a way that is fully compliant with the law," said a USAID official, who agreed to talk only on the condition of anonymity.

In the case of Islamic University, the official said, USAID vetted the school president, the vice president of academic affairs and the dean of the library. It provided $12,000 worth of computers and materials to the school's library.

Students are vetted for connections to terrorism before being granted scholarships, the official added, but, "We don't follow every student and track every meeting they go to." Unlike other U.S. aid recipients, the scholarship students have not been required to sign pledges not to participate in terrorism.

The latest congressional interest in USAID's funding in the West Bank and Gaza was triggered by a report from Palestinian Media Watch (PMW), a pro-Israel group that monitors the Palestinian press.

Included in the report were translations of several Palestinian newspaper articles that discuss the activities of student chapters of Hamas and Islamic Jihad at Al-Quds University and other Palestinian schools assisted by USAID since 2005. Hamas and Islamic Jihad are on the U.S. list of terrorist organizations.

The USAID official did not deny that student groups affiliated with terrorist organizations were on campuses of schools assisted by the agency, but stressed that such organizations receive minimal support from the schools and are not part of "the official administrative structure."

Aides to several congressmen said they were most troubled by USAID assistance to Islamic University in Gaza City, which is openly controlled by Hamas leaders.

The organization held a two-day conference in 2005 on the "martyrdom" of former Hamas spiritual leader and founder Sheik Ahmed Yassin, who was killed in an Israeli air strike in 2004. Sheik Yassin founded the school in 1978.

Sheik Yassin and former Hamas leader Abdel Aziz Rantisi used Islamic University as a base, as has Ismail Haniyeh, prime minister in the Hamas-led Palestinian government and a member of the school's board of trustees.

Sixteen Islamic University lecturers and teachers are elected Hamas members of the Palestinian legislature. In 2005, 78 percent of the student council vote went to Hamas, according to a Palestinian newspaper article provided by Palestinian Media Watch.

When challenged by Congress last year on its assistance to the school, USAID noted that the funding was not renewed last year. Nonetheless, the agency is providing millions in grants to ANERA, which is building a high-tech facility in Gaza City for the university. California-based Intel Corp. is underwriting the project.

In a document USAID sent to Congress last year, USAID wrote that ANERA "is required to ensure that no assistance is provided to terrorist organizations or individuals associated with terrorist activities, regardless of whether or not the activity involves [U.S. government] funding."

Also causing congressional concern is a PMW's report that Al-Quds University last month held a weeklong celebration honoring Yahya Ayyash, the Hamas leader known as "the shahid [martyr] engineer." He is credited with creating the first suicide belts in the mid-1990s and training the next generation of suicide bomb makers.

The opening event, as reported by a Palestinian newspaper and found in the PMW report, included a speech by university administrator Yusuf Dhiyab, "who discussed shahids and the mark that the shahids left on the history of the Palestinian nation and how they succeeded in uniting the nation."

DOJ_NMG_0139671

In September, USAID announced an "extraordinary one-time" issuance of 2,000 scholarships for Palestinian students attending Al-Quds University at a total cost of $2.2 million, according to USAID. Simultaneously, USAID provided $100,000 in "in-kind assistance" to Al-Quds University.

In a written statement, USAID said Al-Quds University requested emergency assistance last summer, and the $2.3 million was offered because "strong U.S. support existed for assistance to moderate Palestinian leaders."

The statement singled out Al-Quds University President Sari Nusseibeh as "one such prominent and respected figure."

But Mr. Nusseibeh appeared on the Al-Jazeera satellite channel in 2002 with Hamas political bureau chief Khalid Mashaal and the mother of a suicide bomber, according to a transcript provided by the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI).

"When I hear the words of Umm Nidal, I recall the [Koranic] verse stating that 'Paradise lies under the feet of mothers,' " he said, according to MEMRI. "All respect is due to this mother; it is due to every Palestinian mother and every female Palestinian who is a Jihad fighter on this land."

White House Tussles On Doha (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As angst over the shaky state of the U.S. trade agenda grows, tensions are emerging within President Bush's inner circle over how best to get the stalled Doha round of world trade talks moving.

The chairman of the National Economic Council, presidential friend Allan Hubbard, and national-security adviser Stephen Hadley have privately voiced frustration with the tortured pace of action in the latest stage of comprehensive talks.

Launched in Doha, Qatar, soon after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the talks had as their primary aim better integrating poor nations into the global trading system. Messrs. Hubbard and Hadley have pressed for a bolder U.S. offer in an effort to encourage other countries to compromise.

In one heated meeting among top Bush aides just before Christmas in the Old Executive Office Building, U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab opposed the idea of a grand offer. Ms. Schwab, who had seen a similar move by her predecessor flop, pushed instead for "quiet negotiations" focusing on details to build trust among Doha's participants.

Mr. Bush sided with Ms. Schwab, and has continued to back her. But she is now at risk of being overshadowed -- some fear undercut -- by new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who is moving deeper into the public debate on Doha and trade.

In a speech Thursday, Mr. Paulson said increased trade is "essential to our growth" and cited Doha as especially important for the U.S. He noted that Ms. Schwab, who heads to Europe this week to confer with counterparts there, is "working hard to make progress toward a meaningful agreement."

Last week, World Trade Organization chief Pascal Lamy told The Wall Street Journal he was hopeful the U.S. and Europe were ready to make enough concessions on cutting farm aid to reopen the Doha talks soon, but he said a final deal still would face major hurdles.

Mr. Paulson, who recently named a former deputy U.S. trade representative to handle his China portfolio, will be abroad this week. He plans to argue for improved capital flows and lower trade barriers during a swing through Asia, including a stop in Seoul to pitch a free-trade pact with South Korea ahead of formal U.S.-Korean talks.

Mr. Paulson's higher profile reflects the widening sense of urgency within the Bush administration about the need to kick-start Washington's trade agenda, as doubts about the benefits of free trade and globalization have grown on Capitol Hill and among the public. Showing even modest progress on Doha could give the Democrat-controlled Congress impetus to renew the president's trade-negotiating authority, which expires in June. Extending his ability to present trade deals for a straight up-or-down vote by lawmakers would in turn buy Mr. Bush more time to close a Doha deal.

With the president endorsing quiet diplomacy, others in the administration are falling in behind Ms. Schwab. "We have looked to Sue's lead," Mr. Hubbard said. He said he doesn't recall the December meeting, adding, "We have a jillion meetings around here." A Hadley spokesman declined to comment on "internal deliberations."

For her part, Ms. Schwab said differences of opinion are healthy. "You always have to be thinking about different tactics and strategies," she said. But the trade official now faces pressure to show movement. In administration meetings, she has argued that informal meetings among major Doha players show signs of progress. And she will look smart if a deal comes together.

That is far from certain, though. Hence, Mr. Paulson's coming push on Doha, which administration officials say is designed to give some broader political momentum to the initiative.

The danger is that Mr. Paulson, a former Goldman Sachs chairman, could undercut Ms. Schwab's credibility. "You really risk further diminishing Sue in this, which is going to make it harder to get any deal," said Grant Aldonas, the top trade official at the Commerce Department during Mr. Bush's first term.

DOJ_NMG_0139672

Ms. Schwab isn't the first trade representative to get a chaperone. In the 1980s, then-Treasury Secretary James Baker helped trade chief Clayton Yeutter close a controversial deal with Canada. Clinton White House aide Gene Sperling accompanied then-trade ambassador Charlene Barshefsky to Beijing to finalize a deal paving the way for China to join the WTO, the group shepherding the Doha talks.

After Republicans lost control of Congress in November, Ms. Schwab made it a priority to work with Democrats, even as she continued negotiations abroad. But White House officials began looking to Mr. Paulson, who enjoys huge name recognition and respect overseas from his Goldman Sachs days, to buttress her efforts. "He's got an enormous amount of credibility," Mr. Hubbard says.

Mr. Paulson has a mandate from Mr. Bush to roam across issues within the administration. Taking office a few months after Ms. Schwab, he has carved an ever-greater role for himself as a free-trade advocate.

Aides to Ms. Schwab and Mr. Paulson said the two see their roles as complementary, and consult two or three times a week.

Things haven't always gone smoothly. In November, Mr. Paulson wrote an op-ed piece on Doha with his British counterpart, Gordon Brown. Ms. Schwab was caught unawares. The article was published the day before her own appearance at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, where she intended to make a postelection overture to Democrats on trade. Mr. Paulson later apologized to Ms. Schwab, officials said.

Beijing Accelerates Its Military Spending (NYT)

By Jim Yardley And David Lague

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

BEIJING, March 4 — China announced its biggest increase in defense spending in five years on Sunday, a development that quickly prompted the United States to renew its calls for more transparency from the Chinese military about the scope and intent of its continuing, rapid arms buildup.

Jiang Enzhu, a spokesman for the National People's Congress, the Communist Party-controlled national legislature, said China's military budget would rise this year by 17.8 percent to roughly 350 billion yuan, or just under $45 billion.

"We must increase our military budget, as it is important to national security," Mr. Jiang said at a news conference. "China's military must modernize. Our overall defenses are weak."

But China's military modernization efforts, particularly its drive to develop advanced weaponry, have been raising concern from Washington to Tokyo to New Delhi, where officials are worried that the buildup could be as much offensive as defensive. In January, China set off fears of an arms race in space when it successfully tested an antisatellite missile that destroyed one its own aging weather satellites. A month earlier, the People's Liberation Army began deploying the country's first state-of-the-art jet fighter, the J-10.

These advances reflect China's intense focus on scientific and technological development, and are the fruits of more than a decade of increased military spending. China's defense outlays increased an average of about 15 percent a year from 1990 to 2005, according to the Chinese military. This year's jump is the largest one reported since military spending rose by 19.4 percent in 2002.

Military analysts in the United States and Europe say that China's public military budget actually reflects only a fraction of its overall defense spending, and that the real figure is likely to be two to four times higher. Most defense analysts agree that China's military focus is to build a force that would prevail in any conflict with Taiwan, which it regards as a renegade province, and also to be capable of creating a deterrent to American military intervention.

On Sunday, John D. Negroponte, the new deputy secretary of state, chose not to focus on the size of the latest budget increase, but instead emphasized that China needed to be less secretive about its military buildup.

Mr. Negroponte, who is touring Asia, said military officials from both countries were already holding informational exchanges, and called on China to use these discussions to better explain its military ambitions.

"I think the point we would make with respect to military spending and military acquisition of various types would be the point about transparency," Mr. Negroponte said at a news conference in Beijing.

Chinese officials, meanwhile, assailed Mr. Negroponte over a recent weapons deal in which the United States approved the sale of more than $400 million in air and ground missiles to Taiwan. The missiles are considered a defensive measure against the steady buildup of Chinese missiles aimed at Taiwan.

Chinese officials lobbied Mr. Negroponte to reverse the deal and urged the United States not to send "mistaken signals" to Taiwan.

The deputy secretary said any weapons sale to Taiwan "would be for strictly defensive purposes."

DOJ_NMG_0139673

Mr. Negroponte, who was appointed last month as the State Department's second-ranking official, held meetings with Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan and two vice foreign ministers, Dai Bingguo and Yang Jiechi. He offered few details about the discussions, but said the topics included North Korea, Iran, trade tensions and regional security issues.

Mr. Negroponte emphasized the constructive working relationship between the United States and China. But China's military budget increase is a reminder of the growing unease in Washington about Beijing's long-term intentions. Japan and India are also watching China's military drive and increasing defense spending.

In a news conference before Mr. Negroponte's statements on the budget, Mr. Jiang, the National People's Congress spokesman, said that China's intentions were peaceful, and that any fears about its military ambitions were unfounded. He noted that China spent only a fraction of the proposed United States Defense Department's $481.4 billion budget for the next fiscal year — a figure that does not include spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said China's new spending would be dedicated to increasing salaries and benefits for soldiers, as well as to overall modernization and technological upgrades.

"China is committed to taking a path of peaceful development and it pursues a defensive military posture," Mr. Jiang said.

The modernization efforts are also positioning China as a weapons supplier for other countries.

Military analysts say China's main motive in developing the J-10 is to diminish the technological advantage of Taiwan's Air Force. But analysts say China also plans to market the fighter plane to countries that cannot afford more expensive fighter planes sold by other countries.

China's technological push comes as the country continues to shrink the world's biggest standing army. Since 2003, the army's personnel has been reduced by 200,000 to 2.3 million soldiers, according to government figures. Spending is now focused on better training and equipment for this leaner force.

China Boosts Military Spending (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

BEIJING, March 5 -- China announced Sunday that it will increase military spending at a sharply higher rate this year, budgeting a rise of nearly 18 percent, and a senior U.S. official immediately called for clarity on the planned expenditures.

Deputy Secretary of State John D. Negroponte said at a news conference at the end of his maiden visit to Beijing in his new post that the Bush administration is dissatisfied with China's unwillingness to share such information. "We think it's important in our dialogue that we understand what China's plans and intentions are," he said.

The government's military budget announcement and Negroponte's swift appeal for more transparency highlighted a particularly uneasy point in what has become a broad, close and increasingly important U.S.-China relationship.

Negroponte has been assigned the lead role in managing that relationship, a mission he emphasized by calling on Chinese officials so soon after his Feb. 13 swearing-in. Apparently by coincidence, the Chinese government chose the same moment to announce that its declared military expenditures for 2007 will amount to $44.94 billion, an increase of 17.8 percent.

According to Pentagon estimates, that declared total represents about a third of actual military spending if equipment purchases are taken into account. But even that would amount to only a fraction of the U.S. military budget, which is proposed to rise to about $623 billion for fiscal 2008.

China has been steadily increasing military expenditures for more than a decade, seeking to recover from a long lag compared with other major powers. But the figure for 2007 drew attention because it represents the biggest jump in several years.

In reaction to the spending climb and resulting improvements in China's forces, the United States has regularly urged China to open its ultra-secretive military to more scrutiny and share its strategic outlook with Washington to avoid misunderstandings in the region. The outgoing U.S. Pacific Command chief, Adm. William J. Fallon, was particularly active in seeking to organize more contacts between the two military hierarchies.

Negroponte said he, too, will push for closer connections. "It's not so much the budget and the increases as it is understanding these things through dialogue and contacts," he said.

A spokesman for the National People's Congress, which opened its annual session Monday, said military expenditures were rising to cover the cost of better training and higher salaries in the 2.3 million-member People's Liberation Army and benefits for about 200,000 soldiers shed from the ranks over the past several years. Reducing the lower ranks and improving technological training for remaining troops have been major parts of the country's long-range military improvement program.

DOJ_NMG_0139674

The spokesman, Jiang Enzhu, said China's military expenditures do not represent a threat to other countries because President Hu Jintao's government has vowed to use the military only in "defensive operations." He added that "China is committed to following the path of peaceful development, and it has adopted a defensive posture."

The official New China News Agency quoted the head of the military's General Logistics Department, Liao Xilong, as saying that the extra money would also go toward improving China's ability to wage high-tech warfare, to defend its information systems against jamming and to coordinate among land, air and sea forces.

"The present-day world is none too peaceful," he said, according to the news agency. "To protect national security and territorial integrity, we must adequately increase spending on military modernization."

Premier Wen Jiabao, delivering his annual government report to the National People's Congress, also underlined the country's determination to modernize its armed forces, saying they must be able to "effectively carry out the historic mission of the army in the new stage of the new century."

"We will intensify defense-related research and efforts to produce advanced weaponry and equipment," he told the legislature.

Laying out his government's aims for 2007, Wen also vowed to increase spending on environmental protection, rural education and health insurance for the poor. He forecast that China's economy will grow by 8 percent this year, which would be a drop from the more than 9 percent recorded in 2006.

Underlying China's determination to build a more modern military -- and a factor in the U.S. call for transparency -- is the risk of conflict over Taiwan, which sits 100 miles off the mainland.

The island has been self-ruled since Nationalist forces fled there in 1949 as Mao Zedong's Communist troops took power. But in Beijing's eyes it remains a Chinese province that must at some point return to the fold. The government here has vowed to use force as a last resort if Taiwan moves decisively toward formal independence.

Negroponte said Chinese officials raised with him the Bush administration's recent decision to sell Taiwan about 400 missiles, contending that the $421 million deal violated U.S. commitments to a one-China policy. In response, Negroponte said, he emphasized Washington's adherence to the one-China principle but reminded them of legislation mandating U.S. help for Taiwan's defense.

Chinese Military Spending To Rise By 18% (FT)

By Andrew Yeh In Beijing

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

China's defence spending will jump nearly 18 per cent year-on-year to Rmb350.9bn ($45.3bn, €34.4bn, £23.3bn) this year, the largest annual rise in spending in recent years, according to a forecast by Beijing's legislature.

Jiang Enzhu, a spokesman for the National People's Congress, which convenes in the capital on Monday, said on Sunday that the main reason for the rise was to "make up for the weak foundation" of the nation's armed forces.

The newly allocated funds for the People's Liberation Army will be about 7.5 per cent of the nation's total budgeted spending for the year, according to Mr Jiang. The real spending figure is believed to be much higher, however, since the official number probably does not include large procurements and other costs.

In the past, the Pentagon has said China's real military spending could be as much as three times the stated sum.

The Bush administration has, in recent weeks, expressed increased suspicion of the general objectives and technological sophistication of the Chinese military, which is extremely secretive.

John Negroponte, the US deputy secretary of state, called on Chinese leaders on Sunday to explain clearly what their "plans and intentions" are for the build-up.

"It's not so much the budget and the increases...as it is understanding those questions better through dialogue and transparency," he said at the US embassy.

Beijing's foreign ministry said at the weekend that it "resolutely opposes" recent US plans to sell 450 air and ground missiles to Taiwan. China considers Taiwan a renegade province and aims hundreds of missiles at the island.

"I stressed [to Chinese counterparts] that any weapons sales that we might make to Taiwan would be for strictly defensive purposes and consistent with the 'one China' policy," Mr Negroponte said.

His comments were made just days after Dick Cheney, the vice-president, said on a trip to Australia that China's stated peaceful spending rise was "not consistent" with its current military policies.

Mr Jiang said that the boosted funds would mainly go towards wages for armed forces personnel, improving living quarters and upgrading equipment. He did not elaborate further.

DOJ_NMG_0139675

“It’s a moderate increase in step with China’s economic development,” the Xinhua news agency quoted Liao Xilong, a member of the central military commission, as saying. Officials and legislators from around the country are gathered in Beijing to discuss laws and finances.

In a rare white paper on defence released last December, China estimated that its military spending in 2005 was only 6.2 per cent of total US spending and just over half that of the UK.

Mr Negroponte said there has been a lot of dialogue with Beijing since January, when China fired a missile to destroy an old satellite in space, becoming only the third country to do so.

China's Military Buildup Spurs Concerns (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Andrew Batson And Jason Leow

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

China says it plans to boost military spending by nearly 18% this year -- the largest increase in a decade -- in a move that could raise tensions with the U.S.

A spokesman for the National People's Congress, which is set to approve China's annual government budget this week, said China is trying to strengthen its armed forces in step with its rapid economic growth. He added that the increase would fund improvements in military technology as well as raise soldiers' pay.

The growth in China's publicly disclosed defense spending -- which many analysts believe understates the total actually devoted to military programs -- has drawn criticism from top U.S. officials, who question China's intentions.

During a visit to Australia late last month, Vice President Dick Cheney said China's "fast-paced military buildup" is "not consistent with China's stated goal of a 'peaceful rise.'"

China disclosed the 2007 spending figure just before a meeting between Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte and China's foreign minister, Li Zhaoxing, in Beijing.

Speaking later to reporters, Mr. Negroponte said that while Pentagon officials in the past had discussed the issue of the defense buildup with the Chinese military, he remained unclear about China's motivations for the buildup. "We think it's important in our dialogue that we understand what China's plans and intentions are," he said. "This is in our view a perfectly reasonable suggestion which we would hope that they take into account."

The NPC spokesman, Jiang Enzhu, acknowledged such concerns. Speaking to reporters yesterday, he noted that "in international society, there are some people who are greatly concerned about China's defense spending."

Mr. Jiang said the increases are "still compensating for the weak foundation in national defense" that resulted from insufficient government investment during the 1980s, adding: "China will not become a threat to any country."

Despite double-digit increases in recent years, including last year's 14.7% rise, Chinese defense spending remains far below that of the U.S. and other major powers, in both relative and absolute terms.

China's defense budget for this year amounts to nearly $45 billion. The U.S. defense budget for the 2007 fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30, is expected to top $600 billion. China's spending is equivalent to somewhat more than 1% of the country's gross domestic product. The U.S. spends about 4% of GDP on defense.

Even so, the U.S. and China's Asian neighbors are increasingly concerned about China's strengthening military -- worries that escalated markedly after China's successful test of an antisatellite missile in January.

Chinese officials appeared taken aback at the international reaction to the unannounced missile test and have lately issued a number of statements meant to reassure foreign capitals that Beijing harbors no aggressive intent.

But China is determined to improve the technological capacity of its 2.3-million-member armed forces, which still lag far behind those of developed countries, in order to protect its increasingly global interests.

For Chinese strategic thinkers, the increased integration of China into the global economy is prompting a revolution in their views of the role of the military, which has been focused for most of its existence on domestic threats, territorial defense and border conflicts.

Much of China's military focus remains on Taiwan, which Beijing views as part of its territory. Chinese leaders' belief that their country's military has been incapable of using force to take Taiwan -- which buys weapons from the U.S. -- has long rankled and helped spur modernization efforts.

While not linking the military-spending increase directly to Taiwan, Mr. Jiang criticized the administration of President Chen Shui-bian, and reiterated China's intent eventually to rule the island. "We will strive with the greatest sincerity and the greatest effort to realize the prospect of peaceful reunification, but we will never tolerate Taiwan independence," Mr. Jiang said.

In Taipei, President Chen delivered strong pro-independence remarks apparently aimed at provoking China and appealing to his base. "Taiwan should be independent, Taiwan should go by its own name," he said at a banquet marking the 25th anniversary of the pro-independence group, the Formosan Association for Public Affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0139676

Both countries retain "China" in their formal names, with Taiwan known as the Republic of China and the communist-ruled mainland officially called the People's Republic of China. But in a bid to assert Taiwan's separate identity in the past year, Mr. Chen's independence-leaning administration has substituted "Taiwan" for "China" at the post office and two big government companies.

China Boosts Defense Fund As Talks End (WT)

By Ed Lanfranco, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

BEIJING -- Traditional fireworks ending China's lunar New Year celebrations were overshadowed yesterday by a display of political pyrotechnics that included a big boost in military spending, tough talk on Taiwan and a conclusion to two days of delicate diplomatic talks with the United States.

The biggest bombshell was a 17.8 percent increase in the defense budget, announced at a press conference ahead of the opening today of the annual meeting of the National People's Congress (NPC).

"China must increase the military budget for protecting national security and promoting the reunification of the motherland," said NPC spokesman Jiang Enzhu. "This increase is compensatory in nature in order to make up for the weak national defense foundation of our country."

The remark on reunification clearly was aimed at Taiwan, the island republic of 23 million people that the mainland government considers a breakaway province.

Mr. Jiang said that "deterring Taiwan's independence and maintaining peace in the Taiwan Strait" remained a "pressing task" for the NPC because of a "continuing push for de jure independence" in Taipei.

Arguing that secession efforts "will not enjoy popular support" in Taiwan, Mr. Jiang said, "If you want to push for independence for Taiwan, you will not have success at the end of the day."

John D. Negroponte, the newly confirmed U.S. deputy secretary of state, wound up two days of talks in Beijing made more delicate by reports that the United States plans to sell Taiwan 450 air and ground missiles to counter China's missile buildup.

"Any weapons sales we might make to Taiwan would be for strictly defensive purposes and consistent with the one-China policy," which considers Taiwan and the mainland as one country, Mr. Negroponte said after his talks.

On the jump in the defense budget, after several years of double-digit increases, Mr. Negroponte expressed concern that much of China's military spending is hidden from view.

"We think it's important in our dialogue that we understand what China's plans and intentions are," Mr. Negroponte said.

"We should continue, and perhaps intensify, dialogue so that we have a bit better understanding of exactly what it is the government of China has in mind with respect with its military modernization, what doctrines underlie this and what their intentions are."

Since Hu Jintao became the country's supreme leader in November 2002, China's defense budget has increased by 9.6 percent in 2003, 11.6 percent in 2004, 12.6 percent in 2005 and 14.7 percent last year.

The Pentagon and defense analysts think China's actual military spending may be three or four times higher than the budget figures, which do not include weapons procurements and key items such as research and development.

That would include the construction of five new nuclear-missile submarines first reported in The Washington Times last week.

The NPC spokesman said most of the increase in the defense budget will be used to boost wages and living allowances for the armed forces and to upgrade armaments that "enhance the military's ability to conduct defensive operations."

He characterized expenditures as "quite modest" compared with the military budgets of Britain, France, Japan and especially the United States.

Paulson Doesn't See China As Enemy (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 5, 2007

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. says the economy is healthy, inflation seems under control and the U.S. should not perceive China as an economic enemy.

Mr. Paulson, who this week makes his third visit to China as Treasury secretary, said in a television interview broadcast it is essential that both countries have strong economic ties. The former head of the investment company Goldman Sachs has said China is moving too slowly in overhauling its currency system and cracking down on copyright piracy. U.S. businesses blame these factors for the soaring U.S. trade deficit with China.

DOJ_NMG_0139677

"I would say that our relationship with China is multifaceted, and it's a very important relationship for the U.S. And I don't believe we need to make China an enemy," Mr. Paulson said.

Democrats in Congress have criticized the Bush administration for doing too little to protect U.S. workers from unfair foreign trade practices. Mr. Paulson thinks protectionist barriers in this country would hurt U.S. consumers and make the United States less competitive.

"[China's] whole economy is developing; their capital markets are not nearly as developed as their manufacturing economy. They're not reflective of the Chinese economy overall. They're largely cut off from the global capital markets," he said.

"But as they reform those capital markets and as they open them up to competition, this will make it possible for them to have a currency that trades in a competitive marketplace. This will help their economy develop in a way [that] it'll be good for them and good for us, because there will be a bigger market for our exports," Mr. Paulson said.

After a week in which the Dow Jones Industrial Average posted its worst weekly performance in more than four years, Mr. Paulson said yesterday that he felt good about the economy and discounted the chance of an economic downtown.

"Markets never move in any one direction forever in a straight line. And so I look at it and put it in perspective and say, over the last year, the Dow's up almost 11 percent, [the Standard & Poor's 500] up 9 percent, and I'll take it," Mr. Paulson said.

The Dow dropped 416 points Tuesday after big declines in China and other countries. The Dow fell 533 points for the week, rattling investor confidence about the state of the U.S. economy.

The sell-off followed comments a day earlier by former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan that the economy might slip into recession by year's end. Weeks ago, the current chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, gave Congress a mostly upbeat assessment of the economy's prospects.

"Clearly, no one's got a crystal ball. So there's always a possibility that there will be a downturn, always a possibility," Mr. Paulson said. "But I don't see it. I think we have a healthy economy in the U.S.

"You know, a year ago, when the growth rates were much higher, I was concerned. I said, 'Is this going to be sustainable?' Now I'm looking at it and I'm seeing a situation where it looks like we're successfully making the transition.

"The consumer's strong. Exports have been greater than imports for quarters running, and they're adding to our growth," the secretary said in an interview taped Friday for "This Week" on ABC.

"We've got a very healthy labor market. ... Inflation seems to be contained. And what really makes a difference to me is the average worker is now beginning to feel the benefits. Real income is up 2.1 percent for the average American worker over the last year. So I'm feeling good about the U.S. economy."

On other topics, Mr. Paulson said:

· He opposes efforts in Congress to rein in executive pay. Last week, the head of the House Financial Services Committee and 21 other Democrats proposed legislation to give shareholders at public companies a formal say in executives' compensation packages.

"What upsets people in this country is pay for failure. And so I think it's very, very important that compensation be tied to performance," Mr. Paulson said.

· His talks with Mr. Bush about China usually bring up global warming.

"Almost every time I talk with the president on China, he asks me how we're doing on the environmental issues with China. Because they're building one coal plant every week, and a lot of it is with some of the more less-developed technology, and there's a lot we can be doing to make advances there," said Mr. Paulson, a former chairman of the Nature Conservancy.

Paulson Renews Yuan-Reform Talk (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said that the U.S. shouldn't make China an enemy, but that Beijing needs to step up reform of its currency to resolve short-term differences.

Mr. Paulson, who this week makes his third visit to China as Treasury secretary, said it is essential that both countries manage disagreements to maintain strong economic ties.

"I would say that our relationship with China is multifaceted and it's a very important relationship for the U.S. And I don't believe we need to make China an enemy," Mr. Paulson said on U.S. TV yesterday.

"If we manage the relationship -- the overall relationship with China properly, it's going to benefit both of our countries for a long time to come."

Mr. Paulson said it is "a top priority to get this long-term economic relationship right between our two countries and to deal with the most pressing short-term issues."

He said that he would continue to press for improving flexibility in the Chinese currency.

DOJ_NMG_0139678

Britain's Gordon Brown: A Change In Tone For US (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, March 5, 2007

LONDON

Ever since Tony Blair let slip in September 2004 that he had plans to step down, two questions have loomed large in Britain. When will he go, and what will his successor do differently?

Now that the answer to the first question is more or less settled – Mr. Blair is expected to move on by midsummer – the focus is turning to the second.

Barring an improbable political upset, that man will be Gordon Brown, an earnest Scot with a rigorous intellect and a passion for social justice who has served – not always comfortably – for 10 years as Blair's finance minister and right-hand man.

Members of Parliament, political analysts, and people who know Mr. Brown say he will be a much different prime minister from Blair. His interests are Africa and trade justice rather than the Middle East; he was never enthusiastic about Iraq; he appears to have little in common with President Bush.

But although Brown is sometimes seen as the embodiment of core Labour values, the caricature of him as a closet socialist suspicious of America and skeptical about war is off the mark.

"Gordon is very much an Americaphile, in some ways more than Blair," says Stephen Twigg, a former government minister who is now director of the Foreign Policy Center think tank in London. "When he goes on holiday abroad ,he tends to go to Cape Cod, while Blair normally holidays in Europe. Culturally, Gordon is very much an Atlanticist with strong connections to US politics."

Brown is not yet home free. Some in his Labour Party mutter that his diffident ways and clear association with 10 years of Blairism may make it difficult for him to appeal to voters. But so far, there is no sign of another Labour candidate coming forward to challenge him for the role of party leader that Blair will vacate. If no one does, Brown will accede unchallenged to the Labour helm, and as a result will take over as prime minister as well.

Americans may find him a very different proposition from Blair, more cautious, possibly less compliant. Some say the White House should prepare for a big change in style, if not substance. "There'll be a huge difference because Brown is not an actor like Blair," says Tom Bower, a journalist and author who wrote a 2004 biography of Brown. "But he is an Atlanticist and won't break the relationship with Washington."

What he might do, however, is accentuate the differences between London and Washington. Blair was always apt to minimize whatever disputes arose and stress the unity of the two allies, which often made him look obsequious and earned him the unflattering sobriquet "Bush's poodle."

But diplomats have criticized him for failing to extract enough influence for his unswerving support for Bush's wars. Brown may play a tougher game.

"In those areas where there is disagreement, as there has been on climate change [and] the International Criminal Court, Tony Blair has tended to underplay those, whereas Gordon Brown might be more overt," predicts Mr. Twigg. "He will quite deliberately give emphasis to areas where there are disagreements."

"He'll be much tougher on America than Blair was," predicts Ian Gibson, a Labour parliamentarian, who, like Brown, charted a course from provincial Scotland through Edinburgh University and on to national politics. "But he has a great interest in some of the good things in America," he adds, noting that Brown is more at ease among intellectuals than among defense and institutional types in Washington. "He's more pro-America than pro-Europe in fact."

Indeed, Europeans may be dreading the prospect of a Brown premiership. While Blair aimed to haul Britain into the heart of Europe, the chancellor has given few signs of being a Europhile over the past 10 years and, apart from brief appearances at meetings, rarely visits the continent.

On Iraq, few expect a sudden change. Blair has already started the countdown to exit with the announcement on Feb. 21 of a drawdown in troops. Brown will, experts say, want to draw a line in the sand. And he may change the tune about the war, because he was far less convinced than Blair about it.

"He doesn't suggest, like Blair does, that the war in Iraq was part of the fight against terrorism," says John Curtice, a politics professor at Strathclyde University in Scotland. "He has said as little as possible on Iraq, but has said enough to suggest that he won't give speeches implying that the war in Iraq contributed to reducing terrorism in the UK."

Mr. Curtice says Brown's main aim would be to get out of Iraq as quickly as possible. "The other question is will he be willing to say we made a mistake?" he adds.

Afghanistan is a different matter. Here Brown looks to be locked into current policy. The defense ministry has just announced another rise in troop numbers, to 7,700, and the campaign in the south is viewed very differently from Iraq. "Here, he can't avoid a commitment," warns Professor George Joffe, a Middle East expert at the Center for International Studies at Cambridge University. "But he will do so at the expense of Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0139679

While Blair's foreign policy has centered around active interventionism – the idea that the West has a moral duty to intervene militarily where it sees gross injustice – Brown's big ideas are different, though equally predicated on morality. "He clearly has a passion about Africa; issues around aid, debt relief, and trade justice," notes Twigg. But whether he backs away from moral interventionism remains to be seen. "The situation in Darfur will provide a major test" of that.

Brown has already started behaving like a prime minister. In speeches now, he strays well off the financial beat, positing ideas and policies on everything from Britishness and immigration to Britain's chances of hosting the 2018 soccer World Cup.

Allies say he will focus more on higher education, science, technology, and engineering. The need to stiffen economic competition against developing countries like India is a favored theme.

But some fret that a Brown premiership does not promise enough domestic change to revive a party suffering in the polls. Brown was, after all, the architect of many of Labour's reforms over the past decade.

As Frank Field, a former minister, wrote last week: "What new directions can be offered when the architect of current policies has merely moved up one place?"

EU-India Trade Pact Stumbles (FT)

By Jo Johnson

Financial Times, March 5, 2007

Indian objections to the inclusion of a standard "human rights and democracy" clause in a proposed free trade agreement with the European Union have emerged as a serious stumbling block, the Financial Times has learnt.

The row is a setback for the ambitious agenda set at the EU-India summit in Helsinki in October last year, when both sides pledged to deepen economic and political ties.

"This clause would, of course, be a deal-breaker," Kamal Nath, India's commerce minister, said in an interview.

"This is meant to be a -specifically targeted trade and investment agreement, which it will not be if other elements come into it."

Since a 1995 EU Council decision by member states, the European Commission has systematically included a so-called "essential elements" clause in bilateral trade and co-operation agreements. It now applies to agreements with more than 120 countries.

However, the Commission has triggered an intense debate among the EU's member states by pushing for an apparent exception for India, on the grounds that a 1994 EU-India co-operation agreement covers human rights questions.

Peter Power, spokesman for Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, said: "Given how much both countries can get out of it, we feel we should forge ahead on the basis of strict economic criteria, leaving more political considerations for other agreements."

Commission officials privately acknowledged that the outcome of the debate in the EU Council was "too difficult to predict".

One said: "The council is going through the detail of the agreement at the moment. We are not out of the woods."

Bilateral trade in goods between India and the EU amounted to $40bn in 2006 and trade in services a further $8bn. Both sides say they want a "deep and comprehensive" agreement that goes beyond multilateral commitments and is not trade-diverting.

New Delhi argues that the "essential elements" clause conflicts with India's longstanding position that economic agreements should not be "contaminated" by political riders.

"India suspects that such clauses provide protectionist cover," said Pradeep S. Mehta, of Consumer Unity & Trust Society, an Indian trade think-tank.

"Because of its economic performance, India is now more self-confident about when it will give ground and when it will not give ground."

Mr Nath said: "This is a win-win deal for both sides and the EU must evaluate how much it has to gain from this agreement. It's up to the EU to work out how it wants to proceed."

India is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Council, but ranks low, according to the Asian Human Rights Commission, among the international community in terms of the ratification of international conventions and covenants.

Although it has signed the UN Convention against Torture, for example, it has resisted ratifying it on the grounds that domestic mechanisms within the country are capable of addressing the issue.

India is keen to launch an FTA with the EU as soon as possible. Manmohan Singh, prime minister, regards it as a low-key way of keeping the reforms process moving forward at a time when there is no consensus for more overt liberalisation.

DOJ_NMG_0139680

Ivory Coast Leader Signs Accord With Rebels (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

DAKAR, Senegal, March 4 — The president of Ivory Coast and the leader of a rebel group that controls its northern half signed a new agreement on Sunday to end a political impasse and reunite the country, which has been divided by war.

The plan is the latest in a long string of agreements seeking to end a simmering conflict that has kept Ivory Coast, once one of the most peaceful and prosperous nations in West Africa, divided in two and hobbled economically. Laurent Gbagbo, Ivory Coast's president, and Guillaume Soro, leader of the New Forces rebel group, met in Ouagadougou, capital of Burkina Faso, to sign the agreement.

The two sides plan to form a unity government within five weeks and form a joint military command. The agreement was brokered by Burkina Faso's president, Blaise Compaoré, after a month of negotiations.

Civil war broke out in Ivory Coast in September 2002 after a long period of upheaval and economic decline that followed the death of its first leader, Félix Houphouët-Boigny, in 1993.

The causes of the conflict were complex, rooted largely in the tension between the predominantly Muslim north, where many people are descendants of immigrants from neighboring countries like Burkina Faso and Mali, and the largely Christian and animist ethnic people of the south, some of whom claim to be the true Ivorians.

The war was brief, lasting only a few months before France and the United Nations intervened, dividing the country between the rebel forces in the north and the government-controlled south. A buffer zone was established, and since January 2003, a series of peace agreements built on the principle of power-sharing have been signed.

Each agreement so far has foundered on the difficult but essential questions that caused the war in the first place. The two sides have been unable to agree on voter registration rules and identity cards for long-postponed elections, or on how to disarm rebel groups and the pro-government militias.

Political leaders in the south, fearing that they will lose power to people of foreign descent, have excluded popular northern candidates from running through laws that bar candidates whose grandparents were not born in Ivory Coast.

Elections to choose a new president have been postponed twice, most recently under a United Nations plan that requires that elections be held before Oct. 31.

Under the current agreement, President Gbagbo is supposed to be sharing power with a prime minister, Charles Konan Banny, who was appointed in 2005 as a consensus candidate when elections could not be held in time. But Mr. Banny and Mr. Gbagbo have repeatedly clashed over the question of who has authority to run the country.

Sweden's Pension Antidote Finds A Global Audience (WSJ)

By Joellen Perry

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

As aging populations and shaky public finances make overhauling pension systems a global priority, an initiative implemented nearly a decade ago in Sweden is looking like the pension world's next big thing.

By pegging public pensions to individual earnings and overall life-expectancy rates, Sweden has given its citizens incentives to be more productive and retire later -- and sidestepped the political paralysis that has stymied change elsewhere.

SCANDINAVIAN MODERN

· The Issue: Sweden's decade-old pension system may offer a model for other countries coping with aging populations.

· The Background: Pension payouts are tied to salaries, life-expectancy rates and the health of the economy.

· The Bottom Line: Swedes are retiring later now. The formula averts some political friction.

Some Eastern European nations have already ditched their struggling post-Communist systems and gone Swedish. Steps taken in countries as diverse as Brazil and Russia boast some Swedish elements. A World Bank book based on the Swedish model has been translated into Chinese. And next month, Egypt's government will review plans to chuck the country's failing system for a Swedish version.

"There's no magic solution to the pension problem. But governments world-wide are looking at" Sweden, says Kent Weaver, political-science professor at Georgetown University in Washington. "It's starting to be seen as the best among what are now seen to be imperfect options."

Sweden's plan -- designed in part by an American expatriate -- is conventional in that current workers' contributions fund current retirees' benefits, much as the Social Security system does in the U.S. But calculating payouts according to salaries and aging projections gives it the flexibility to accommodate revenue and population shifts. If the economy does poorly, the thinking goes, future pension payments will go down. And the longer people in a particular age group are projected to live, the smaller their pension payouts will be.

DOJ_NMG_0139681

Or at least that is the theory. The changeover was made in 1999, so not enough time has elapsed to thoroughly test it. In fact, Sweden's economy has done so well since 2003 -- when benefits started being calculated in part under the new rules -- that pensioners have received more than they would have under the old structure. The downside is that if and when growth falters, retirees will get less. "It hasn't happened yet, but it will," says Ole Settergren, director of the pensions department at Sweden's Social Insurance Agency.

That approach is a break from the typical pay-as-you-go system, which defines a guaranteed benefit in advance but often saddles the state with underfunded obligations -- particularly when times are bad.

Sweden's system "is not a good system if you want to subsidize leisure," says Edward Palmer, a professor of social-insurance economics at Stockholm's Uppsala University and a Colorado native who helped design the plan.

It can be a good system, however, for politicians wary of revamping pensions, because it allows them to defer to a formula rather than promoting the unpopular options of later retirement and smaller benefits. "The political discussions behind [things like] increasing the retirement age are much more cumbersome than if it just happens mathematically," says Robert Holzmann, senior director of the World Bank's Social Protection unit in Washington.

Skeptics point out, however, that politicians still could eventually be pressured to change the system if benefits get too skimpy.

Sweden's plan has other critics. It is a tough sell elsewhere in Western Europe, where many see generous pensions as a right. Other critics include the International Labor Organization, which holds that earnings-related pensions should guarantee 40% of a person's prior average earnings. Swedes, unlike the majority of Western Europeans, get no such assurance. The system also preserves existing income inequality: Workers who earn more get more when they retire.

In the U.S., Social Security tracks what people pay through the bulk of their careers, but it reroutes contributions from wealthier citizens to prop up poorer workers' pensions.

The bottom line of the Swedish model: Most people will have to work harder to reap the kinds of pensions their grandparents could take for granted. "It puts the cost of aging onto the individual, rather than onto society," says Sarah Brooks, an Ohio State University political-science professor who has studied the plan.

Last February, the World Bank endorsed the Swedish plan as a possible antidote to pension woes world-wide. Economists at the European Central Bank followed up last fall, highlighting Sweden's approach for the 13-nation euro zone, where one-third of the population will be older than 64 by 2050.

In countries with strapped budgets, the Swedish plan's attraction is its premise that something is better than nothing -- in other words, stingier payouts help ensure the system doesn't collapse. That was crucial to persuading unions in Egypt to endorse that country's new Swedish-inspired pension plan. "They know [the old plan] is generous, but they also know it will not be there," says David Robalino, a World Bank economist who has been working in Egypt.

In Poland, where a public-relations campaign helped ensure an enthusiastic transition to a Swedish-style system in 1999, the fiscal benefits are already clear. A recent European Union report said that, despite having some of the worst demographics on the Continent, "the long-term budgetary impact of aging in Poland is the lowest in the EU."

Like Sweden, Poland mandated that a slice of pension contributions go into private accounts similar to a 401(k), where the money is invested in mutual funds. Swedes contribute 18.5% of their salaries to the pension system; only a small portion of that -- 2.5 percentage points -- is held in individual accounts. Poles contribute a total of 19.52% of their gross salaries to the system, with 7.3 percentage points going into private accounts.

The concept of individual accounts has been key to selling the plan to Swedes. Sweden sends its workers statements -- mailed annually in bright orange envelopes -- showing what they have put into their pension and what they would get at retirement. The money isn't really there for them (it is being paid to current retirees). But advocates say seeing it expressed as an individual account should have the psychological effect of encouraging people to work longer to win bigger benefits.

It may be working. Sweden's official retirement age is 61 years old. Since the change took effect, the average age at which Swedes retire has risen to 63.

Even partially adopting the Swedish plan can have benefits. Brazil doesn't send its citizens annual statements, and there is no private-account component. But individual-contribution and life-expectancy rates have been used to calculate private-sector pension payouts since 1999. Brazilian officials made the change after studying the Swedish model, and they have seen costs fall since.

Perhaps the Swedish plan's biggest drawback is that it remains relatively untested. The first wave of retirees who get all their benefits based on the new model won't hit for another few years, and the country hasn't suffered a major economic slowdown since adopting the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0139682

"It certainly has the virtue of spelling out, in anticipation, what people have agreed should happen," says Olivia Mitchell, director of the Pension Research Council at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School. "But that doesn't necessarily mean that it will."

Castro's Gulag (WSJ)

By Armando Valladares

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Like thousands of other Cubans, I was arrested in the middle of the night. Fidel Castro's police raided my parents' home, stuck a machine gun in my face and took me away. It was 1960 and I was 22 years old.

The news that the Cuban dictator is gravely ill floods my mind with memories of my years spent in captivity. I believe that those of us who were political prisoners know his legacy better than anyone. For 22 years, I was an inmate in his vast prison system, mostly confined to an island gulag, for crimes I did not commit.

Like the majority of Cubans in 1959, I cheered Castro's victory over Fulgencio Batista, a dictator on friendly terms with the U.S. Castro called himself the enemy of all dictatorships; he had a cross hanging round his neck and he swore that there would be free and fair elections. But as his near five decades of uninterrupted power proved, he tricked everyone and replaced the dictatorship of Batista with his own bloodier version.

In a famous 1959 appearance on "Meet the Press," Castro answered a question put to him by Lawrence Spivak, "Democracy is my ideal, really . . . I am not communist . . . There is no doubt for me between democracy and communism." Once Castro began making his sympathies overt, I began speaking out against his ideological shift amongst the people in my workplace, the postal savings bank.

At the time, the government was distributing placards with the slogan: "If Fidel is a communist, then put me on the list. He's got the right idea." The phrase was ubiquitous, from decals to billboards. When officials in the bank demanded that I put the slogan on my worktable, I refused. When they asked if I had anything against Fidel, I told them that if he was a communist, then, yes, I did. I had no desire to become a symbol of political dissidence. That decision was made for me that day.

Thirteen days after my arrest, I was tried on charges of threatening the powers of state security, even though there was no evidence against me. The justice system under Castro was a mockery of the rule of law; members of my tribunal were Communist Party apparatchiks who sat with their boots up on tables, smoking cigars and reading comic books. Their very presence was but a formality; the verdicts had already been decided. I was not permitted an attorney.

I received a 30-year prison sentence as a potential conspirator. Two men in the same court room falsely accused of shooting at a government spokesman were executed by firing squad. When their defense attorney (whom they had met just minutes before) pleaded with the prosecutor to reduce the sentence, the prosecutor responded that he had received orders to have them shot, no matter what, as a means of social prophylaxis.

Once in prison, if the guards felt like punishing us, they would put us in cages, with mesh roofs, and walk along the edge while pouring buckets of urine and excrement all over our bodies. Sometimes, guards would shoot prisoners for target practice. That is how they killed Alfredo Carrion and Diosdado Aquit. Many of the men whom Castro had imprisoned, tortured and killed had been his comrades in overthrowing Batista. But most of them were innocent people eliminated in Ernesto "Che" Guevara's psychotic quest for what he and Castro called the "new man."

The impunity of Castro's dictatorship was marked by its cruelty. A prisoner in my block, Julio Tan, once refused an order by a prison guard to dig weeds. The guard struck him with his bayonet, another hit him with a hoe, and a gang of guards beat him until he bled to death in just a matter of minutes. My friend Pedro Luis Boitel, a student leader and courageous opponent of Batista, went on a hunger strike in 1972 to protest his treatment. On the 49th day of the strike, Castro personally ordered that Boitel be denied drinking water. Boitel died of thirst, in horrific agony, five days later.

Terror was Castro's main tool. The tactics used for enemies of the regime included the exploitation of phobias such as reptiles and rats; the use of drugs so as to have prisoners lose all notion of time and place; blindfolding prisoners, hanging them by their feet, and then lowering them into wells they were told are filled with crocodiles; the use of guard dogs that had their teeth removed and which were set upon prisoners with hands tied behind their backs. Usually, these dogs attacked the genitals first. All of this was investigated and extensively documented by a visiting delegation from the United Nations. The evidence can be found in Geneva.

The legacy of Castro for Cuba will be much like that of Stalin in Russia, Pol Pot and Ieng Sari in Cambodia and Hitler in Germany. It will be the memories of the unknown numbers of victims, of concentration camps, torture, murder, exile, families torn apart, death, tears and blood. Castro will go down in history as one of the cruelest of all dictators -- a man who tormented his own people.

DOJ_NMG_0139683

But his poisonous legacy will also include the double standard by foreign governments, intellectuals and journalists who fought ferociously against the unspeakable violations of human rights by right-wing dictatorships, yet applauded Castro. To this day many of these intellectuals serve as apologists and accomplices in the subjugation of the Cuban people. Rafael Correa, the recently inaugurated president of Ecuador, has declared that in Cuba there is no dictatorship. Evo Morales, president of Bolivia, considers Castro his mentor and has already shown that he is willing to silence his own critics at the point of a gun. Venezuela, once a democracy, is the new Cuba, replete with a growing population of political prisoners.

Castro hemmed and hawed in the early 1960s, concealing his ideological allegiance to the most murderous system of government humanity has ever experienced. Today's Latin American caudillos openly express their allegiance to communist ideals. "I am very much of Trotsky's line -- the permanent revolution," Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez said in January.

If we have learned anything from Fidel Castro, it is that the totalitarian impulse outlives even its most hardened -- and ruinous -- practitioners.

Mr. Valladares, former U.S. ambassador to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, is chairman of the New York-based Human Rights Foundation and author of "Against All Hope: A Memoir of Life in Castro's Gulag" (National Book Network, 2001).

The House's Ottoman Agenda (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

Can a nonbinding congressional resolution really matter? Most are ignored by everyone except the special interests they are usually directed at. Even the House's recent resolution on Iraq was dismissed by both President Bush and Democratic antiwar leader John Murtha. Yet a vote expected next month on a nonbinding House resolution describing a "genocide" in the Ottoman Empire beginning in 1915 has the potential to explode U.S. relations with Turkey, sway the outcome of upcoming Turkish elections and spill over into several other strategic American interests, including Iraq and Iran.

So, yes: The Armenian Genocide Resolution sponsored by Rep. Adam Schiff does matter, logically or not. Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul spent several days in Washington last month lobbying against it, though the Turkish-American agenda is chockablock with seemingly more important issues. Friends of Turkey in Washington, from American Jewish organizations to foreign policy satraps, are working the Hill; so is the Bush team. On the other side is the well-organized and affluent Armenian American community, 1.4 million strong, and some powerful friends -- including the new House speaker, Nancy Pelosi.

Here is a debate that could occur only in Washington -- a bizarre mix of frivolity and moral seriousness, of constituent pandering, far-flung history and front-line foreign policy. And that's just on the American side; in Turkey there is the painful struggle of a deeply nationalist society to come to terms with its past, and in the process become more of the Western democracy it wants to be.

Start with the pandering: Schiff, a Democrat from Los Angeles, cheerfully concedes that there are 70,000 to 80,000 ethnic Armenians in his district, for whom the slaughter of Armenians by the Young Turk regime during World War I is "anything but ancient history." Local politics also explains why a resolution that has failed numerous times in the past 20 years is suddenly looking like a juggernaut: Pelosi, of San Francisco, also has many Armenian supporters.

"There's a sense of momentum now about the resolution that we haven't had before," Schiff told me. "The votes are there in the committee. The votes are there on the floor." If Pelosi allows the resolution to be brought up, as she has reportedly pledged to do, it will probably pass. Its language is almost comically heavy-handed: It begins by declaring that the House "finds" a series of 30 paragraphs of facts about the genocide, ranging from the number killed (1.5 million) to the assertion that "the failure . . . to punish those responsible" helps explain subsequent atrocities, including the Holocaust.

Imagine the 435 members of the House, many of whom still don't know the difference between Iraqi Shiites and Sunnis, solemnly weighing whether Schiff's version of events 92 years ago in northeastern Turkey deserves congressional endorsement. But the consequences of passage could be deadly serious: To begin with, Turkey's powerful military has been hinting that U.S. access to the Incirlik air base, which plays a key role in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, could be restricted. Gul warned that a nationalist tidal wave could sweep Turkey and force the government to downgrade its cooperation with the United States, which needs Turkey's help this year to stabilize Iraq and contain Iran. Candidates in upcoming presidential and parliamentary elections could compete in their anti-American reactions.

No wonder the Bush administration as well as even Democratic-leaning foreign policy experts, such as Clinton-era ambassador Mark Parris, are trying to stop the resolution. Yet theirs, too, is a contorted campaign. After all, historians outside of Turkey are pretty much unanimous in agreeing that atrocities against Armenians worthy of the term genocide did occur. Though Congress may look silly with its "findings," the continuing inability of the Turkish political class to come to terms with history, and temper its nationalism, may be the country's single most serious political problem. Prominent Turkish intellectuals, including a

DOJ_NMG_0139684

Nobel Prize winner, have been prosecuted in recent years under laws criminalizing "insults" to Turkey -- such as accurate accounts of the genocide. In January a prominent ethnic Armenian journalist was murdered by an ultranationalist teenager.

Maybe Congress has no business debating Turkish history, maybe it is doing so for the wrong reasons. Yet if Turkey is to become the stable, Western-oriented democracy that it aspires to be, its politicians will have to learn, at least, to react the way everyone else does to nonbinding House resolutions: that is, with a shrug.

Doctors Without Refuge (WP)

By Leonard S. Rubenstein

The Washington Post, March 5, 2007

In war, health workers are often heroes and often victims. Though the Geneva Conventions are supposed to protect them as they fulfill their ethical duty to provide care to wounded combatants without regard to affiliation -- what is known as medical neutrality -- they frequently become targets by attending to the enemies of one side or another.

The United States has always stood up for the protection of health workers in war, condemning violations of medical neutrality. And until now, it has offered asylum to doctors, nurses and other health workers forced to flee their home countries after they complied with their obligations to treat any and all wounded. But in another instance of the corrosion of human rights that has been the hallmark of this administration since Sept. 11, 2001 -- including torture, secret detention and denial of due process -- the Department of Homeland Security is contesting asylum requests by health workers whose lives are at risk for having provided assistance to wounded members of rebel groups.

The government claims that providing such medical care amounts to prohibited "material support" to terrorists and thus is a basis for denying asylum. Its position is as radical a departure from past practice -- where it protested interference with a physician's duty to treat without political distinction -- as it is chilling. For example, the State Department's human rights report for 1999 condemned the Serbian government of Slobodan Milosevic for having "threatened and intimidated doctors working in the province to prevent them from treating [Kosovo Liberation Army] members."

The reversal is even more dramatically illustrated by the position the U.S. government took regarding a physician caught up in the brutal war in Chechnya. Performing surgery in late 1999 and early 2000 under conditions resembling those of the American Civil War, this doctor adhered to the highest traditions of medicine and medical ethics and saved the lives of civilians, Russian soldiers and Chechen rebels. Because he treated fighters from both sides, though, the physician became a target of Russian forces as well as the rebel groups. The rebels distrusted and threatened him while Russian forces labeled him the "bandit doctor." He was detained overnight and later warned by both Russian and Chechen fighters that he could be arrested and executed.

The doctor escaped and, with the help of the U.S. Embassy, made his way to the United States. When he applied for asylum, his request, as someone persecuted for upholding medical ethics in wartime, was granted in a mere two weeks.

But now the U.S. government is appealing an immigration judge's decision granting asylum to a Nepalese health worker who was twice kidnapped by a Maoist group that wanted him to attend to a wounded rebel. It rejected the asylum claim of a Colombian nurse who was kidnapped by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, assaulted and forced at gunpoint to provide medical care to its members.

These actions are part of a larger and disturbing pattern of denying asylum even for victims of the most horrific human rights violations. A report by Human Rights First last year showed how the Department of Homeland Security's interpretation of the ban on providing "material support" to terrorists has extended to victims of abuse, such as a journalist who gave money to a rebel group after being beaten and a fisherman who was abducted and forced to pay ransom for his release.

The administration's interpretation goes far beyond what the law requires. Indeed, medical care is not even included among the practices Congress listed as amounting to "material support." In response to an outcry about its policy, the administration said it would offer selected waivers from the "material support" exclusion. While providing justice for some, that stance doesn't begin to restore the commitment to refugee protection that has been central to our values and our policies.

Congress must revise the law to protect medical ethics and restore America's commitment to being a place of refuge for those fleeing persecution. This step is also essential to revive principles of medical neutrality. Just as the government diminished itself and U.S. standing by adopting perverse interpretations of law and medical ethics to justify torture and to enlist doctors' help in breaking down detainees, it is undermining America's long and critical support for medical services for the wounded in war.

The writer is executive director of Physicians for Human Rights.

Capital Marketplace (WSJ)

By Charlie Mccreevy

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139685

Are the lights being switched off on Wall Street and lighting up in Frankfurt, Paris and London? Is the water being drained out of the East River and diverted straight into the River Thames?

You might think so judging by recent speeches, reports and articles on America's, and in particular New York's, competitiveness from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson, Mayor Michael Bloomberg, Sen. Chuck Schumer and others.

I don't disagree with them that change is underway. European Union capital market revenues are growing by an impressive 20% a year, compared to only 7% in America. The U.S. share of global IPOs has fallen to 16% last year from 57% in 2001, while Europe's has gone up to 63% from 33% during the same period.

Many seem to see the regulatory burden of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, such as Section 404, as a significant reason for reduced U.S. capital market competitiveness. The detailed requirements for internal control of public companies have turned out to be extremely expensive to implement. Some in London have gone as far as to suggest, tongue-in-cheek, erecting statues for Sarbanes and Oxley. This is silly talk.

For one thing, anything that hurts U.S. capital markets also hurts European companies and our economy. Economic integration runs deep, particularly in financial markets. Companies active on both sides of the Atlantic are also affected by the rules on both sides of the Atlantic. Competitiveness is a two-way street.

We in Europe have improved the competitiveness of our financial markets by integrating, changing our financial regulatory structures, adopting best practice and transparent policy making, and avoiding intervention except when really necessary.

As European commissioner in this area, my approach is simple: We should not and cannot prescribe rules for every conceivable situation. There is a difference between accountancy and rocket science. The latter is science; the former is not and shouldn't be. Regulation must allow and encourage new ideas and innovation. As an accountant by profession, I might be expected to empathize with the urge some regulators seem to have to control every detail. But I think that box-ticking alone doesn't work. We need responsible judgment and disclosure.

This is why I strongly favor a principles-based over a rules-based approach. Eliminating all risk is an illusion and will lead to unwanted consequences: less innovation and growth, a false sense of security, and reduced pressure to behave responsibly. That is why I reject the siren calls for tougher regulation of hedge funds in Europe and why I strongly agree with the recent report of the President's Working Group on this issue. We must not endanger the benefits hedge funds and private equity have brought. They have increased efficiency and liquidity in our capital markets while keeping company managers on their toes. Are the regulatory hawks perhaps trying to protect weak management from shareholder activism?

What the EU and U.S. both need is top-class regulation based on best practice -- sound investor protection, balanced with a good dose of freedom for market participants. But if we want to have competitive and open capital markets in the U.S. and EU, we need to do something else: cooperate. We need to build on the regulatory pillars of the U.S., EU and other mature economies, based on equivalent but not identical standards that work for our investors and our markets.

Over the past few years, I have worked with Christopher Cox, Ben Bernanke, John Snow, Hank Paulson, Mark Olson and others to build this new cooperation. For example, we are moving towards equivalent and comparable accounting standards so that we can avoid costly reconciliation between Europe's International Financial Reporting Standards and the U.S. GAAP. The U.S. also agreed to reduce the regulatory burden of Sarbanes-Oxley by introducing more flexible timelines for the implementation of Section 404 for foreign firms. And we are getting rid of the Hotel California problem on foreign deregistration. Under current SEC rules companies are welcome to enter the U.S. stock market but can (almost) never leave again. Only companies with fewer than 300 U.S. shareholders can deregister. The new SEC proposal would allow those foreign companies to deregister whose U.S. trading volume is less than 5% of the trading volume in their primary market. This would markedly increase the number of EU firms eligible for deregistration and improve the situation.

But we need to do more. And the need to do so is growing every day as trans-Atlantic markets further integrate. So we have to shift up a gear and chart a route to recognize each other's audit oversight bodies, implement the Basel II banking accord in a way that benefits banks and customers on both sides, and move to a risk-based system of reinsurance regulation that benefits homeowners and policyholders alike. I am in Washington and New York this week to promote this agenda.

Transatlantic regulatory cooperation in capital markets should lead from the front. If we can show that it works then Japan, China, India, Russia and others will join us. This would be a big win-win for the global economy -- and guarantee that the boats will keep bobbing in the East River.

Mr. McCreevy is EU commissioner for the internal market and services.

Taking Genocide To Court (NYT)

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

Genocide moves swiftly, kills promiscuously and keeps finding new perpetrators, despite the world's repeated vows of "never again."

DOJ_NMG_0139686

In the face of such rampaging horror, carefully considered court verdicts, like last week's World Court ruling on the 1995 Srebrenica massacre in Bosnia, and patiently assembled dossiers, like the one that International Criminal Court prosecutors have now filed against two accused masterminds of Darfur's ongoing slaughter, seem frustratingly inadequate.

Yet short of the international military interventions that never seem to come in time, the incremental enforcement of international law is one of the most important tools available for establishing accountability and deterring future genocides.

Genocide became an international crime almost 60 years ago. But no country was ever prosecuted for it until Bosnia accused Serbia of direct responsibility for the murder of nearly 8,000 Muslim men and boys in Srebrenica. The World Court, which rules on disputes between nations, concluded that genocide did take place, and that while the Serbian government of that period had not directly ordered the murders, it "could and should" have acted to stop them, as the United Nations Convention on Genocide requires.

That nuanced distinction, based on evidence collected by the special tribunal that tried Slobodan Milosevic, the former Serbian leader, and other individuals accused of Balkan war crimes, spared Serbia from costly financial reparations. But it also established the official complicity of the former Serbian government.

That is something the current Serbian government now needs to acknowledge. Belgrade should also heed the court's formal order to turn over Ratko Mladic, the Bosnian Serb general who directed the Srebrenica genocide.

The Darfur cases are being pursued in the International Criminal Court, which prosecutes individuals for grave violations of international law. The first two suspects sought for trial are Ahmad Harun, formerly Sudan's minister in charge of Darfur security, and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-al-Rahman, a janjaweed militia commander. Mr. Harun is accused of inciting, financing and arming militia fighters to conduct genocidal attacks. Mr. Rahman is charged with directing one such attack that resulted in hundreds of deaths, systematic rapes and summary executions.

Court rulings can never compensate the survivors of these horrors. But by strengthening the reach and authority of international law, these cases should give pause to those tempted to unleash future genocides — and to those who stand by.

Malaria Pills Without Profit (NYT)

The New York Times, March 5, 2007

The big pharmaceutical companies are rightly criticized for concentrating on the development and marketing of drugs that sell for high prices in the industrialized world while neglecting to produce medications that could save millions of lives in the poorest countries. So it came as especially welcome news last week that Paris-based Sanofi-Aventis, the world's fourth-largest drug company, working in collaboration with a nonprofit drug-development organization pioneered by Doctors Without Borders, will soon introduce a cheap and easy-to-use pill to combat malaria in sub-Saharan Africa.

The pill combines two drugs that are already in use into a single medication that can be taken once a day for three days by young children and twice a day for three days by adults to cure the infection.

The course of treatment is notably cheap — less than 50 cents for children and less than $1 for adults. Sanofi will make no profit on sales to public health agencies and international institutions that typically serve poor people. But it will also produce a branded version to be sold in the private markets of developing countries at three or four times the public price.

To its additional credit, the company has agreed not to seek a patent on the one-pill formulation so that generic companies, like those in India, can produce the pills cheaply and add to the quantities of medicine needed to treat many millions of malaria victims around the world.

Now that Sanofi has shown, in the words of one executive, that "we are not nasty people working against poor countries and seeking only profits," let us hope that many other big drug companies feel the same humanitarian impulse.

Brussels Punching Bag (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 5, 2007

Each round of the European Union's battle royal with Microsoft has revealed more about flaws in the bloc's antitrust office than about the stubbornness of the American software giant. Brussels' latest sucker punch is no exception.

Last Thursday, EU antitrust czarina Neelie Kroes threatened to fine Microsoft up to €3 million, or about $4 million, a day because she doesn't like the prices the company wants to charge for licensing its technology. The fines, which would come on top of nearly $1 billion in previous penalties in the three-year-old case, are retroactive to December 2005 and could total as much as $1 billion through last month. Microsoft has four weeks to respond.

The technology in question would allow non-Microsoft servers to work with servers and PCs that run the firm's Windows software. Ms. Kroes claims that "there is no significant innovation" in the programming codes to justify the prices Microsoft has set.

DOJ_NMG_0139687

But exactly how "innovativeness" should be measured in this case is disputed. Microsoft notes that agencies in the U.S. and Europe have granted 36 patents for this technology, with 37 applications still pending. "This seems to be a case of one government agency [patent offices] disagreeing with another government agency [the Commission]," Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith tells us. "The first agency actually has the expertise" to make these judgments, he adds. "The second says, 'We're not going to adhere to what they said.'"

So Brussels no longer acts as merely prosecutor, judge, jury and executioner in antitrust cases; it now claims the power to assess the worth of patents, too. While no doubt the patent systems on both sides of the Atlantic could use some work, that doesn't seem to be the issue here.

The heart of the matter is revealed in Ms. Kroes's observation that other software makers provide comparable interoperability technologies at no cost. EU antitrust officials make no secret of their preference for the open-source business model practiced by the companies behind all the complaints against Microsoft, among them such heavyweights as IBM, Sun Microsystems and Oracle. Many of these firms don't want to pay anything to license Microsoft's technology.

The Commission insists that it isn't asking Microsoft to give away technology that has cost it multiple millions to develop. In practice, though, that seems to be just what Brussels wants. Commission officials are either unwilling or unable to describe exactly what Microsoft would have to do for its technology to be deemed "new" enough. It's the old story of the EU punishing Microsoft for not meeting a standard that was never specified.

If Microsoft's response doesn't satisfy Ms. Kroes, she could level an enormous fine for the second time since last April, when an EU court in Luxembourg heard Microsoft's appeal of the original ruling. The Commission argues that it is well within its rights to enforce its ruling unless it is overturned. And that's true.

But the EU antitrust office has a poor track record with the Luxembourg court: Several high-profile decisions by Ms. Kroes's predecessor, Mario Monti, who issued the original Microsoft ruling in 2004, have been overturned on appeal. So one has to wonder if the Commission is hedging its bets by issuing a series of fines, each of which Microsoft would have to appeal even if it wins the primary case. Perhaps the EU's logic is that if the company wins the primary case on appeal -- a ruling is expected shortly -- it may still be willing to settle the noncompliance fines simply to get the Commission out of its hair. Thus the EU wouldn't come away empty-handed after such an epic fight.

Maybe such thinking is too cynical even for eurocrats. But even if that's not their intent, threatening another multimillion-dollar fine when the appeals court is due to rule soon on the original judgment smacks of spite.

DOJ_NMG_0139688

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, March 5, 2007 8:16 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Sunday, March 04, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070304.pdf; agnb070304.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Terrorist Groups Turn To Internet As Essential Tool 2
Arab Bank May Have Directed Saudi Funds To Palestinian Terror Groups 2
Congress Urged To Reinstate Detainees' Habeas Corpus Protection 3

Homeland Response:

Bush Brings Support And Sympathy To Tornado-Hit Alabama, Georgia 3
Nagin Admits New Orleans "Piled It On" In Assessing Damages 4
WPost Contends CFIUS Discouraging Investment In US 4
Opposition To TSA's "Virtual Strip Search" Noted 4
Editorial Urges Greater Security Protections At Supermax Prison 5

War News:

US Airstrikes Hit Insurgents; Three US Soldiers Killed 5
Changes In Store For Walter Reed As Scrutiny Continues 6
Maliki Promises Cabinet Shuffle, Restructuring This Week 7
Slain Sunnis Had Participated In Reconciliation Conference ..7
Military Faces Growing Numbers Of Bereaved Families 8
Soldier Convicted Of Negligent Homicide 8
Military Medical Teams See Brain Injuries 9
Former Fallujah Warden Remembers Experiences 9
Congress Spurs Debate Over War Authorization Powers 9
US Forces Seek "High-Value" Target In Afghanistan 9
Troops Return To Fort Dix After Year In Afghanistan 10

DOJ:

DOJ Says US Attorneys Were Removed Due To Performance 10

Criminal Law:

Many States Instituting Indefinite Commitment Of Sex Offenders 11
Former Government Witness Emerges From Shadows 11
States Holding Sex Offenders Past Prison Terms 11

Civil Rights:

FBI To Probe North Carolina Civil Rights Cold Cases 12
Fat Tuesday Presidential Primary Questioned 13
Texas Juvenile Justice System Roiled By Probes 13
New York Suburb Will Not Appeal Election Ruling 13

Antitrust:

Blackstone Mulls Chrysler Bid 14
Arizona School District Under E-Rate Probe 14
Sirius CEO Seen As Ultimate Salesman 14

Indian Affairs:

DOJ Grant Will Help Track Tribal Crime 15

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge To Rule On Medical Marijuana Case 15
ATF Helps Iowa Police Tracking Firearms 16
Man Charged After California Police Find Arsenal In Burning House 16

Immigration:

Administration Faces Quandary In Border Agents' Case 16
Colorado Using Inmates To Ease Farm Labor Shortage 17

Tax:

Cost Of AMT Repeal Analyzed 18

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Champion Substantial Expansion Of CHIP Coverage 18
Warhead Plan Provokes Congressional Opposition 19
FDA On Verge Of Approving Antibiotic Despite Mounting Concerns 19
Boxer, Waxman Question Regulator's Ties To Chemical Industry 19
Two New Books Jab At Bush From Different Angles 19
Newsweek Poll Finds Bush Approval At 31%, Cheney At 33% 19

Other News:

Bernanke "Quietly" Making His Presence Felt 19
Newsweek Poll Finds Tight General Election Matchups 20
Romney Wins CPAC Straw Poll, With Giuliani Finishing Second 20
Giuliani Tests Assumptions About His Ability To Win Nomination 21
Romney Defends Judeo-Christian Tradition 21
Hunter Campaign Drops Two South Carolina State Co-Chairmen 21
Thompson Campaigns In Iowa 21
Selma Is Latest Stop In Clinton-Obama Fight For Black Support 21
Obama Addresses Labor Activists In Chicago 23
Richardson Says He Will Work Harder Than Frontrunners To Win 23
Kucinich Lays Out Iraq Withdrawal Plan In New Hampshire . 23
Past GOP House Candidates Call For Changes At NRCC 23
Pioneering Lobbyist Cassidy Profiled 23
Bush's Recent Foreign Policy Shifts Draw Mixed Reaction ... 24
Bush May Encounter "Aura" Of Chavez During Latin America Trip 24
Ahmadinejad, Abdullah Agree To Curb Middle East Violence 24
North Korean Nuclear Inspections Could Test US Claims 25
China Warns Negroponte Against Missile Sales To Taiwan . 25
Anti-Putin Rally In St. Petersburg Ends In Violence, Arrests 26
Pentagon Policy Review Could Remove Balkans' "Combat" Designation 26
Mexican Drug Cartels Shift To Overland Trafficking Routes . 27
Paredes Takes Over Leadership Of Mexico's PRI 27
Sudan's President Refuses To Extradite Accused War Criminals 27
New Indian Child Labor Law Has "Little Effect" On Industry ... 27
British MP Says US-UK Relations Could Rebound After Blair 27
Kristof Lauds US Base In Djibouti For Diplomatic Humanitarian Outreach 28
Authors Attribute Local Climate Changes To Global Trends . 28

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 28

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 29

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terrorist Groups Turn To Internet As Essential Tool. The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 9, 2:45, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "Terrorist groups continue recruiting and are using a new, powerful tool." CBS (Sieberg): "It's chilling to watch: Apparent video of an American helicopter shot down by Iraqi insurgents, seven Marines on board killed. It's been viewed by thousands, all over the world, thanks to the Internet. It's one of hundreds of videos posted by terrorist groups that can be found on popular web sites like YouTube." Paul Kurtz, CBS News terrorism consultant: "It is the 'killer app' for terrorist organizations. It's viral marketing at its best."

Houston Al Qaeda Suspect Tied To Muslim Web Site Designer. The Houston Chronicle (3/4, Crowe, 530K) reports, "Daniel Maldonado, the American accused of training with al-Qaida and waging jihad in Somalia, came to Houston two years ago to work for a 24-year-old Web designer linked to Internet sites frequented by terrorism suspects. That man, Sarfaraz Jamal…is emerging as an unlikely yet intriguing figure in the Maldonado saga. And his story helps explain how Maldonado wound up in Houston, where he now awaits trial. Jamal denies any wrongdoing and the FBI is mum, refusing to say even whether he's under investigation. But Jamal acknowledges a connection to Maldonado, saying in an e-mail to the Houston Chronicle that he had hired him to do odd jobs on the Houston-based IslamicNetwork.com."

Arab Bank May Have Directed Saudi Funds To Palestinian Terror Groups. Under the headline, "Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists," the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Meyer, 850K) reports, "A three-year investigation into the activities of one of the Middle East's largest and most influential banks is producing extensive evidence of how tens of millions of dollars have flowed from wealthy Saudi Arabians to Palestinian groups that allegedly used some of the money to pay off suicide bombers and their survivors." The Justice Department "is conducting a criminal investigation into the New York branch of Arab Bank, which is based in Jordan, and its financial links to organizations and individuals accused of terrorism, according to three former U.S. counter-terrorism officials."

DOJ_NMG_0139691

Congress Urged To Reinstate Detainees' Habeas Corpus Protection. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (3/4, B7, 690K) Alberto J. Mora general counsel of the Navy from 2001 to 2006, and Thomas R. Pickering, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations from 1989 to 1992, note the Military Commissions Act "eliminates the federal courts' ability to hear habeas petitions filed by certain noncitizens detained by the United States at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere. Late last month the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld this provision and dismissed the lawsuits filed by many of the Guantanamo detainees. We fully recognize that our government must have the power to detain suspected foreign terrorists to protect national security. But removing the federal courts' ability to hear habeas corpus claims does not serve that goal. On the contrary, habeas corpus is crucial to ensure that the government's power to detain is exercised wisely, lawfully and consistently with American values. That is why we have joined with the Constitution Project's broad and bipartisan group of judges, former members of Congress, executive branch officials, scholars and others to urge Congress to restore federal court jurisdiction to hear these habeas corpus petitions."

NYTimes Calls On Congress To Reverse Bush's "Lawless" Anti-Terror Measures. The New York Times (3/4, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "The Bush administration's assault on some of the founding principles of American democracy marches onward despite the Democratic victory in the 2006 elections. The new Democratic majorities in Congress can block the sort of noxious measures that the Republican majority rubber-stamped. But preventing new assaults on civil liberties is not nearly enough. … It will require forceful steps by this Congress to undo the damage. A few lawmakers are offering bills intended to do just that, but they are only a start. Taking on this task is a moral imperative that will show the world the United States can be tough on terrorism without sacrificing its humanity and the rule of law. Today we're offering a list — which, sadly, is hardly exhaustive — of things that need to be done to reverse the unwise and lawless policies of President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Many will require a rewrite of the Military Commissions Act of 2006, an atrocious measure pushed through Congress with the help of three Republican senators, Arlen Specter, Lindsey Graham and John McCain."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Brings Support And Sympathy To Tornado-Hit Alabama, Georgia. President Bush's visit to tornado-scarred Alabama and Georgia was the subject of detailed lead reports on all three broadcast networks last night, but print coverage is scant and limited mainly to wire reports. Several stories contrast the quick federal response and the President's immediate attention with Washington's reaction to Hurricane Katrina.

ABC World News (3/3, lead story, 2:40, Weir, 8.78M) said Bush visited "to see the devastation for himself, and offer a shoulder to lean on." ABC (Osunsami): "At Enterprise High School this morning, where a tornado claimed the lives of eight students, the President walked over broken glass and twisted metal remains. He saw for himself what's left of the school's cafeteria. At one point, he passed by the science wing where a number of students took cover and managed to escape." Bush: "One hundred kids got out of here alive. A miracle." Osunsami: "President Bush spent time alone with the families of the children who were killed. He also met with Megan Parks, head of the school's student government association. She explained to him, two of the boys who died were dear friends." Bush: "We can never replace lives and we can't heal hearts except through prayer. And I know, I want the students to know and the families to know, there's a lot of people praying for them." Osunsami: "He shared this same message hours later when he traveled to storm-ravaged neighborhoods in southern Georgia."

The CBS Evening News (3/3, lead story, 3:30, Assuras, 7.66M) reported Bush "got a firsthand look today at the worst of the damage from Thursday's killer tornadoes. In Americus, Georgia, where two people died, the President saw dozens of devastated homes and businesses. Earlier in the day, he was in Enterprise, Alabama, where a high school was directly in the twister's path." CBS (Strassman): "If seeing is believing, then President Bush saw a true disaster here today in Enterprise. He said it looked just as bad in the air as it does here on the ground. … Bush stepped in to a community's sorrow, declared a disaster, and promised Washington will help rebuild it." Bush: "Out of the devastation can come hope and a better tomorrow." Strassman: "Many students are as torn apart as their school. … But in Enterprise, nobody is sitting around waiting for the federal government to come in and help. They're helping each other and they're helping themselves. This is about neighbor helping neighbor, even in many instances when the neighbors have never met before."

DOJ_NMG_0139692

NBC Nightly News (3/3, lead story, 2:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush made his way through Alabama and Georgia today to offer comfort and support to communities devastated by this week's tornados. Twenty people died when the severe weather ripped across the south. The President promised quick assistance from the federal government." NBC (Sanders): "The President met with several students here and told them he believes the strength of the community will hold them together and he promised they are not alone. Today President Bush stood where high school students huddled when a tornado struck their school Thursday walking over textbooks, desks, past collapsed walls. He promised the federal government will help." Bush: "We can rebuild buildings. The fundamental question is, will the spirit stay strong in Enterprise, Alabama. I predict it will be strengthened." Sanders: "President Bush visited Americus, Georgia, today, surprising victims on the street where another tornado killed two victims. Today's visit through the south a marked difference to the President's response to hurricane Katrina, staying clear of New Orleans. Also different: federal aid arriving immediately. Today FEMA-supplied blue tarps went up on the roofs."

The Washington Post/AP (3/4, A12, Riechmann) reports Bush "handed out hugs Saturday to people in the South who survived killer tornadoes, and he mourned those who died in the storms, including eight high school students. 'Out of this rubble will emerge a better tomorrow,' Bush said. … 'Today I have walked through devastation that is hard to describe,' he said, standing with students, one of whom had a tear running down her face. 'A hundred kids got out of here alive, which is a miracle.'" The trip, "quickly put together Friday, was intended to highlight the Bush administration's stepped-up efforts, through the Federal Emergency Management Agency in particular, to help disaster victims." FEMA Administrator R. David Paulison "was on the telephone with state emergency officials hours after the storms hit." This AP story appeared in various forms in well over 200 newspapers or news Web sites.

The New York Times (3/4, A24, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports Bush "picked his way through the rubble of the tornado-stricken South on Saturday, promising federal aid for some Alabamians and turning up unexpectedly in a largely African-American neighborhood here in Georgia, where startled residents rushed out of their damaged houses, cell phone cameras in hand, to greet him. The hastily arranged trip...was intended to send an image of a compassionate president leading a competent government response, in sharp contrast with the lingering images of federal indifference and ineptitude after Hurricane Katrina."

CNN.com (3/3) reports Bush "implored Americans to help out any way they can. 'Some people are going to need your help,' he said. 'I would ask you out of the generosity of your heart to help the folks down here.'" Paulison "said Bush's visit was indicative of 'the new FEMA.'"

Nagin Admits New Orleans "Piled It On" In Assessing Damages. The AP (3/3) reports, "Only $1 billion of the $77 billion the city is seeking from the Army Corps of Engineers is for infrastructure damages it says it suffered because of levee breaches during Hurricane Katrina. The rest is for such things as the city's tarnished image and tourist industry losses. The city 'looked at everything and just kind of piled it on,' Mayor Ray Nagin said. 'We got some advice from some attorneys to be aggressive with the number, and we'll see what happens,' he said."

WPost Contends CFIUS Discouraging Investment In US. The Washington Post (3/4, B6, 690K) editorializes that "since the hysteria of a year ago over Dubai Ports World proposing to manage some U.S. seaports, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), the federal panel responsible for ensuring that national security interests are not harmed by foreign acquisition of U.S. assets, seems to have slid in the opposite direction. A recent study by David Marchick, a former Clinton State Department official, concluded that the CFIUS approval process has become overly difficult and increasingly uncertain, making it riskier for non-Americans to invest in the country. … Enter the House of Representatives, which unanimously passed a bill Wednesday designed to revamp the CFIUS approval process. By making the committee's procedures explicit in statute, the bill would usefully allow foreign investors to plan with some assurance."

Opposition To TSA's "Virtual Strip Search" Noted. In a column for the Washington Post (3/4, B2, 690K) Slate's William Saletan writes, "Last week, TSA began using backscatters to screen airline passengers for weapons. The first machine is up and running in Phoenix. The next ones will be in New York and Los Angeles. The machines have been modified with a 'privacy algorithm' to clean up what they show. But even the more cartoon-like images they now display tell you more than you need to know about the people seated next to you. … The American Civil Liberties Union and the Electronic Privacy Information Center have fought backscatters, calling them a 'virtual strip search.' But the purpose of a strip search is the search. Stripping is just a means. Virtual inspections achieve the same end by other means. They don't extend the practice of strip-searching. They abolish it."

DOJ_NMG_0139693

Editorial Urges Greater Security Protections At Supermax Prison. The Canon City Daily Record (3/4) editorializes, "When federal and state bigwigs toured Florence's Supermax prison Feb. 22, officials came away with different views on the safety of the facility. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was assertive as he said the United States Penitentiary Administrative Maximum Security prison, which houses many high-profile terrorists, was being well guarded and mail was being properly monitored. … 'I am confident we are doing what we should be doing, monitoring communications in and out of the facility,' he said." The Record adds, "Not everyone is brimming with Gonzales' confidence. And how much weight that opinion carries should be questioned after just one visit by the Attorney General. … John Gage, President of the American Federation of Government Employees also toured the Florence prison and as expected feels more should be done. Gage represents 600,000 federal union workers across the country, including Bureau of Prisons employees. … Supermax has 208 employees, short of the 240 it had when the prison opened in 1994. Nationwide, the Bureau of Prisons has pledged to reduce its 35,000-strong workforce by 3,118 correction officers. That's cause for concern for not only the Florence prison but other high-profile correction facilities across the United States." The Record notes, "In the absence of more guards, technology is being touted as a sufficient replacement. Bureau Director Harley Lappin said the addition of a number of cameras around the complex have created a safer environment. … But Gage and some others aren't buying that argument. … While Gonzales' tour may not have answered concerns by critics, it certainly has brought more attention to the prison. Officials should continue to monitor security concerns as an obligation to the men and women who work at the prison and the surrounding communities. … An approach that includes continual monitoring of security conditions makes more sense than waiting for a tragic incident to occur, especially one that could have been prevented."

WAR NEWS:

US Airstrikes Hit Insurgents; Three US Soldiers Killed. ABC World News (3/3, story 4, :15, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "US forces say militant bases with links to Al Qaeda were the targets of air strikes and ground raids. In Baghdad, three soldiers were killed on patrol when a roadside bomb exploded next to their vehicle."

CBS Evening News (3/3, story 3, :20, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "In the battle for Iraq, three US soldiers were killed today in central Baghdad. A roadside bomb exploded near their vehicle while they were on patrol." NBC Nightly News (3/3, story 3, 3:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq today word that three more American soldiers were killed in central Baghdad when a bomb exploded next to their vehicle."

The Washington Post (3/4, A16, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "Several al-Qaeda in Iraq insurgents who had targeted U.S. helicopters were killed in an airstrike north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said Saturday. A second strike killed members of another al-Qaeda cell that has orchestrated car bombings. Meanwhile, three U.S. soldiers on patrol in central Baghdad were killed by a roadside bomb, the military said. The first air assault, near Taji, north of Baghdad, destroyed trucks mounted with antiaircraft guns in an area where several American helicopters have been shot down in recent weeks."

The New York Times (3/4, A10, Cave, 1.16M) reports, "The United States military said Saturday that an airstrike north of Baghdad had killed several insurgents with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who were using heavy artillery and machine guns to fire at American helicopters." US spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver "said the strike did not appear to eliminate the threat to American aircraft because other weapons had been used against helicopters in Falluja and other parts of the country."

British Trace Missile Used Against Helicopter To Iran. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (3/4, Rayment) reports, "A missile that brought down a Royal Air Force Lynx helicopter and killed five British service members was smuggled into Iraq by Iranian agents, an official inquiry into the attack will reveal. The Sunday Telegraph has learned that a British Army Board of Inquiry (BOI) into the events surrounding the May attack will state that the weapon, a shoulder-launched surface-to-air missile known as an SA14 Strella, came from Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0139694

Security Plan Irks Sadr City Locals. McClatchy (3/4, Sly) says the US military "has reached an agreement with representatives of the Shiite community in Baghdad's Sadr City enclave that will allow American forces to maintain a permanent presence in the militia stronghold for the first time since 2004, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saturday." But as the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Susman, Salman, 850K) reports, "mixed signals" from Moqtada al-Sadr and Mahdi Army leaders "reflect the delicate situation U.S. and Iraqi officials face as they prepare to bring their security crackdown, seen as a last-ditch effort to quell Baghdad's sectarian warfare, to al-Sadr's stronghold. On the one hand, residents there crave safety and protection from attacks by Sunni Arab insurgents. On the other hand, most are ideologically opposed to what they consider foreign invaders and say al-Sadr's own al-Mahdi Army militia and Iraq's Shiite-led security forces should oversee security."

Weapons From Iran-Iraq War Said To Fuel Violence. A separate AP (3/3, Frayer) report focuses on the continuing role of Iran-Iraq War weaponry on violence in Iraq. "Attention has been focused on the porous, 900-mile border because U.S. military officials allege that Iranian weapons, including advanced roadside bombs, are being smuggled to Shiite extremists." However, "despite the recent spotlight on Iran, U.S. officials say the majority of weapons used by Sunni and Shiite extremists have been in this country for years and were looted from Iraqi military arsenals after" April 2003.

Aid Groups Leaving Iraq As Violence Worsens. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Susman, 850K) reports, "Eventually, for the U.S. nonprofit organization training Iraqi healthcare workers, the risks outweighed the returns. Iraqis couldn't come to them. Americans couldn't go to the Iraqis. So to avoid working in Baghdad, RTI International moved classes to Jordan and Egypt, flying trainees back and forth. ... Most groups pulled out after the 2003 bombing of the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad. Fewer than 10 remain, a minuscule number given the level of need, say those in the aid community. And there are concerns that the number could shrink further after the killing in January of an American woman working for the National Democratic Institute."

Hoagland Says Desperation Helps US Narrow Strategy Options. In the Washington Post (3/4, B7, 690K), columnist Jim Hoagland writes, "The Bush administration is tossing babies off the Iraq sled as the wolves of disintegration creep closer. ... And so it should. Desperation is the right conclusion to reach, and to communicate, to an Iraq that totters on the edge of extinction as a nation-state. ... The sense that even President Bush will be eyeing the exit if Iraq's chaos worsens has spurred Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take serious steps -- at long last -- to encourage Iraqis to look for compromise ... The sobering effect that these steps are having may turn out to be more important than the immediate practical outcomes of the overlapping and in places contradictory initiatives that the administration has recently unveiled."

Changes In Store For Walter Reed As Scrutiny Continues. All three broadcast networks reported on the unfolding Walter Reed Army Medical Center story, with reports portraying Defense Secretary Robert Gates, and his quick reaction to the scandal, favorably. Several stories add that congressional hearings on the problems at Walter Reed begin Monday.

ABC World News (3/3, story 6, 3:00, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "Careers are coming to an abrupt end off revelations of shabby conditions and slow treatment for wounded vets" at Walter Reed. ABC (Hendren): "Today, President Bush announced an investigation into the entire military medical system." Bush: "This review will examine their treatment from the time they leave the battlefield through their return to civilian life as veterans." Paul Rieckhoff, Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America: "Walter Reed is really just the tip of iceberg. And the VA Is chronically under-resourced and under-funded. They are just not ready to receive the over one million veterans who have been through Iraq and Afghanistan." Hendren: "In August, the VA's own inspector general listed 119 hospitals where improvements were needed. Among the problems, access to post-traumatic stress treatment." VA Secretary James Nicholson: "I'm committed to assuring and proving to America's veterans that even in a system that now has over one million patient visits a week that one failure is unacceptable."

The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 4, 2:05, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The scandal over the substandard care and poor living conditions for veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center continues to shake the Bush Administration and the military establishment. But swift, sure reaction by the new defense secretary has signaled new and different leadership at the Pentagon." CBS (Chen): "In an unusually blunt and swift, by Washington standards, reaction, Defense Secretary Robert Gates ousted Army chief Frances Harvey over Harvey's handling of a spiraling scandal at the nation's premier military hospital." Michael O'Hanlon, Brookings Institution: "He wanted to send a message early that this was a different kind of leadership and a different kind of accountability." Chen: "In less than three months on the job Gates' hands-on, no-holds Texas-style has quickly come into play. Jetting off to see the troops on the ground as soon as he was sworn in, and in contrast to the distance reporters had with former Pentagon boss Donald Rumsfeld, setting up a new relationship with the press."

DOJ_NMG_0139695

NBC Nightly News (3/3, story 2, 2:15, Yang, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush spent much of the day dealing with tornado damage in the South. He was also dealing with political damage here in Washington. The conditions for wounds soldiers at the Army's premier hospital drew the first public comments from President Bush today." Bush: "It's unacceptable to me, to our country and it is not going to continue." Yang: "Mr. Bush announced a bipartisan committee to review military medical care. … Gates has moved aggressively firing the commander of Walter Reed and just yesterday the Army secretary." Yang: "The Administration is desperate to defuse angry veteran groups. They say the Pentagon's health care system can't cope with the large number of wounded. … On Capitol Hill it is providing more ammunition to those already opposed to the war." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "I think America should look at what happened in Walter Reed with shame and sorrow." Yang: "President Bush can expect more rhetoric like that next week when Walter Reed is the focus of two Congressional hearings."

The Washington Post (3/4, A4, White, Vogel, 690K) reports, "Army officials plan to revise the command structure at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, installing a nonmedical general officer as deputy commander to ensure that administrative operations run smoothly, in the wake of reports of serious problems with outpatient care at the facility, officials said yesterday. A one-star general -- who has not yet been identified -- will work with Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, a physician who was named on Friday to head Walter Reed, according to two defense officials." Congressional hearings on Walter Reed "are scheduled to begin tomorrow. Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army's surgeon general, is expected to face tough questioning about the facility."

Maliki Promises Cabinet Shuffle, Restructuring This Week. The AP (3/4, Reid, Abdul-Zahra) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "said Saturday he will reshuffle his Cabinet within two weeks and pursue criminal charges against political figures linked to extremists as a sign of his government's resolve to restore stability during the U.S.-led security crackdown in Baghdad." He "did not say how many Cabinet members would be replaced. But some officials said about nine would lose their jobs, including all six Cabinet members loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an al-Maliki ally." The AP says Maliki "has been under pressure from the U.S. to bring order into his factious government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds since it took office last May. Rumors of Cabinet changes have surfaced before, only to disappear because of pressure from coalition members seeking to keep power." Also in the interview, Maliki "said he was encouraged by Iraqi public response to the new Baghdad security operation — which has led to a sharp drop in violence in the capital. He also defended his government, saying it managed to 'achieve a lot of harmony and stability' despite attacks by al-Qaida and Saddam Hussein loyalists."

The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 3, :20, Assuras, 7.66M) reported Maliki "said he will announce a cabinet shuffle within days."

Slain Sunnis Had Participated In Reconciliation Conference. The Washington Times/AP (3/4, A1, Murphy) reports, "Gunmen rounded up two Sunni families who had received death threats for joining U.S.-organized talks with local Shi'ites, hauling away the men and boys and killing all six yesterday in a campaign by suspected Sunni insurgents to keep opponents from cooperating with Iraq's government." Another AP (3/3, Murphy) article reports the slayings, saying that on the video of the troops' murder, "Male voices chant repeatedly in Arabic during the video: 'At your service, sister' - a likely reference to the revenge for the allegedly raped Sunni woman."

The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Susman, Salman, 850K) also reports the slayings of the family members and policemen. The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 3, :20, Assuras, 7.66M) reported the family members' slayings in a single sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0139696

Once-Strong Shiite-Sunni Interpersonal Bonds Said To Fray. Both the New York Times (3/4, Cave, 1.16M) and the Washington Post (3/4, A16, Raghavan, 690K) run lengthy stories today on the increasing difficulties of Shiite-Sunni cooperation in daily life. The Times reports, "After centuries full of vibrant interaction, of marrying, sharing and selling across sects and classes, Baghdad has become a capital of corrosive and violent borderlines. Streets never crossed. Conversations never started. Doors never entered. Sunnis and Shiites in many professions now interact almost exclusively with colleagues of the same sect." The Post focuses its coverage on cross-sectarian marriages, noting, "As U.S. and Iraqi forces attempt to pacify the capital, mixed couples who symbolize Iraq's once famous tolerance are increasingly entangled by hate. Forced by militias or insurgents to leave their homes because one partner is from the wrong sect, they find few havens because of the other partner's affiliation. These strains, fueled by displacement, separation and fear, are beginning to tear apart such families, weakening bonds that for many Iraqis hold the hope of sectarian reconciliation."

Iraqis Resort To Dating Online. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Young Iraqis, trapped in their homes in the mean streets of this bloodstained capital, are increasingly turning to the Internet to chat with relatives, hang out with friends and search for love."

Feldman Says US Must Choose Sectarian Allies On "Case-By-Case Basis." In the New York Times Magazine (3/4), Noah Feldman writes, "As the Sunni-Shiite conflict in Iraq polarizes Muslims across the globe, the United States finds itself in the odd position of seeming to favor a Shiite government in Iraq and Sunni leaders everywhere else. ... For the United States to defuse anti-American Islamism, it must be willing to embrace moderates and democrats of all stripes, Sunni or Shiite. From a strategic standpoint, it would also be an error to communicate to Muslims worldwide that the United States supports either Sunnis or Shiites as such. ... So choosing our friends on a case-by-case basis is both morally better and practically wiser."

Military Faces Growing Numbers Of Bereaved Families. The AP (3/4, Crary) reports from Fort Hood, "A few blocks away is a more poignant symbol: an office building recently converted into a first-of-its-kind support center for women and children whose husbands and fathers have died in Iraq and Afghanistan. From Fort Hood alone, the toll has passed 365. ... Of the 3,350 Americans who died in Iraq and Afghanistan through early January, 1,586 of them -- 47.3 percent -- were married. Those fallen warriors left behind 1,954 children, according to the Pentagon's Manpower Data Center. More recent deaths have pushed that figure past 2,000. ... the new generation of bereaved spouses has been vocal ... in pressing for more compassionate, effective support." The result of their pressure "has been numerous policy changes, ranging from improved benefits to better training for the officers who break the grim news of war-zone deaths."

Small-Town 18-Year-Old Joins Army. In a front-page article, the New York Times (3/4, A1, Barry, 1.16M) reports from Needles, Calif., "It is time. The fresh young soldier has a plane to catch. ... The uniform has a name patch, KANE, for Pvt. Resha Kane. Eighteen years old and five feet tall. Of Needles High School, Class of 2006, and, lately, of the United States Army, Fourth Infantry Division." Accompanied by supportive local motorcyclists, "riding in the midst of this caravan of protection and respect, she is bound for Fort Hood in Texas to await deployment — probably to Iraq, she says."

Marine Cross Winner Battles Survivor's Guilt, PTSD. The Washington Post (3/4, D1, Carlson, 690K) reports on Marine and Navy Cross winner Jeremiah Workman, "When the narrator finished reading the story of Workman's 'extraordinary heroism' in Iraq, Brig. Gen. Richard T. Tryon pinned the Navy Cross to Workman's chest ... It was a moment of well-deserved triumph, but it didn't make Workman feel any better." After returning from combat in Fallujah, Workman says, "I would dream this: a staircase, never ending. And I'm running back and forth, being chased by insurgents, and they're throwing grenades at me." A diagnosed PTSD sufferer, Workman "was transferred to Quantico and stationed at the new National Museum of the Marine Corps. He walks around in his uniform, talking to tourists, sometimes posing for pictures with the ones who recognize the importance of the Navy Cross ribbon on his chest." He still "wants to go back to Iraq," saying, "A lot of my friends have been there three or four times. I think if I got one more tour over there, I'd feel better in the heart."

Soldier Convicted Of Negligent Homicide. The AP (3/3) reports, "An Arkansas soldier has been convicted of negligent homicide for the shooting death of a fellow guardsman in Iraq." Spc. Daniel Turner "was convicted Monday in Baghdad and sentenced to 15 years in a military prison." The circumstances surrounding Derek Plowman's death "have not been released by the military. The Defense Department did not immediately return a message seeking comment Saturday."

DOJ_NMG_0139697

Military Medical Teams See Brain Injuries. NBC Nightly News (3/3, story 3, 3:00, Bazell, 9.87M) reported, "At the combat hospitals in Iraq, the vast majority of the injuries are from roadside bombs." Unidentified doctor: "Injury to his right head." Bazell: "Many experts worry about long-term brain damage from exposure to so many explosions. The chief army surgical advisor for the Iraqi theatre says the military worries too." Dr. Philip Quanka: "They can do all of the basic things but they have subtle neurological signs that are difficult to tell if it is just fatigue or headache like you or I may have." Bazell: "For now the military has no sense how wide the problem may be."

Former Fallujah Warden Remembers Experiences. In the Los Angeles Times (3/4, 850K), Mike Carlson, the "officer in charge of the Camp Fallouja Regional Detention Facility from March 2006 to October," gives 12 suggestions on how to cope with "taking charge of a detention center in Iraq." Carlson estimates, "One-third are innocents caught up in sweeps; one-third are jihadists who will slit your throat, and one-third are opportunists who will rat out their neighbors." After leaving Iraq, "You will turn off the TV and sit in the dark and feel your eyes water as you think about how you took 55 Marines and sailors into a combat zone and brought all 55 back home, and that no one in America besides you and those 55 really cares or understands what you went through. You processed 1,230 detainees, without a single incident of abuse, while America sat on the couch and watched girls go wild."

Congress Spurs Debate Over War Authorization Powers. In the New York Times (3/4, WK1, 1.16M), law professor Jeff Rosen writes that current Democratic proposals "raise serious constitutional questions that could affect not only the conduct of the Iraq war, but also the balance of power between Congress and the president in wartime." However, two scholars conclude that "a constitutional crisis may not be the inevitable outcome," with NYU law professor Samuel Issacharoff saying, "I think this will be resolved politically, as it has been in the past, and either the president or Congress will back down." Harvard Law School's Jack Goldsmith says, "Congress will be much more careful in the future about authorizing force without restrictions on presidential power."

Antiwar Caucus Strives To Be Heard. The New York Times (3/4, A23, Luo, 1.16M) reports on the "Out of Iraq Congressional Caucus," "Now, with a change in power in Congress and a new military strategy to increase the number of American troops in Iraq, the members of the group — most of them liberals — are suddenly much in demand, finding themselves at the center of the debate over the war. Yet even with a majority of Americans opposing the war, the caucus is struggling to overcome its fringe image and is becoming increasingly frustrated by what its members say is the Democratic leadership's unwillingness to heed their calls for decisive action to the end the war. ... They reflect the broader struggle among Democrats in Congress, who have been unable to coalesce around a single position on how strongly to confront President Bush over the war."

US Forces Seek "High-Value" Target In Afghanistan. ABC World News (3/3, story 3, 2:10, Weir, 8.78M) reported "out of Afghanistan" that "US forces were involved in an assault aimed at senior leaders of Al Qaeda. The operation is in a very remote area and details are still rough." ABC (Karl): "Our sources in Afghanistan tell us there's a major military operation going on in Kunar province; this is a remote lawless area that borders Pakistan, local sources tell us the operation, is aimed at a high-value Al Qaeda target. ... But we've been down this road before. We've seen false alarms. ... [US officials] hope on both sides of the border to go after top Taliban and Al Qaeda leaders."

Pakistan Denies US Has Authority To Target Militants On Its Territory. The AP (3/3) reports, "Pakistan vehemently denied Saturday the U.S. military's claim that coalition forces in Afghanistan have the authority to pursue Taliban fleeing across the border into Pakistani territory." Representatives of the Pakistani army and Foreign Ministry both rejected the claim: "Aslam's and Arshad's comments came two days after [Lt. Gen. Douglas] Lute told the Senate Armed Services Committee in Washington that 'we have all the authorities we need to pursue, either with (artillery) fire or on the ground, across the border.'" Pakistanis have "arrested at least 700 al-Qaida and Taliban" since 9/11, "But there is growing international pressure on Pakistan to crack down further on Taliban militants on its side of the border, a message delivered on Monday by Vice President Dick Cheney during a visit to Islamabad."

DOJ_NMG_0139698

Troops Return To Fort Dix After Year In Afghanistan. The New York Times (3/4, Fahim, 1.16M) reports, "Then slowly, the painting dropped to the ground, and mother and daughter stood quietly, amid the whirl of tearful, laughing, shouting soldiers who had returned to New Jersey after more than a year in Afghanistan. ... Specialist Siverio was among 80 soldiers from the 50th Personnel Services Battalion, based in Lawrenceville, who arrived at Fort Dix on Friday. Many of the returning soldiers were leaving the Guard. Others remained on active duty, and some re-enlisted. In Afghanistan, they had mostly engaged the enemy of paperwork, functioning as a human resources and postal division ... None were killed, and none were seriously injured." However, "many of them were at Bagram Air Base on Tuesday" when a suicide bomber attacked during Vice President Cheney's visit.

DOJ:

DOJ Says US Attorneys Were Removed Due To Performance. The New York Times (3/4, Johnston, Lipton, Yardley, 1.16M), in a front-page article, reports that the "ouster" of eight US attorneys "has set off a furor in Washington that took the Bush administration by surprise. Summoning five of the dismissed prosecutors for hearings on Tuesday, the newly empowered Congressional Democrats have charged that the mass firing is a political purge, intended to squelch corruption investigations or install less independent-minded successors." Several prosecutors "believe they were forced out for replacements who could gild résumés," while others "may have been vulnerable because they had had run-ins with the Justice Department." Justice Department officials "deny that the dismissals were politically motivated or that the action resulted from White House pressure." DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said, "These decisions were based on the individual concerns about each U.S. attorney's overall performance."

More Commentary. In a column for the Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/4), John L. Smith writes, "How quickly they forget. … On a rainy Tuesday morning in August 2003, Attorney General John Ashcroft came to the Lloyd D. George U.S. Courthouse to address members of the U.S. attorney's office on the importance of teamwork in implementing the USA Patriot Act." Smith continues, "At Ashcroft's side that day was his loyal soldier in the war on terrorism, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden. A career federal prosecutor, Bogden was so square he squeaked. Despite the numerous constitutional concerns over the Patriot Act's use, in a post-9/11 world Ashcroft received rousing support from his troops in the Southern Nevada office. … 'You are the doers,' Ashcroft said. 'You are the achievers. You are the soldiers ... on the ground and in the trenches ... who put your lives on the line to defend life and liberty. Your spirit is the heroic spirit we saw on September 11th, when New York's finest and New York's bravest ran up the stairs of the World Trade Center while others were running down the stairs.' … Bogden appeared so devoted to the prevailing cause, in fact, that civil libertarians questioned his office's use of the Patriot Act to retrieve bank documents in the FBI's public corruption investigation of members of the Clark County Commission. It was believed then to be an unprecedented use of an act touted as essential to fighting the war on terrorism. … Ridiculed by some, Bogden took one for the team as his office moved methodically, if not always successfully, to prosecute corrupt politicians, warring bikers, drug traffickers, topless bar wiseguys and criminals of every stripe." Smith notes, "During his five-year tenure, which ended last week after his unceremonious sacking by the Department of Justice, some colleagues questioned his decisions, but no one questioned his competence. He was a professional, a public servant in the best sense of the words. … Now the 51-year-old Bogden is one of a half dozen terminated U.S. attorneys from around the West in what stacks up as a nakedly political and brazenly hypocritical move by the Bush administration and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. What some critics recently called a glorified attempt at GOP résumé-building by the administration has backfired into one of the most embarrassing moments in recent Department of Justice history." Smith concludes, "On that August morning in 2003, Ashcroft invoked dramatic images of Sept. 11 and said, 'It has transformed the mission of the Justice Department.' … Was this what he had in mind? … The terminations also make a liar out of Gonzales when he talks about how 'our commitment to the rule of law allows ordinary citizens to rely on and expect ... honesty of government officials.' … What could be less honest than playing politics with top federal prosecutors?"

DOJ_NMG_0139699

CRIMINAL LAW:

Many States Instituting Indefinite Commitment Of Sex Offenders. The New York Times (3/4, Davey, Goodnough, 1.16M), in a front-page article, reports, "The decision by New York to confine sex offenders beyond their prison terms places the state at the forefront of a growing national movement that is popular with politicians and voters. But such programs have almost never met a stated purpose of treating the worst criminals until they no longer pose a threat." Gov. Eliot Spitzer "suggested that New York's proposed civil commitment law would 'become a national model' and go well beyond confining the most violent predators to also include mental health treatment and intensive supervised release for offenders. … But in state after state, such expectations have fallen short." While the US Supreme Court "has upheld the constitutionality of the laws in part because their aim is to furnish treatment if possible, not punish someone twice for the same crime," only a "small fraction of committed offenders have ever completed treatment to the point where they could be released free and clear."

Former Government Witness Emerges From Shadows. The New York Times (3/4, Roberts) reports, "The 74-year-old man who used to be Leroy Nicholas Barnes, owner of 60 pairs of custom-made shoes, 27 full-length leather coats and more than one Mercedes-Benz, wears baggy Lee dungarees these days and drives to work in a used car he bought five years ago. … With his slight limp and mostly bald pate, he seems the antithesis of his former persona as Mr. Untouchable, the dashing Harlem heroin dealer who posed 30 years ago on a magazine cover in a blue denim suit and a red, white and blue tie." The Times continues, "Mr. Barnes's posture of smug invulnerability so affronted President Jimmy Carter that he ordered his attorney general to, as they say, prosecute Mr. Barnes to the fullest extent of the law. … The Justice Department did just that. And in 1977, Mr. Barnes — a former addict with a junior high education who made a fortune flooding black neighborhoods with heroin and swaggered around as an invincible outlaw — was sentenced to life in prison without parole. … 'He was the No. 1; he had charisma,' said Sterling Johnson Jr., a federal judge and former special narcotics prosecutor in New York City. 'Have you been in the presence of Bill Clinton when he walks down the street? That was Nicky Barnes.'" The Times adds, "While Mr. Barnes, widely known as Nicky, languished behind bars, though, his former cronies, his wife and his girlfriends began cavorting, he said, squandering the criminal enterprise that had made them all millionaires. So much for honor among thieves. Mr. Barnes felt betrayed. … 'They had a sleeping lion, a caged lion,' he recalled, 'and they woke him up.' And so Mr. Barnes roared, so ferocious a government witness that scores of drug dealers were convicted. He was released into the federal witness protection program in 1998. … And then he disappeared." The Times notes, "Years ago, a former associate predicted how difficult it would be for Mr. Barnes to adjust to a life of anonymity if he ever turned informer and was granted a fresh identity. … For nearly a decade, though, Mr. Barnes says, he has managed to seamlessly insinuate himself into mainstream America, this time untouchable by those he incriminated and the friends and families of foes he murdered. … Last weekend, though, Mr. Barnes surfaced briefly, and pseudonymously, to promote a new book about his old life in the feral 1970s, 'Mr. Untouchable,' written with Tom Folsom. This summer, he will appear in a documentary with the same name and later this year a movie, 'American Gangster,' is to be released. It stars Cuba Gooding Jr. as Mr. Barnes, but, to his exasperation, focuses on his chief rival in Harlem's heroin trade, Frank Lucas."

States Holding Sex Offenders Past Prison Terms. The New York Times (3/4, A1, Davey, Goodnough) reports, "The decision by New York to confine sex offenders beyond their prison terms places the state at the forefront of a growing national movement that is popular with politicians and voters. But such programs have almost never met a stated purpose of treating the worst criminals until they no longer pose a threat." The Times continues, "About 2,700 pedophiles, rapists and other sexual offenders are already being held indefinitely, mostly in special treatment centers, under so-called civil commitment programs in 19 states, which on average cost taxpayers four times more than keeping the offenders in prison. … In announcing a deal with legislative leaders on Thursday, Gov. Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, suggested that New York's proposed civil commitment law would 'become a national model' and go well beyond confining the most violent predators to also include mental health treatment and intensive supervised release for offenders. … 'No one has a bill like this, nobody,' said State Senator Dale M. Volker, a Republican from western New York and a leading proponent in the Legislature of civil confinement. … But in state after state, such expectations have fallen short. The United States Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of the laws in part because their aim is to furnish treatment if possible, not punish someone twice for the same crime. Yet only a small fraction of committed offenders have ever completed treatment to the point where they could be released free and clear." The Times notes, "Leroy Hendricks, a convicted child molester in Kansas, finished his prison term 13 years ago, but he remains locked up at a cost to taxpayers in that state of $185,000 a year — more than eight times the cost of keeping someone in prison there. … Mr. Hendricks, who is 72 and unsuccessfully challenged his confinement in the Supreme Court, spends most days in a wheelchair or leaning on a cane, because of diabetes, circulation ailments and the effects of a stroke. He may not live long enough to 'graduate' from treatment. … Few ever make such progress: Nationwide, of the 250 offenders released unconditionally since the first law was passed in 1990, about half of them were let go on legal or technical grounds unrelated to treatment. … Still, political leaders, like those in New York, are vastly expanding such programs to keep large numbers of rapists and pedophiles off the streets after their prison terms in a response to public fury over grisly sex crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0139700

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI To Probe North Carolina Civil Rights Cold Cases. The Raleigh News & Observer (3/4, Locke) reports, "Federal Bureau of Investigation agents received a tall order last week when they were asked to take a close look at the deaths of three North Carolina men a half century ago." The N&O continues, "The names of three men who died during the height of the civil rights era landed on the desks of field agents in Charlotte last week as federal Justice Department officials promised to crack open a batch of cold cases flagged by the Southern Poverty Law Center in Alabama. … The center has collected information since the late 1980s on what it feared were 'racially motivated' homicides that were never resolved, said Andrew Blejwas, the center's communications coordinator." The N&O adds, "Ken Lucas, spokesman for the FBI in Charlotte, said agents will scratch at the three cases, hoping to turn up evidence that allows them to prosecute after these many years. It's not clear how much the cases were investigated at the time, if at all. … In Shelby, many older black residents still remember Dr. George Singleton, who was killed in an explosion and fire in his office in 1957. … Details are skimpy for the other two cases. Both men -- William Dallas Owens of New Bern and Clarence Cloninger of Gaston, outside Roanoke Rapids -- died while in jail. … Owens, a disabled World War II veteran, died in jail after being arrested by New Bern police for being drunk. Details in his published obituary suggest Owens was white. His Army unit had not been integrated during World War II. The church and funeral home that handled his burial is traditionally white. … The Southern Poverty Law Center and FBI officials were not aware of Owens' race when he was added to the list. … They will take a look at his case anyway, Lucas said. Federal civil rights laws protect against abuses in local jails and prisons. Plus, it's possible Owens sympathized with blacks during the civil rights movement."

Prosecutor Praises Grand Jury Inaction In Till Case. The AP (3/4) reports, "Even as the U.S. Department of Justice was announcing a fresh look at unsolved civil-rights-era killings around the South, a Mississippi Delta prosecutor was closing the books on perhaps the most notorious of those cold cases - the brutal 1955 murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till." The AP continues, "To some, the Leflore County grand jury's decision not to return an indictment in the case after an exhaustive three-year federal investigation was a sign that not much has changed in Mississippi in the past 52 years. … But others, including the prosecutor herself, felt that it showed the opposite - a maturing of racial justice in this part of the South. … 'It would have been very easy for that grand jury to have returned a true bill based solely on emotion and the rage they felt, and I commend them for not doing that,' says Joyce Chiles, the black district attorney who directed the case in which the grand jury declined to charge Carolyn Bryant Donham, 73, the object of Till's infamous wolf whistle." The AP notes, "If the grand jurors had acted on the basis of hate, not evidence, Chiles says, that would have been like the Jim Crow justice of 1955. … When federal officials reopened the case in 2004, many had hopes that someone would at last be made to pay for killing the boy whose defiled, river-savaged face helped drive mass opposition to segregation. … The FBI determined that the statutes of limitations had run out on all possible federal crimes. The agency turned the file over to Chiles, with a recommendation that she take a close look at Donham. At the time, Roy Bryant had denied that his wife came along on Till's abduction."

DOJ_NMG_0139701

More Commentary. The Sacramento Bee (3/4) reports, "Decades have passed, but the ghosts of Mississippi and the South demand justice. It is no small thing when federal officials stand up and vow to stay on the trail of murderers. Such a public commitment occurred Tuesday when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller linked forces with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Urban League and Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala." The Bee continues, "They announced their commitment to solve racially motivated murders of the civil rights era, when some considered it open season on black people in the South. A year ago, the FBI began identifying hate-crime murders that occurred before 1969. The slayings weren't investigated or reported, or were misclassified as accidental deaths or disappearances." The Bee adds, "Civil rights groups have long wanted Washington's power circle to focus on the lynchings. At long last it has happened. Federal authorities will make about a dozen of 100 cold cases their priority for investigation and prosecution. They didn't disclose which ones. … With new forensic tools available and civil rights groups providing information, authorities should be equipped to right injustices. The passage of time has not erased the need for this country to stand up for its ideals and for the forgotten ones."

Fat Tuesday Presidential Primary Questioned. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (3/4, Murtaugh) reports, "A presidential primary election on Fat Tuesday next year would most directly impact majority-black voting districts, possibly violating federal voting rights laws, according to local officials and lawyers. … 'I really would be extremely surprised if the Justice Department would approve of a Feb. 5 presidential primary,' said Beth Marietta Lyons, an attorney and a lobbyist for the city of Mobile and the Mobile County Probate Court." The Press-Register continues, "The federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 stipulates that several states, including Alabama, cannot change voting procedures unless the U.S. Department of Justice determines that the change had no discriminatory purpose and no discriminatory effect. … Last year, Alabama's Legislature voted to move the state's presidential primary from early June to the first Tuesday in February in order to make the state a more enticing campaign stop for national politicians. … That created a conflict for 2008, as both the primary and Fat Tuesday are scheduled for Feb. 5." The Press-Register adds, "Fat Tuesday parades run through three Mobile voting precincts, all of which are majority black, according to U.S. Census Bureau data for 2000: … While a Mardi Gras primary would affect all of Mobile County, voters in those three precincts would have the hardest time getting to their polling places, according to Probate Judge Don Davis. … He agreed with Lyons that the Justice Department might object if state lawmakers don't change the date. 'That's a factor I would look at if I were in their position,' Davis said."

Texas Juvenile Justice System Roiled By Probes. The New York Times (3/4, Blumenthal) reports, "A sexual abuse scandal in the Texas juvenile justice system has state politics in an uproar, with accusations that damning reports were doctored and shelved and sexual predators in high positions were allowed to resign without facing charges." The Times continues, "Late Friday, Ronnie Earle, the district attorney of Travis County who has jurisdiction over Austin, the state capital, announced a criminal investigation into possible records tampering at the Texas Youth Commission. … And Gov. Rick Perry, pressed by angry legislators to put the commission into conservatorship, appointed a special master, Jay Kimbrough, a former deputy state attorney general and state director of homeland security, to lead an investigation into the agency and 'reports of failures and wrongdoings.'" The Times adds, "According to officials, at least 13 boys and girls were molested by staff members at two state schools run by the commission. Even before Mr. Earle and Mr. Perry took action on Friday, there were already inquiries under a previously appointed special prosecutor and legislative committees. … At a State Senate hearing in the capital Tuesday, parents complained of sexual abuse and other mistreatment of their children in state facilities. … With the state's Republican leadership under strong challenge, a high-level legislative audit committee called on Governor Perry on Friday to appoint a conservator to take over the commission, or, failing that, to send in state auditors to investigate how it was handling nearly 8,000 youthful felons, misdemeanants and parolees in 36 facilities."

New York Suburb Will Not Appeal Election Ruling. The AP (3/4) reports from Port Chester, NY, "Officials in a suburban New York village will not appeal a federal judge's decision to temporarily block its upcoming election after federal officials said the voting method discriminates against Hispanics and violates the Voting Rights Act." The AP continues, "An appeal was 'not an effective use of taxpayer dollars,' Port Chester Mayor Gerald Logan said after a meeting Saturday with the village trustees." The AP adds, "Officials haven't yet decided whether to continue trying to preserve an at-large method of electing trustees that Justice Department lawyers say has kept Hispanics from gaining elected office. … The village is about 25 miles from New York City and is governed by a mayor and six trustees. It has used at-large elections since 1868. The village, with a population of about 28,000, is 43 percent Hispanic, according to the 2000 Census. The citizen voting-age population was 22 percent Hispanic, but no Hispanic has ever been elected as a trustee. … U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson granted a preliminary injunction Friday stopping the trustees vote from taking place, saying the Justice Department was likely to prevail in its case against the village. The Justice Department wants to divide the village into six districts, including one in which a Hispanic-favored candidate would be more likely to win."

DOJ_NMG_0139702

ANTITRUST:

Blackstone Mulls Chrysler Bid. The AP (3/4) reports, "Private equity firm Blackstone Group has emerged as a leading contender to buy DaimlerChrysler's struggling Chrysler unit, according to a report published Saturday." The AP continues, "The Detroit News, citing people familiar with the Chrysler sale process that it didn't name, reported that Blackstone is moving forward with a detailed analysis of Chrysler's finances and operations with an eye toward making a formal bid." The AP adds, "The development is the latest in a series of reports that have surfaced since DaimlerChrysler Chairman Dieter Zetsche said Feb. 14 that all options are on the table for the money-losing Chrysler business and he would not rule out a possible sale. … Among those that analysts say are exploring a purchase of the struggling company are General Motors plus four private equity firms, including Blackstone, Apollo Management, the Carlyle Group and Cerberus Capital Management."

Arizona School District Under E-Rate Probe. The Arizona Daily Star (3/4, Sánchez) reports, "The Tucson Unified School District is being investigated by federal and state officials for wide-ranging problems in its technology department — and has lost multiple opportunities at tens of millions of dollars in federal aid as a result." The Star continues, "Authorities declined to discuss the investigations, but TUSD's problems are evident: Students have slow Web access on school computers, and the technology department is without a director or a coherent technology plan for the future. And — as long as the shadow of the investigations hangs over TUSD — there's little chance the district can obtain federal money to solve the problems. … The turmoil began in 2004, when TUSD officials applied for federal funds to upgrade the district's computer network and phone system. … Not long afterward, employees in the technology department secretly alerted authorities, concerned that the millions of dollars in contracts would go to a small, local company instead of the major national corporations with which the district previously had contracted. … The employees also were concerned the company may have received special treatment because of a friendship between its president and TUSD's technology director." The Star adds, "Two years later, TUSD's Governing Board asked the Arizona Attorney General's Office to investigate the department, citing concerns of possible bid-rigging by a paid consultant. … Hundreds of pages of records obtained by the Arizona Daily Star, many through public records requests, along with dozens of interviews and months of investigation, paint a picture of a department in distress and under deep scrutiny. … Since federal funds for technology improvement — E-Rate funds — became available in 1998, TUSD has had problems obtaining them, and hasn't received any since 2002. In that time, more than $6.2 billion has been disbursed nationwide. … Despite the investigations, TUSD continues to apply for the federal funds — because there's no other single source with that much money to give."

Sirius CEO Seen As Ultimate Salesman. The New York Times (3/4, Siklos) reports, "Mel Karmazin could sell microwavable ice to Eskimos. He started his career in ad sales at WCBS radio in New York four decades ago, quickly proved himself to be a master closer, and has been peddling his wares ever since. … 'Mel is the singular best salesman I have ever met in my life,' said Joel Hollander, the chief executive of CBS Radio, who spent much of his career working for Mr. Karmazin. 'He's very aggressive, to say the least.'" The Times continues, "The capping moment of Mr. Karmazin's radio career came in 1997, when he sold Infinity Broadcasting (now CBS Radio), a vast collection of stations he and partners had built, to what was then the broadcast company CBS Inc. … Though he had little experience in television, Mr. Karmazin's hero status on Wall Street and his zeal for growth catapulted him into the chief executive's chair at CBS after only a couple of years. A mere nine months later, he pulled off another coup and sold CBS to Viacom, on the condition that he would run the combined media conglomerate as its president." The Times adds, "The Karmazin rocket finally ran out of fuel in 2001, when Viacom's chief executive and controlling shareholder, Sumner M. Redstone, lost confidence in Mr. Karmazin's relentless focus on costs and quarter-to-quarter results, coupled with an unpardonable failure to invite the billionaire to lunch. (Mr. Redstone went a step further last year by sort of undoing the deal and splitting off a new CBS Corporation, which he also controls.) … Anyway, gazing at Mr. Karmazin's career, you start to get the picture behind what happens when you put him in the big chair: he is forever building and selling, even when it looks like he's buying. And so, two years after he became the chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, it should come as no shock that he has struck a deal to merge the company with its only direct rival, XM Satellite Radio. … Not coincidentally, if the deal goes through, he will again end up running the combined entity."

DOJ_NMG_0139703

INDIAN AFFAIRS:

DOJ Grant Will Help Track Tribal Crime. The AP (3/4, Forliti) reports from Minneapolis, "Sgt. Bill Blake gave his anti-gang presentation to American Indian communities so many times, he says, that his daughter knew it by heart. Yet it wasn't enough: 'Dad, you have to do more,' he recalls her saying." The AP continues, "Nearly four years later, 20-year-old Erica Rae Blake was dead -- shot in the head at a party on a Wisconsin reservation. Her death was ruled an accident, but memory is driving Blake to work even harder to fight violence on reservations." The AP adds, "Blake set out to improve cooperation between tribal police, federal and local law enforcement, but quickly found a big obstacle: Nobody tracks hard data on crime occurring on tribal lands. … With the help of another Minneapolis police officer, Larry Loonsfoot, and an expected $600,000 grant from the Department of Justice, Blake hopes to create a database that would give tribes a tool to spot trends, share information and track offenders who seek sanctuary elsewhere. … 'We're never going to be able to address these problems and make things better in tribal communities when it comes to crime and quality of life unless we get the data,' said Blake, a member of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa." The AP notes, "The goal is to collect the data in a central location so law enforcement and tribes can identify problems and apply resources where needed. … 'I think what's unique about the Indian community is there is always some connection to the reservation,' said Loonsfoot, a member of Michigan's Keweenaw Bay Indian Community. 'We need to bridge that communication gap where we can directly enforce both ends.' … Blake said the I-CARE project -- it stands for Indian Crime Awareness Research and Evaluation -- will start small, with the ultimate goal of creating a national database. … Technology and money -- too little of both -- sometimes play a part in whether tribes collect and share crime data. A maze of overlapping jurisdictions hurts, too. For example, a crime on a Minnesota reservation may be handled by tribal police, a county sheriff, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the FBI or any combination of law enforcement. … That means data is absorbed by different agencies and a true picture of crime on a reservation can be harder to get. Without good numbers, a tribe may have a hard time getting grant money for a particular problem, or might not make the right choices for spending its crime-fighting dollars, Blake said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge To Rule On Medical Marijuana Case. The New York Times (3/4, Marshall) reports from San Francisco, "A federal judge has asked the United States attorney here to submit all trial preparation memorandums in the case against a leading advocate of medical marijuana so that the court can determine if the government has been pursuing a 'vindictive prosecution.'" The Times continues, "The judge, Charles R. Breyer, ordered the review at the request of lawyers for Ed Rosenthal, a spokesman in the effort to legalize marijuana who has been in a closely watched court battle with the government. … At a motion hearing in Federal District Court here on Friday, defense lawyers for Mr. Rosenthal urged Judge Breyer to dismiss an array of federal drug, money laundering and tax evasion charges against their client, saying an appellate court judge had overturned his conviction in a nearly identical case last year." The Times adds, "The new charges, outlined in a federal grand jury indictment issued in October, accuse Mr. Rosenthal of 14 felonies, including conspiracy to grow and sell marijuana for medical use, laundering $1,850 and failing to report income from the sale of crop plants on his tax returns. … The overall charges are nearly identical to a 2003 federal case against Mr. Rosenthal, which ended with a one-day prison sentence after members of the jury disavowed the verdict, having learned belatedly that Mr. Rosenthal was growing marijuana under Proposition 215, the state's medical marijuana law. … The United States attorney, George Beven, declined to answer questions about the case, citing an office policy. But at Friday's hearing he agreed to provide Judge Breyer with all interoffice memorandums pertaining to his office's decision to seek another trial and expanded charges."

DOJ_NMG_0139704

ATF Helps Iowa Police Tracking Firearms. The Waterloo-Cedar Falls (IA) Courier (3/4, Reinitz) reports, "A new computer program has sped up the first step Waterloo police take when tracing firearms they come across during criminal investigations. The Courier continues, "Last fall, three Waterloo officers were certified to use the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearm's eTrace system, which discloses the name of the person who first bought a certain weapon, the seller and the date of that sale. … In the past, police had to fill out paperwork which was then sent to ATF officials. Unless the trace was a high priority, it could take weeks or longer to get results. … 'Now it's Web-based, so you just go in and run it yourself,' said Sgt. Keith Smith, who works in the police department's crime lab." The Courier adds, "Results aren't instant and can still take hours or weeks. … An officer with investigations and an agent with the Tri-County Drug Enforcement Task Force are also authorized to use eTrace. … Aside from make, model and serial number, eTrace users type in a long list of information about the gun -- - the caliber, the type of crime it was used in, what part of the house it was found in and so on. … Smith said the ATF apparently crunches that information for future statistics."

Man Charged After California Police Find Arsenal In Burning House. The Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise (3/4, Klein) reports, "A man who authorities described as a survivalist after investigators found a cache of weapons and ammunitions at his burning (Norco, CA) home has been arrested and jailed, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said Saturday." The P-E continues, "Thomas Lee McKiernan, 62, of Norco was arrested on suspicion of possession of assault weapons, possession of illegal ammunition, and possession of explosives, according to the sheriff's department. … McKiernan, who had been held since Thursday for a mental evaluation, remained at the Robert Presley Detention Center. His bail is currently set for $100,000 and he is scheduled to appear in Riverside Superior Court on Tuesday, according to his booking information." The P-E adds, "The only illegal items investigators have identified so far are five assault rifles, several high-capacity magazines and the 60 pounds of gunpowder, they said. It is illegal to possess more than one pound of gunpowder, Gutierrez said. … The cause of the fire is still unknown. Authorities condemned the house because of the tunnel. … It will take days for deputies and federal agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to document all the weapons and ammunition, Sheriff's spokesman Dennis Gutierrez said."

IMMIGRATION:

Administration Faces Quandary In Border Agents' Case. The Houston Chronicle (3/4, Mittelstadt) reports, "For weeks, defenders of the two former Border Patrol agents imprisoned for shooting a Mexican drug trafficker have bombarded the White House with calls, e-mails and petitions. … Their demand is straightforward: A presidential pardon for a pair of Texans they view as heroes persecuted for doing their jobs. … But the issue is far from simple for President Bush, who is being asked to wade into a highly controversial case where even the most basic facts are in dispute. The quandary for the president: Whether to side with former Border Patrol agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos or with the prosecutors who contend they were rogue officers who wounded a fleeing, unarmed man and then concealed evidence." The Chronicle continues, "During a February 2005 incident near Fabens, Texas, Compean and Ramos pursued Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila and fired 15 rounds at him as he ran back toward Mexico after ditching a vehicle with 743 pounds of marijuana. The wounded trafficker later was given immunity to testify against the agents in a case that has drawn a tremendous outcry from conservatives on and off Capitol Hill, who believe the Bush administration sided with a drug trafficker over its own law enforcement agents. … Though clemency is the one area in which a president has power unlimited by the courts or Congress, Bush thus far has indicated no inclination to sidestep the Justice Department regulations typically followed for pardons cases. … The Justice Department rules require that people petitioning for a pardon wait until five years after they have completed their sentence before filing an application. And the applications must be submitted by the guilty parties themselves." The Chronicle adds, "Compean and Ramos have not applied for a pardon or a commutation of their sentences, Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin said. … Rep. Ted Poe, a Republican from Humble who has championed the ex-agents' cause, has no use for what he views as needless red tape. … Douglas Berman, an Ohio State University law professor who has followed the Texas case, argues that while the Justice rules may protect the president, they also 'eliminate some of the virtue' of the pardon power. … By citing the regulations, Bush 'may be trying to cushion himself from the public clamoring to do something in this case,' Berman said."

DOJ_NMG_0139705

DOJ Says Prosecutor In Border Agents Case Is Safe. The San Antonio Express-News (3/4, Contreras) reports, "The Justice Department's recent firings of eight top federal prosecutors across the country have come amid allegations that the agency bowed to political pressure. … Even as the Justice Department rebuts the accusations, some are wondering who might be next." The Express-News continues, "In Central and West Texas, Johnny Sutton has held the post of U.S. attorney for more than five years, but he has come under fire recently over a case in El Paso in which Sutton's office gained convictions of Border Patrol agents who shot an alleged drug smuggler. … In a federal trial in El Paso last year, jurors convicted Ignacio 'Nacho' Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean on charges that they shot the alleged smuggler in the buttocks Feb. 17, 2005, and counts alleging they covered up the shooting. Ramos got 11 years in prison. Compean was sentenced to 12. Both have appealed. … Hailing them as 'heroes' who were wrongly convicted, some foes of illegal immigration and Republican members of Congress are pushing for President Bush to pardon them. … Without a satisfactory answer from the White House on the request, supporters of the agents are aiming at Sutton who, from Austin, supervises 120 federal prosecutors in the largest federal district in the country, a territory that stretches from Waco to San Antonio, south to Del Rio and west to El Paso and Midland/Odessa. … Sutton 'has violated the public's trust, and must be removed from office immediately,' said .J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, the union that represents 10,000 Border Patrol agents. … 'Our federal government had to make a choice between prosecuting somebody who was bringing in $1 million worth of drugs, and prosecuting two border agents who did not follow policy,' said U.S. Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, who stopped short of seeking Sutton's removal but has collected more than 40 signatures from fellow House members seeking congressional hearings on the case. 'The government chose the wrong side.' … The Justice Department had no comment Friday on whether mounting criticism would have an effect on Sutton's post. But a high-ranking department official told the Senate Judiciary Committee last month that Sutton's job is safe. The Feb. 6 hearing was to review the wave of terminated U.S. attorneys, the transcripts show. … 'No,' Paul J. McNulty, the No. 2 man in the Justice Department, responded to a question of whether Sutton's job was in danger over the controversial border agent case."

Colorado Using Inmates To Ease Farm Labor Shortage. The New York Times (3/4, A25, Frosch, 1.16M) reports, "As migrant laborers flee Colorado because of tough new immigration restrictions, worried farmers are looking to prisoners to fill their places in the fields. In a pilot program run by the state Corrections Department, supervised teams of low-risk inmates beginning this month will be available to harvest the swaths of sweet corn, peppers and melons that sweep the southeastern portion of the state. Under the program, which has drawn criticism from groups concerned about immigrants' rights and from others seeking changes in the criminal justice system, farmers will pay a fee to the state, and the inmates, who volunteer for the work, will be paid about 60 cents a day, corrections officials said." The Times notes that last year, the Colorado General Assembly "passed tough legislation that included giving local law enforcement broader powers to check immigration status and restricting access to social services for workers without proper documentation."

Illegals Pay Thousands Of Dollars For Citizenship Documentation. The Washington Times/AP (3/4) reports, "Government raids at meatpacking plants in six states in December stemmed from an investigation that uncovered up to 4,300 workers with questionable documentation." Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman Tim Counts "said that investigation revealed documents were available for a price in places as open as Kmart parking lots. He said genuine documents were the most expensive, costing up to $1,500, and the most effective against detection." Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke "said there isn't much specific information on the extent of the problem. 'Irrespective of the mode of identity theft, the issue itself is prevalent and it's something we're striking at very aggressively,' Mr. Knocke said.'"

DOJ_NMG_0139706

Congress May Ease Restrictions On Children Of Filipino WWII Vets. The Washington Post (3/4, A6, Aizenman, 690K) reports, "virtually everyone in Congress appears to agree" that Filipino-born veterans "who fought alongside U.S. troops during World War II deserve a break. Denied the right to immigrate to the United States until 1990, they came hoping that their children could follow them here later, just as other groups have done. But the adult children have been required to wait twice as long -- up to 16 years -- as anyone else. With the veterans often too old and sick to travel home, many have died while waiting to be reunited with their families. Now, after several longtime backers have risen to key positions in Congress, Filipino American advocates are hopeful that legislation will be pushed through to exempt the veterans' children from the immigration delay. They also are optimistic about a potentially more controversial bill that would grant Filipino veterans military pensions."

WPost Questions Bush's Commitment To "Pathway To Citizenship." The Washington Post (3/4, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "The early signs" regarding the prospects for immigration reform "are generally encouraging. The authors of the most realistic legislation in the last Congress…are again preparing to introduce a bipartisan bill. As for Mr. Bush, he has also sounded the right notes by calling in his State of the Union address for a 'legal and orderly path for foreign workers to enter our country,' and for resolving the status of more than 11 million illegal immigrants already here, 'without animosity and without amnesty.' Still, the president's fuzziness is worrying. He did not mention a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country in the State of the Union speech, and two of his Cabinet secretaries sidestepped it during recent testimony on Capitol Hill."

Columnist Says "We Should Uphold Our End Of The Bargain" For Immigrants. In his column for the Los Angeles Times (3/4, 850K) Gregory Rodriguez writes, "For hardworking illegal immigrants who've established roots here, we should uphold our end of the bargain and give them a chance to achieve their piece of the American dream."

TAX:

Cost Of AMT Repeal Analyzed. In a "Week in review" piece for the New York Times (3/4, WK7, 1.16M), David Cay Johnston writes, "Repealing the alternative minimum tax would cost the government almost $70 billion this year, while putting everyone on the alternative and repealing the regular income tax would cost only $63 billion. Simply removing personal tax exemptions and credits and indexing for inflation would reduce the number of taxpayers affected by 85 percent. … For now, the only area of wide agreement is to keep enacting temporary patches until Congress and some future administration tackle fundamental changes in the tax code."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Champion Substantial Expansion Of CHIP Coverage. The Washington Post (3/4, A8, Lee, 690K) reports the "success" of the Children's Health Insurance Program "is exposing Washington's familiar ideological divisions over health care." Members of Congress from both parties "want to continue the popular $5 billion-a-year effort, which at any given time provides health insurance to more than 4 million children. … But Republicans and Democrats cannot agree on how much money the program should get, and whom it should cover." The CBO estimates CHIP "will require $13 billion to $15 billion above current funding levels just to keep covering the same number of children for the next five years. The Bush administration has proposed $4.8 billion, saying that is enough to maintain enrollment for 'priority low-income children.' Many Democrats on Capitol Hill and advocates for children call the White House proposal inadequate, but the dispute is about more than numbers. Some Democrats…would like to increase funding levels by as much as $50 billion over five years to extend coverage to many of the nation's 8.3 million uninsured children -- and to some uninsured parents and childless adults as well."

WPost Urges Congress To Include Dental Care As CHIP Benefit. The Washington Post (3/4, B6, 690K), in an editorial, notes that 12-year-old Deamonte Driver "died last week because of a succession of breakdowns in a system set up to ensure that children get basic dental care that is critical to their health. Equally tragic is that there are many more children like Deamonte who are at risk. … Although not required, most states provide dental care under the State Children's Health Insurance Program to low-income children who don't qualify for Medicaid. That act is now up for reauthorization. Congress would do well to include dental care in the menu of benefits, as well as help out states that face budget shortfalls. Those worried about cost should think about Deamonte."

DOJ_NMG_0139707

Warhead Plan Provokes Congressional Opposition. The Washington Post (3/4, A5, Pincus, 690K) reports, "The selection of a basic design for what could become a new generation of U.S. nuclear warheads has drawn immediate opposition from some key members of Congress." Rep. Peter J. Visclosky, the "new chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee that controls the funds for the nuclear weapons complex, has sharply questioned why a new warhead is needed," while Sen. Dianne Feinstein, "a longtime opponent of new nuclear weapons, has declared that she is '100 percent opposed' to building the RRW." However, some lawmakers support the plan, including Rep. Ellen Tauscher, whose district includes Livermore.

FDA On Verge Of Approving Antibiotic Despite Mounting Concerns. The Washington Post (3/4, Weiss, 690K), in a front-page article titled, "FDA Rules Override Warnings About Drug," reports the government "is on track to approve a new antibiotic to treat a pneumonia-like disease in cattle, despite warnings from health groups and a majority of the agency's own expert advisers that the decision will be dangerous for people. The drug, called cefquinome, belongs to a class of highly potent antibiotics that are among medicine's last defenses against several serious human infections. No drug from that class has been approved in the United States for use in animals." The FDA's advisory board last fall rejected a request "to market the drug for cattle. Yet by all indications, the FDA will approve cefquinome this spring."

Boxer, Waxman Question Regulator's Ties To Chemical Industry. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Cone, 850K) reports on its front page, "For nearly a decade, a federal agency has been responsible for assessing the dangers that chemicals pose to reproductive health. But much of the agency's work has been conducted by a private consulting company that has close ties to the chemical industry, including manufacturers of a compound in plastics that has been linked to reproductive damage. In 1998, the Center for the Evaluation of Risks to Human Reproduction was established within the National Institutes of Health to assess the dangers of chemicals and help determine which ones should be regulated. Sciences International, an Alexandria, Va., consulting firm that has been funded by more than 50 industrial companies, has played a key role in the center's activities." Sen. Barbara Boxer and Rep. Henry Waxman "called for an explanation of the company's role and disclosure of its potential conflicts of interest before the panel convenes Monday."

Two New Books Jab At Bush From Different Angles. In a piece for the New York Times Book Review (3/4), Jacob Heilbrunn reviews "Leviathan On The Right: How Big-Government Conservatism Brought Down the Republican Revolution," by Michael D. Tanner; and "It Can Happen Here: Authoritarian Peril in the Age of Bush" by Joe Conason. Tanner "offers the fullest exposition" of the argument that Bush "isn't conservative enough" and exposes "Bush and the Republican leadership as apostates who foolishly believe big government can be employed for conservative ends." As for Conason, he "surveys the concentration of corporate and political power in Washington. He ably catalogs the Bush administration's attempts to subvert civil liberties. But it soon becomes apparent that he has a proclivity for substituting hyperbole for insight."

Newsweek Poll Finds Bush Approval At 31%, Cheney At 33%. A Newsweek poll of 1,017 registered voters surveyed February 28-March 1 (+/- 3%) finds 31% approve of the way President Bush is handling his job, while 61% disapprove and 8% don't know. On Iraq, 27% approve of Bush's performance, while 67% disapprove and 6% don't know. On terrorism and homeland security, 43% approve of Bush's performance, while 50% disapprove and 7% don't know. As for Vice President Cheney, 33% approve of the way he is handling his job, while 51% disapprove and 16% don't know.

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke "Quietly" Making His Presence Felt. The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 5, 2:10, Assuras, 7.66M) reported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke was left with "big shoes to fill" when he succeeded Alan Greenspan, who had "reached cult-like status and he still holds a lot of sway." Bernanke "faced his first major challenge" last week "when the Dow and Nasdaq suffered their biggest weekly drop in more than four years. How did

DOJ_NMG_0139708

Bernanke do?" CBS (Mason): "Quietly, Bernanke has tried to put his own imprint on the economy and the Fed…and Wall Street generally gives him high marks for keeping the economy on track, even as it slows down." Charles Schwab Chief Investment Strategist Liz Ann Sonders: "I think we will look back in history at an environment where Bernanke probably became as important and as noted as Alan Greenspan."

LATimes Sees Rarity Of Market Sell-Offs As Evidence Of Economic Stability. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, 850K), in an editorial, contends the "remarkable thing about last week's harrowing stock market plunge was how remarkable it was. And that's because for all the talk of the dangers of a post-9/11 world vulnerable to terrorism, oil shocks, warfare and rising anti-Americanism, the last few years have been unusually prosperous and stable for the global economy."

Newsweek Poll Finds Tight General Election Matchups. A Newsweek poll of 1,017 registered voters surveyed February 28-March 1 (+/- 3%) finds Rudy Giuliani leading Sen. Hillary Clinton 47% to 46% in a general election matchup. Giuliani leads Sen. Barack Obama 48% to 43%, and Giuliani leads John Edwards 47% to 45%. Clinton leads Sen. John McCain 47% to 46%, while Obama leads McCain 45% to 43%, and Edwards leads McCain 48% to 43%. Clinton leads Mitt Romney 53% to 38%, Obama leads Romney 54% to 34%, and Edwards leads Romney 58% to 30%. Among Democrats (+/- 6%), in a one-on-one nomination race Clinton leads Obama 55% to 35%, Clinton leads Edwards 62% to 29%, and Obama leads Edwards 46% to 39%. Among Republicans (+/- 7%), in a one-on-one nomination race Giuliani leads McCain 59% to 34%, McCain leads Romney 59% to 26%, and Giuliani leads Romney 70% to 20%. Also among Republican respondents, 51% said they are not sure where Giuliani stands on abortion, while 12% said he is pro-life; 67% are not sure where Giuliani stands on gun control; and 70% said they are not sure where Giuliani stands on gay marriage.

Romney Wins CPAC Straw Poll, With Giuliani Finishing Second. Mitt Romney won the presidential straw poll at the Conservative Political Action Conference, where 21% of the 1,705 voting attendees named the former Massachusetts governor as their first choice for the GOP nomination. Rudy Giuliani was second with 17%, followed by Sen. Sam Brownback at 15%, Newt Gingrich at 14%, and Sen. John McCain at 12%, with no other candidate topping five percent. ABC World News (3/3, story 8, 2:00, Weir, 8.78M) was the only network to report on CPAC, saying "it was the weekend for the conservatives to prove what they're made of. GOP presidential hopefuls are in Washington trying to show they have the conservative pedigree to win the crucial backing of the party's right wing."

The Washington Post (3/4, A4, Shear, 690K) said Romney's win is "a very early indication of how an important Republican constituency might vote," and "underscored the difficulty" McCain is facing in "drawing conservative support because of past views and statements." The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Hamburger, 850K) says McCain was "the only leading candidate who did not attend the event… and the mention of his name drew occasional boos from the audience."

On its front page, the Washington Times (3/4, Hallow, Dinan, 88K) says Gingrich "received a hero's welcome" at CPAC, tying Romney "for second place in the conference's combined first- and second-choice straw poll." With second-choice ballots included, Giuliani "vaulted to the top," followed by Gingrich and Romney, Brownback, McCain, and Rep. Tom Tancredo. American Conservative Union Executive Vice President J. William Lauderback said the "combined choice is the most important yardstick because it measures depth of support. … 'The Romney [second choice] number was markedly shallow at 9 percent,' he said."

The AP (3/3) says in last year's CPAC straw poll, then-Sen. George Allen led with 22%, followed by McCain at 20%, Giuliani at 12%, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at 10%.

GOP Frontrunners Condemn Coulter's Remark About Edwards. The New York Times (3/4, A24, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Giuliani, McCain, and Romney all "denounced" Ann Coulter, "one of their party's best-known conservative commentators," for "using an antigay epithet" in commenting on Democrat John Edwards in her Friday CPAC Speech. The three GOP frontrunners' statements "came after Democrats, gay rights groups and bloggers raised a storm of protest over the remarks." Giuliani said, "The comments were completely inappropriate and there should be no place for such name-calling in political debate." A McCain spokesman said, "The comments were wildly inappropriate." A Romney spokesman said, "It was an offensive remark. Gov. Romney believes all people should be treated with dignity and respect." The Times says the "criticisms by the Republican candidates put them in a difficult position" because CPAC "has been gathering for conservative and Republican leaders for over 25 years."

DOJ_NMG_0139709

CNN.com (3/4) says "prominent politicians from both parties" were among those who "condemned right-wing commentator"
Coulter. The Edwards campaign "posted the video on their Web site, and asked readers to help them 'raise $100,000 in "Coulter Cash" this week to keep this campaign charging ahead and fight back against the politics of bigotry.'"

In a commentary for The Politico (3/3), conservative writer Jennifer Rubin says, "It's about time for a presidential contender, perhaps all of them in the spirit of Newt Gingrich's crusade for improving public discourse, to say 'enough.' Coulter's never-ending stream of venom is not amusing, unhelpful to Republicans, and not in keeping with the ideals of a party that fancies itself as the proponent of a colorblind society and heir to Lincoln."

Giuliani Tests Assumptions About His Ability To Win Nomination. Under the front-page headline "Giuliani Has No Real Chance With GOP Voters... Or Does He?" the Washington Post (3/4, Balz, 690K) writes that though the "presidential campaign is just weeks old," already "an article of faith within the Republican Party -- the belief that no politician who favors abortion rights and gay rights can win the GOP nomination -- is being challenged" by Rudy Giuliani. The former New York mayor "is now leading in a slew of national polls. He is testing whether cultural and religious conservatives in the GOP will support a candidate who offers strong leadership on security and terrorism rather than ideological purity on social issues." Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie, "who is neutral in the nominating battle," said, "This is the first Republican presidential primary since Sept. 11. Rudy Giuliani is a candidate who can clearly test the proposition that a Republican who is more moderate on social issues can capture the nomination. He's testing it now."

Romney Defends Judeo-Christian Tradition. The New Hampshire Union Leader (3/4, Rayno) reports Mitt Romney "said the Judeo-Christian values that helped found America continue to guide the country today. On the campaign trail and in the media, Romney has faced questions about his Mormon faith" and whether it will hurt his campaign. Romney said that "while this country welcomes Muslims, Hindus, Buddhists and other faiths…the Judeo-Christian tradition remains its foundation." In an interview, Romney said, "The fundamental principle of faith of Judeo-Christian [belief] is there is a God, who is our heavenly Father and all the people on this earth and every speck of humanity on this earth is a creation of God…and every creation of humanity is a child of God."

Hunter Campaign Drops Two South Carolina State Co-Chairmen. South Carolina's The State (3/4) reports the presidential campaign of Rep. Duncan Hunter has "dropped" two state co-chairmen "for making unpopular remarks." Last week, Horry County Auditor Lois Eargle said she "told a woman looking for free legal help for her abused child 'to get back to Mexico.'" In addition, Henry Jordan, a onetime school board member, was cut from the campaign because he said during a board meeting 10 years ago, "Screw the Buddhists and kill the Muslims." The campaign "took the pair off its list of a fistful of state co-chairmen -- honorary titles for regional supporters -- because it feared the increasing scrutiny from bloggers and media, said Ron Tyler, Hunter's spokesman."

Thompson Campaigns In Iowa. The AP (3/3) reports Tommy Thompson "may not have drawn huge crowds during campaign stops across southern Iowa" Saturday, "but some of the Iowans who saw him liked what they heard. Thompson covered several domestic issues and detailed his plan for handling the Iraq war to about three dozen people at a Mount Pleasant restaurant." One man said Thompson "has qualities the country needs in a president including intelligent leadership," while one woman "says she liked Thompson's solutions to welfare reform in Wisconsin."

Selma Is Latest Stop In Clinton-Obama Fight For Black Support. The New York Times (3/4, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports on its front page that Democratic frontrunners Sen. Hillary Clinton, John Edwards, and Sen. Barack Obama "are embroiled in what party officials believe is one of the most competitive scrambles for black supporters since the Voting Rights Act was passed four decades ago." Clinton and Obama will be in Selma, Alabama, today to "commemorate the 42nd anniversary of Bloody Sunday, when hundreds of activists…crossed the Edmund Pettus Bridge during a civil rights march from Selma to Montgomery." Edwards will be speaking on civil rights at the University of California, Berkeley. Rep. John Lewis, a Selma marcher, says he "is agonizing over whether to choose Mr. Obama, whom he once described as 'the future of the Democratic Party,'" or Clinton. The Times says in early primaries in states like Alabama and South Carolina, "black support could be vital," and "at least 16 states are considering voting on Feb. 5, including Florida, California, Illinois, New York and Texas, all states where black voters could hold considerable sway."

DOJ_NMG_0139710

The Washington Post (3/4, D1, 690K) interviews Lewis, who said, "If you have Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama in a formal presence there on the bridge walking together, I think it will send a strong message of people coming together. It will be beyond politics. What happened in Selma 42 years ago, and what I hope will happen [today], transcends politics. It says something about the distance we've come and the progress we've made as a nation and a people, to have the top two contenders for the nomination for president to be a woman and an African American."

Newsday (3/4, Thrush) says 21-year-old South Carolina State Rep. Bakari Sellers, the "youngest legislator in the United States and one of the African-American Democrats most rabidly courted by the 2008 presidential contenders," was "personally lobbied" by Clinton, but he is now about to endorse Obama. Seller said, "For her sake, she needs to get Bill Clinton out there a lot more."

Geffen Feud Said To Have Hurt Clinton Against Obama. The Washington Times (3/4, Lambro, 88K) reports on its front page that "political pollsters said" Clinton's "decline in the polls stems partly from her attack" on Obama. The "numbers changed after the senators traded political blows through their spokesmen when movie mogul David Geffen" criticized Clinton. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Braun, Morain, 850K) examines the relationship between ex-President Clinton and Geffen, saying that while Geffen "lavished nearly $1.2 million on the Clintons and other Democrats during the Clinton White House years, gaining extraordinary access to the president," their relations "were in constant flux. Intimates of the two said that flashpoints surfaced often." Their alliance "was marked by genuine affection, colleagues say, and a large measure of self-interest. Whether its meltdown has any lasting significance remains to be seen, but Geffen's recent broadside against the Clintons left the political world agape."

In his Washington Post (3/4, B7, 690K) column, George Will writes that Clinton's campaign "did not display overconfidence when it directed the recent fusillade" at Obama. Her campaign's "rhetorical megatonnage was in response to a prominent Obama contributor saying rude things about her. Her overreaction was one of several developments that have clarified the Democratic contest. Bill Clinton has said, regarding presidential candidates, that Republicans like to fall in line and Democrats like to fall in love. Which explains the Clinton campaign's palpable panic: Democrats have fallen in love, but not with her." Her supposed "aura of inevitability…annoys voters by telling them that they really have no choice. And that can provoke them to play the game that G.K. Chesterton called 'Cheat the Prophet': The players listen politely to explanations of what is inevitable, then they make something else happen."

In his New York Times (3/4, WK12, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich says the "long-running Iraq catastrophe is now poised to mow down a second generation of political prey: presidential hopefuls who might have strongly challenged Bush war policy when it counted and didn't." As for Clinton, her poll numbers "are showing erosion -- some of it because of Mr. Obama's growing profile among African-Americans, but some of it…after her dust-up with the Hollywood tycoon David Geffen. Most Washington hands declared Mrs. Clinton the winner in that spat because she had forced Mr. Obama off his high horse of 'hope.' But there's no evidence to support this theory. In the real world, most Americans don't know who Mr. Geffen is. … The most revealing aspect of the incident was not in any case the who's-up-who's-down prognostications for a primary process some 10 months away. Rather, it was the fervor with which the Clinton campaign accused Mr. Geffen and Mr. Obama of practicing 'the politics of personal destruction.' This over-the-top reaction seemed detached from reality, almost as if the Clinton camp were nostalgically wishing it could refight the last political war -- and once again clobber repellent old impeachment nemeses."

Clinton's Style Of Apologizing Examined. The New York Times (3/4, WK4, Healy, 1.16M) says Clinton does not have "an allergy to apologizing. She just does it in her own, very Hillary way, as a review of her apologies shows." She "can be rather artful" at "turning around her apologies to generate sympathy for herself," and "self-deprecation is another trademark." And, "like many talented politicians, on matters of state…her admission of error can be so nuanced that listeners may wonder if an apology was really her point."

DOJ_NMG_0139711

Obama Addresses Labor Activists In Chicago. ABC World News (3/3, story 7, :20, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "On the campaign trail today, Sen. Barack Obama rallied supporters in Chicago promising to back legislation friendly to organized labor." The Chicago Tribune (3/4, McCormick, 617K) reports Obama, addressing about 1,500 labor activists, "reflected on the crusades of Martin Luther King in support of the labor movement. 'He didn't just march for justice that day,' he said. 'They were marching for jobs.'" Two protesters "briefly interrupted Obama's speech. One of them carried a large sign that appeared to be critical" of Obama's Friday assertion that he "would not rule out military action against Iran. … 'OK. We appreciate that,' Obama said, trying to deflect the situation, as the protesters were escorted from the ballroom. 'I oppose the war in Iraq.'" The AP (3/3) also reports on Obama's speech.

Richardson Says He Will Work Harder Than Frontrunners To Win. The Des Moines Register (3/3, Beaumont, 160K) reports Gov. Bill Richardson "said Friday on his first trip to Iowa as a presidential candidate that he will challenge the better-known Democrats running for the 2008 nomination by working harder to reach party activists in the leadoff caucus state." Richardson said, "My campaign mode is shaking hands, meeting people, being scrutinized, talking issues. Iowans, I understand, like to decide . They like to decide, not who the pundits and the polls decide." He said that "getting U.S. troops out of Iraq within a year and dramatically diminishing the nation's use of petroleum in 10 years" are his "top priorities. … 'Bill Richardson is not a rock star,' Richardson said during a taping of Iowa Press, a public affairs program on Iowa Public Television. 'Bill Richardson is a grass-roots candidate.'"

Brooks Lauds Richardson. In a flattering column in the New York Times (3/4, WK12, 1.16M) headlined "Neither Clinton, Nor Obama," David Brooks considers Richardson's candidacy, writing that while "watching a cattle call of Democratic presidential candidates on C-Span," he was "quietly contemplating suicide. … In their five-minute speeches, they were laying it on thick with poll-tested, consultant-driven clichés of the Our Children Are Our Future variety. The thought of having to spend the next two years listening to this drivel set me wondering if it was literally possible to be bored to death. Then Bill Richardson walked onstage" and "gave the best presentation, by far." He is "the most experienced person running for president. He served in Congress for 14 years. He was the energy secretary. … He's a successful two-term governor…with foreign policy experience. He was U.N. ambassador. He worked in the State Department. He's made a second career of negotiating on special assignments with dictators like Saddam, Castro and Kim Jong Il. He negotiated a truce in Sudan." Brooks says he "wouldn't bet a paycheck on Richardson. But I wouldn't count him out. At the moment, he's the candidate most likely to rise."

Kucinich Lays Out Iraq Withdrawal Plan In New Hampshire. The New Hampshire Union Leader (3/4, Kozubek) reports Rep. Dennis Kucinich "outlined his 12-point plan for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq during a meeting with residents in the basement of the Merrimack Public Library yesterday." Kucinich said the "initial and perhaps most important step for a stable Iraq is to stop funding military operations that are contributing to a civil war, insurgency and more casualties."

Past GOP House Candidates Call For Changes At NRCC. The Boston Globe (3/4, Klein, 413K) reports that "four months after Republicans lost control of Congress," many defeated or slimly elected Republicans "are calling for major changes" at the National Republican Congressional Committee. They "depict the committee as a rogue attack-ad shop that shielded party leaders from having to account for the claims in their ads -- encouraging over-the-top accusations that often hurt GOP candidates." Ray Meier, a GOP candidate in upstate New York "whose Democratic opponent was wrongly accused of making adult fantasy calls," said, "They weren't just attacking my opponent -- they were, bit by bit, destroying a reputation that I had spent years and years building." Rep. Christopher Shays, "who is among the 2006 candidates who feel the NRCC's actions hurt his campaign, said he plans to file a bill that would allow candidates in both parties to prohibit the national parties from advertising on their behalf." But Rep. Tom Reynolds, who headed the NRCC during the 2006 cycle, "defended the ads, saying they were well-documented and generally effective. He conceded that his independent expenditure arm 'took a lot of liberties,' but said Democratic committees also stretched the truth." He said NRCC ads "saved 10 to 20 Republican-held seats."

Pioneering Lobbyist Cassidy Profiled. The Washington Post (3/4, A1, Kaiser, 690K) profiles Gerald

DOJ_NMG_0139712

Cassidy, founder of Cassidy & Associates, saying he "helped invent the new Washington, which had made him seriously rich. … He and his original partner, whom he forced out of the firm 20 years earlier, devised a new kind of business, subsequently mimicked by many others. Their innovation was the first modern 'earmarked appropriations.'" The Post says that while the Jack Abramoff story "is a crude pulp thriller punctuated by free dinners, lavish golfing outings, big campaign contributions, arm-twisting and old-fashioned bribery," Cassidy's "is a subtler epic that probably reveals more about the culture of Washington, D.C. It, too, involves favors, gifts and contributions, but they are supplemented by the disciplined application of intellect, hard work, salesmanship and connections."

Defense Appropriations Bill Earmarks Described. The Washington Post (3/4, B2, 690K) reports, "Last week, the Washington group Taxpayers for Common Sense released a compendium of 2,646 spending projects earmarked for lawmakers' home states and congressional districts in the 2007 defense appropriations bill. In many cases, the legislation itself provides only a vague description of the project, and omits the name of the company or community that would benefit. Taxpayers for Common Sense filled in the details by using lobbying disclosure databases, congressional news releases and Internet sites. New measures passed by Congress this year will require detailed disclosure in future legislation of the recipient of such earmarks, as well as the identity of the member seeking them." The Post goes on to list several earmarks and provide brief background information on their origins.

Bush's Recent Foreign Policy Shifts Draw Mixed Reaction. In an analysis piece, Peter Baker writes in the Washington Post (3/4, A5, 690K) that the "same president who mocked the idea of talking with Iran and Syria as recently as two weeks ago is now sending emissaries to a regional conference to talk with Iran and Syria. … Last week's decision was the latest of several reversals on issues on which he once refused to budge." Bush has fired Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "authorized direct talks with North Korea, sent more troops to Iraq," and "agreed to discuss the contours of a Palestinian state in Middle East peace negotiations" -- all ideas "he rejected earlier." Among those quoted in the piece who approve of the president's recent moves are ex-Rep. Lee Hamilton and ex-Sen. Warren Rudman, but Michael Ledeen of the American Enterprise Institute is quoted as saying, "I have never seen an administration with such an enormous gulf between the president's public statements and its actions. … Presidential statements should reflect policy. They don't seem to in this administration."

Bush May Encounter "Aura" Of Chavez During Latin America Trip. The Houston Chronicle (3/4, Althaus, Otis, Reinert, 530K) previews President Bush's Latin America trip, which begins Thursday. "Packing strategies for fostering trade, fighting drug-traffickers and fending off the regionwide shift to the political left," Bush will "start a swing through the friendlier parts of Latin America. He'll talk energy and free trade in Brazil and Uruguay. Those topics -- as well as crime, punishment and border jumping -- will dominate the conversations in Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico." The Chronicle adds, "At every turn, Bush almost certainly will work to counter" Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who "ranks among the world's more vocal and influential Bush-bashers" and whose "aura hovers over Bush's trip like a holiday-spoiling drizzle." The White House is trying to portray the trip "as a show of support for democratic governments." Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Shannon said "the visit also is meant to deliver the message that the governments must lift up their poor and vulnerable."

Ahmadinejad, Abdullah Agree To Curb Middle East Violence. ABC World News (3/3, story 5, :20, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "The president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, made his first official visit to Saudi Arabia today. Since the Saudis are major American allies and Sunnis, there is hope talks with the Shiite Iranians could help ease tensions throughout the Middle East. The White House still accuses Iran of fueling violence in Iraq and Lebanon while secretly building nuclear weapons."

The New York Times (3/4, A10, Fattah, 1.16M) reports the two leaders met in Riyadh yesterday "to address the Middle East's growing sectarian and political crises." Ahmadinejad "was greeted at the airport by King Abdullah, a rare honor from the aging monarch," and "he was the guest of honor at a state dinner put on by the king and attended by top Saudi officials and dignitaries." The visit "is widely believed to have been set up at the behest of the Iranians. It was the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts by the two regional powers, as well as other Arab countries." The two leaders "were believed to be focused on finding ways to end the political standoff in Lebanon between Hezbollah" and Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government. Saudi Arabia and Iran "have expressed alarm at the sectarian violence in Iraq, worrying that it could fuel similar tensions throughout the Middle East."

DOJ_NMG_0139713

AFP (3/3, Georgi) says the talks "had been expected to focus on the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq, the crisis in Lebanon and Tehran's nuclear row with the West." BBC.com (3/4) notes the two leaders "agreed to work together to fight sectarian strife in the Middle East." Their "summit comes at a time of sectarian division and tension between Saudis and Iran over events in Iraq and Lebanon."

Iranian Merchants Not Pleased By Their President. NBC Nightly News (3/3, story 4, 2:30, Ian Williams, 9.87M) sampled public opinion inside Iran, where "politically powerful" merchants "are not a particularly happy bunch." Reza Elmanan, carpet trader: "Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has not delivered on his economic promises." Williams: "Inflation and Iran's growing isolation are hitting them where it hurts most, in their wallets." Mohamad Yasrebi, jewelry trader: "Sales are much worse than last we're year. I am worried about sanctions. Things will get even worse than they already are." Williams: "Many blame as what they see as Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reckless policy towards the United States."

North Korean Nuclear Inspections Could Test US Claims. Under the headline, "North Korea Inspections Will Put U.S. To The Test Too," the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Drogin, 850K) reports, "North Korea's unexpected promise last month to open its nuclear weapons arsenals and production facilities to U.N. inspectors provided a welcome foreign policy success for the White House, but may prove embarrassing as well." Renewed inspections could show whether or not "the Bush administration overstated a purported secret North Korean program to produce highly enriched uranium for nuclear bombs in 2002." Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte "said Friday that inspections should resolve the questions. The recent accord calls for a 'full and complete' accounting of North Korea's nuclear programs, including 'its uranium enrichment activities,' he told reporters in Tokyo." An anonymous "U.S. diplomat with access to the intelligence said the administration was 'trying to walk back some of the rhetoric. The problem is they've opened up a can of worms. Was this another case of faulty intelligence, like Iraq? Or is it possible they cooked the books?'"

A McClatchy (3/4) analysis of this week's North Korean talks says the dialogue "will be a turning point for both countries -- and it could be the beginning of a transformation for President Bush." Noting "a bipartisan tradition of two-term presidents turning to diplomacy in their final years in office," McClatchy says "one big question about Bush's opening to North Korea and steps last week that could lead to a dialogue with Iran and Syria is whether a vision of peace is the driving force or desperation over a string of diplomatic failures, last fall's elections and a failing war in Iraq."

China Warns Negroponte Against Missile Sales To Taiwan. The AP (3/4, McDonald) reports Chinese officials "pressed visiting Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte on Saturday to reject a proposed sale of missiles to Taiwan, the self-ruled island that Beijing claims as its own territory." A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman is quoted saying, "The Chinese side expressed that it is firmly opposed to the export and sale of weapons to Taiwan and the United States maintaining official relations with Taiwan." Taiwan "is trying to buy 218 AMRAAM medium range air-to-air missiles and another 235 Maverick missiles at an estimated cost of $421 million." Under the headline, "China Warns Negroponte On Taiwan Arms Sales," AFP (3/4, Martin) notes Beijing "warned" Negroponte "that plans to sell American missiles to Taiwan threatened to harm Sino-US ties."

Amid "Renewed Confidence," Beijing To Accelerate Defense Spending. The AP (3/4) notes comments by National People's Congress spokesman Jiang Enzhu that Beijing's "military spending, a point of contention with the United States, will jump 17.8 percent this year." Jiang said "that military spending would hit $44.94 billion in 2007 — an increase of $6.84 billion over last year, though experts believe the true figure of China's military spending could be several times the amount that it reports." He "said most of the money would be spent on boosting wages and living allowances for the 2.5 million-member People's Liberation Army, and on upgrading armaments." The AP says Beijing's "renewed confidence" and "certainty says much about change in a political system in which the Communist Party tightly controls the reins of power but ordinary Chinese, emboldened by economic and social changes, feel increasingly free to voice opinions."

Chinese Stock Markets Evolve As Status Grows. In a front-page piece, the Washington Post (3/4, Cha, 690K)

DOJ_NMG_0139714

examines the growing international importance of China's "quirky" stock markets. "The Shanghai exchange and its smaller counterpart in Shenzhen, near the country's extreme southern border, have long been viewed skeptically by global capitalists, even those enthusiastic about the broader Chinese economy. … Though China's is one of the fastest-growing economies in the world, it remains heavily influenced by the Communist state. The stock markets are not the main source of capital in China -- that role is played by banks, all of them controlled or heavily influenced by the Chinese government. Many analysts also see the stock markets as subject to more government manipulation than is the norm in capitalist countries." A New York Times (3/4, WK3, Porter, 1.16M) piece looks at the possible ramifications of last weeks' nine percent drop in the Shanghai stock exchange.

Researcher Says US Policies Have Strengthened China. In a Washington Post (3/4, B7, 690K) op-ed today, novelist and Claremont Institute fellow Mark Helprin says US policymakers should focus their nuclear nonproliferation efforts on Beijing, not Pyongyang. Chinese officials have found success amid "chaos, poverty and without modern arms, but with strategy bred in the bone." Beijing has "received generous assistance from the past two American presidents, who have accomplished first a carefree diminution of our orders of battle and then the incompetent deployment of what was left, in a campaign analogous to losing a protracted struggle with Portugal. China advances and we decline because, among other things, its vision is disciplined and clear, while ours is burdened by fear, decadence and officials who understand neither Chinese grand strategy nor its nuclear component." Helprin clarifies, "The danger lies not solely in quantitative instabilities but in potential nuclear strategies that technical evolution has elevated above Cold War paradigms."

Anti-Putin Rally In St. Petersburg Ends In Violence, Arrests. Under the headline, "Russian Police Beat Democracy Activists," the Washington Post/AP (3/4, A14) notes Russian "police clubbed protesters and dragged them into waiting buses Saturday in response to a defiant demonstration against the Kremlin in the heart of President Vladimir Putin's home town." Protesting "what they said was Russia's rollback from democracy," the activists created "a rare gathering of the country's often fractious opposition." The AP notes "riot police beat dozens of protesters with truncheons, but several thousand broke through police cordons." Garry Kasparov, "who helped organize the event, said on Echo Moskvy radio that as many as 6,000 people participated, though the crowd appeared to be about half that number." The New York Times (3/4, Kramer, 1.16M) calls the protest "one of the higher-profile actions by Mr. Kasparov since he retired from professional chess to dedicate himself to opposition politics."

Russian Academic Says Cooperation Begins With Recognizing Russia's Role. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (3/4, B5, 690K), the Russian Academy of Sciences' Sergey Rogov says both Russia and the US are to "blame" for their failure to become "strategic partners" after the Cold War ended. "The relationship with Russia no longer dominates America's foreign policy. Washington has stopped treating Moscow as an equal player. … On issues of international security, Russia has been treated as a second-rate power whose complaints can be ignored." In addition, "the old arms-control regime is half-dead." Russia is back as an international player" and "should be treated as a responsible player, sharing the rights and the duties of membership in the community of democratic market economies in a globalized world." Both nations' "goal should be a new cooperation, not a new Cold War."

Pentagon Policy Review Could Remove Balkans' "Combat" Designation. The Washington Post (3/4, A6, White, 690K) notes Defense Department officials "are considering a proposal to downgrade the combat status of U.S. forces who are part of the NATO peacekeeping mission in Kosovo, a decision that could cause the 1,500 U.S. soldiers currently deployed there to lose hundreds or even thousands of dollars each month in tax benefits and combat pay." That move "would indicate that Pentagon officials do not believe Kosovo is still a combat zone, despite rising tensions in the Balkans over Kosovo's ongoing bid for independence and frequent U.S. missions that involve dangerous interdictions of smuggling rings, raids on armed extremist groups and encounters with improvised bombs."

Ethnic Albanians Demonstrate In Kosovo's Capital. The New York Times (3/4, A6, Wood, 1.16M) reports, "For the second time in less than a month, thousands of ethnic Albanians took to the streets" of Kosovo's capital city, Pristina, "on Saturday to protest a United Nations proposal for Kosovo's future — a plan that they say falls far short of their desire for an independent state." Protests leaders "complain that [the UN] proposal is merely a ruse to sustain foreign domination and give unacceptable rights to the province's Serbs."

DOJ_NMG_0139715

Mexican Drug Cartels Shift To Overland Trafficking Routes. On its front page today, the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Tobar, 850K) says "Central America has become a crucial way station in the billion-dollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies." The Times adds, "Everyone from impoverished fishermen and small-town mayors to legislators and high-ranking police officials has been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico." A DEA official said "Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs 'for the foreseeable future.'"

Paredes Takes Over Leadership Of Mexico's PRI. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Enriquez, Sánchez, 850K) reports former governor and federal lawmaker Beatriz Paredes will attempt "to steer the PRI toward the left and back to glory." Today she "assumes leadership of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which in the span of a decade sank from Mexico's greatest political force to third-place finisher in last year's presidential election." While the PRI "still holds a majority of local and state offices," it "is fractured by competing interest groups and politicians, and broad discontent among its formerly loyal base, Mexico's 50 million poor." Paredes said "she would lead a new, more democratic PRI."

Sudan's President Refuses To Extradite Accused War Criminals. The AP (3/4, Osman) notes Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "said again on Saturday that his country would not hand over for trial any citizen sought by international courts for crimes against humanity." He is quoted saying, "(The) Sudanese judiciary is honest and qualified to try any Sudanese… The government will not hand over any citizen for trial outside the country." Last week, an International Criminal Court "prosecutor accused a minister and a member of the security forces of a combined 51 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their actions in Darfur."

Frist Implores US To Intervene To End Attacks On Aid Workers. In an op-ed in the Washington Times (3/4, 88K), former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says "the world's effort to stop genocide [in Darfur] has run into serious trouble." He argues that "it's time for the United States and the rest of the developed world to take serious action and ensure the aid flow continues." The "very presence of international aid operations has made a truly awful disaster a tad less terrible. … The risks in Darfur are particularly grave: Because of Darfur's climate, even a brief disruption of water supplies alone can kill children and any who already are sick." Now, "the perpetrators of the genocide appear intent on launching a systematic campaign of violence against humanitarian aid workers." Frist concludes that, should attacks on aid workers continue, "an already gruesome death toll will grow even higher. The United States needs to help."

New Indian Child Labor Law Has "Little Effect" On Industry. The New York Times (3/4, A8, Gentleman, 1.16M) says changes to Indian child labor laws have not curtailed abuses. "India has no outright ban on child labor and had long allowed the employment of children under 14 in all but what are deemed 'hazardous' occupations. But last October a stricter law took effect; it prohibits the employment of children under 14 in hotels and restaurants, and as domestic servants. Five months later, children's rights advocates say, the law has had little effect. Under-age children, mostly girls, are as in demand as ever to be maids and nannies." Officials estimate "that 12 million children under 14 are employed; children's advocates say the figure could be closer to 60 million."

British MP Says US-UK Relations Could Rebound After Blair. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/4, B1, 690K), British MP and former Cabinet minister Sir Malcolm Rifkind writes, "The British have been puzzled about Tony Blair for some time. Americans, particularly the one who lives in the White House, must be beginning to share the same feelings." Blair announced British troop reductions in Iraq "at precisely the same time that President Bush, his close friend, is trying to convince Congress and the American people of the wisdom of a substantial increase in the U.S. troop commitment to the same country." Blair's "own domestic weakness dictated this timetable," and Rifkind says

DOJ_NMG_0139716

"there is now a widespread belief in the United Kingdom that Iraq has been the worst disaster in British foreign policy since" the 1956 invasion of Egypt. … It would be wrong to ignore the fact that the Iraq war and the unilateral, Manichaean foreign policy of the Bush presidency has had a profound impact on British opinion." However, "that mood is far from irreversible," and "there is little evidence of British public opinion turning to the European Union as an alternative to the United States in its affections."

Kristof Lauds US Base In Djibouti For Diplomatic Humanitarian Outreach. In his New York Times (3/4, WK13, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof praises the "little-known" US military in Djibouti "that represents one of our best strategies to fight terrorism in the coming years: The aim is to build things rather than blow them up." He continues, "After 9/11, the focus of America's response to terrorism has been mostly on using military force to destroy possible threats in places like Iraq and intimidate just about everyone." This "strategy has backfired catastrophically, particularly in Iraq, and turned us into Al Qaeda's best recruiter. So that's why the softer touch in Centcom's strategy [in Djibouit] is so welcome. It aims to help bring stability to northeastern Africa and to address humanitarian needs -- knowing that humanitarian involvement will make us safer as well."

Authors Attribute Local Climate Changes To Global Trends. Today the New York Times (3/4, 1.16M) features three international authors' takes on global climate change. Iain McCalman writes that Australia "feels like a war zone. Cities and towns across the country are enveloped in a perpetual smoke haze, and the braying of fire sirens is as commonplace as birdsong." Tahmima Anam says a "mere two-degree rise in the global climate will cause large tracts" of the Bangladesh delta "to disappear, and two degrees after that, the rivers will be wider than the plains, and two degrees after that, the water will have swallowed Bangladesh." Kristin Steinsdottir says in the icinity of Reykjavik, Iceland, "the skiing areas had been shut down one by one during the previous winters, and the little snow that actually fell was always blown away. … The last 10 years in Reykjavik were the warmest on record, at least since records have been kept."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Drug Traffickers Re-Route Through Central America."
"Chemical Regulators Tied To Products."
"Sloan Tries To Make MGM Roar Again."
"Disney 'Fairy Tale' Isn't For Everyone."

New York Times:

"Doubts Rise As States Hold Sex Offenders After Prison Terms."
"Recalling Civil Rights, Democrats Seek Black Votes."
"A Teenage Soldier's Goodbyes On The Road To Over There."
"A New Mystery To Prosecutors: Their Lost Jobs."
"In Baghdad, Sectarian Lines Too Deadly To Cross."
"Facing N.C.A.A., The Best Defense Is A Legal Team."

Washington Post:

"The Power Player: How The Rise Of One Lobbying Firm Helped Transform The Way Washington Works."
"FDA Rules Override Warnings About Drug."
"China's Quirky Stock Market Finally Matters."
"Giuliani Has No Real Chance With GOP Voters… Or Does He?"

Washington Times:

"Not In Race, Gingrich Still Has Right Stuff."
"Sunnis Slain Over Talks With Shi'ites."
"State Ruling Awaited On Sex-Ed Challenge."
"Hillary's Snipe At Obama Erodes Standing In Polls."
"Silicon Valley Redirects Its Energies To Clean Fuels."

Detroit Free Press:

"Manhunt Continues."
"Stephen Grant: 'I Was The Perfect Mom -- Not Tara.'"
"Harper Woods Car Crash Leaves Three Dead."
"Indians Show Tigers Their Muscle."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Survivor: 'I Knew We Were Flipping.'"
"Father 'Had A Really Bad Feeling.'"
"Many Crashes At Northside Exit."
"Players Visit Injured Coach."

Dallas Morning News:

"Fair Park-Area Businesses Hope Rivalry Games Stay Put."
"Power Failure Came Before TXU Buyout."

DOJ_NMG_0139717

"Dallas Mayoral Hopefuls Need Diverse Support."
"FW Law Students Reviewing Dallas County Cases."
"Ishmael Beah's Memoir Details Horrors Of Life As A Child Soldier."
"The Gift Of Friendship."
"Longhorns Can't Finish What They Started."
"Seniors Have Their Day For A&M."

Houston Chronicle:
"Freed Sex Offenders Fall Through Cracks."
"Job Lured Alleged Al-Qaida Trainee To Houston."
"Pastor, Gamer Nabbed In Texas Warrant Sweep."
"Chavez's Clout Clouds Bush Latin America Trip."
"Two Charged In Montrose Marijuana House Case."
"Texans Redo Johnson's Deal, Miss Out On QB."
"Rockets Lose Poise, Fall 97-74 To Spurs."
"Hip-Hop Stars Help Fans Focus On Finances."
"Cy-Fair Girls Come Up Short In Bid For A State Title."
"Houston Officials Plan For Inner Loop Growth."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush-Tornado Areas; Midwestern Storm; Al Qaeda-Afghanistan; Iraq Violence; Ahmadinejad-Saudi Arabia; Walter Reed; Obama-Clinton; CPAC; Atlanta Bus Crash; Stolen Rockwell; Denmark Riots; Homelessness; Swiss-Lichtenstein; Rock Camp.
CBS: Bush-Tornado Areas; Atlanta Bus Crash; Iraq Violence; Walter Reed; Bernanke-Economy; Subprime Mortgages; Stolen Rockwell; Lunar Eclipse; Terrorism Web Sites; Free Throw Coach.
NBC: Bush-Tornado Areas; Atlanta Bus Crash; Walter Reed; Military Medical Teams; Iran-Public Opinion; Denmark Riots; Stolen Rockwell; Daylight Savings Time; Lunar Eclipse; Adventure Vacations.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:
PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: COUNTIES _ The National Association of Counties (NACo) holds its 2007 Legislative Conference. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW. Contacts: Jim Phillipps, 202-942-4220. Notes: Media may obtain a conference press pass by visiting the Bancroft Room on the Terrace Level. Contact Jim Philipps at 202-942-4220 or jphilippsnaco.org for more information.

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS _ The Institute of International Bankers holds its Washington conference. Location: Four Seasons Hotel, 2800 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. Contacts: William Goodwin, 212-421-1611 ext 12.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Terrorist Groups Turn To Internet As Essential Tool 2
Arab Bank May Have Directed Saudi Funds To Palestinian Terror Groups 2
Congress Urged To Reinstate Detainees' Habeas Corpus Protection 2

Homeland Response:
Bush Brings Support And Sympathy To Tornado-Hit Alabama, Georgia 3
Nagin Admits New Orleans "Piled It On" In Assessing Damages . 4
WPost Contends CFIUS Discouraging Investment In US 4
Opposition To TSA's "Virtual Strip Search" Noted 4
Editorial Urges Greater Security Protections At Supermax Prison 4

War News:
US Airstrikes Hit Insurgents; Three US Soldiers Killed 4
Changes In Store For Walter Reed As Scrutiny Continues 5
Maliki Promises Cabinet Shuffle, Restructuring This Week 6
Slain Sunnis Had Participated In Reconciliation Conference 6
Military Faces Growing Numbers Of Bereaved Families 7
Soldier Convicted Of Negligent Homicide 7
Military Medical Teams See Brain Injuries 7
Former Fallujah Warden Remembers Experiences 8
Congress Spurs Debate Over War Authorization Powers 8
US Forces Seek "High-Value" Target In Afghanistan 8
Troops Return To Fort Dix After Year In Afghanistan 8

DOJ:
DOJ Says US Attorneys Were Removed Due To Performance ... 9

Criminal Law:
Many States Instituting Indefinite Commitment Of Sex Offenders 9
Former Government Witness Emerges From Shadows 9
States Holding Sex Offenders Past Prison Terms 10

Civil Rights:
FBI To Probe North Carolina Civil Rights Cold Cases 10
Fat Tuesday Presidential Primary Questioned 11
Texas Juvenile Justice System Roiled By Probes 11
New York Suburb Will Not Appeal Election Ruling 12

Antitrust:
Blackstone Mulls Chrysler Bid 12
Arizona School District Under E-Rate Probe 12
Sirius CEO Seen As Ultimate Salesman 13

Indian Affairs:
DOJ Grant Will Help Track Tribal Crime 13

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Judge To Rule On Medical Marijuana Case 13
ATF Helps Iowa Police Tracking Firearms 14
Man Charged After California Police Find Arsenal In Burning House 14

Immigration:
Administration Faces Quandary In Border Agents' Case 14
Colorado Using Inmates To Ease Farm Labor Shortage 15

Tax:
Cost Of AMT Repeal Analyzed 16

Congress-Administration:
Democrats Champion Substantial Expansion Of CHIP Coverage16
Warhead Plan Provokes Congressional Opposition 16
FDA On Verge Of Approving Antibiotic Despite Mounting Concerns 16
Boxer, Waxman Question Regulator's Ties To Chemical Industry 17
Two New Books Jab At Bush From Different Angles 17
Newsweek Poll Finds Bush Approval At 31%, Cheney At 33% .. 17

Other News:
Bernanke "Quietly" Making His Presence Felt 17
Newsweek Poll Finds Tight General Election Matchups 17
Romney Wins CPAC Straw Poll, With Giuliani Finishing Second17
Giuliani Tests Assumptions About His Ability To Win Nomination18
Romney Defends Judeo-Christian Tradition 18
Hunter Campaign Drops Two South Carolina State Co-Chairmen 19
Thompson Campaigns In Iowa 19
Selma Is Latest Stop In Clinton-Obama Fight For Black Support 19
Obama Addresses Labor Activists In Chicago 20
Richardson Says He Will Work Harder Than Frontrunners To Win 20
Kucinich Lays Out Iraq Withdrawal Plan In New Hampshire 20
Past GOP House Candidates Call For Changes At NRCC 20
Pioneering Lobbyist Cassidy Profiled 21
Bush's Recent Foreign Policy Shifts Draw Mixed Reaction 21

Bush May Encounter "Aura" Of Chavez During Latin America Trip 21
Ahmadinejad, Abdullah Agree To Curb Middle East Violence 21
North Korean Nuclear Inspections Could Test US Claims 22
China Warns Negroponte Against Missile Sales To Taiwan 22
Anti-Putin Rally In St. Petersburg Ends In Violence, Arrests..... 23
Pentagon Policy Review Could Remove Balkans' "Combat" Designation 23
Mexican Drug Cartels Shift To Overland Trafficking Routes 23
Paredes Takes Over Leadership Of Mexico's PRI 23
Sudan's President Refuses To Extradite Accused War Criminals24
New Indian Child Labor Law Has "Little Effect" On Industry 24
British MP Says US-UK Relations Could Rebound After Blair 24
Kristof Lauds US Base In Djibouti For Diplomatic Humanitarian Outreach 24
Authors Attribute Local Climate Changes To Global Trends..... 24

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 25

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 25

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terrorist Groups Turn To Internet As Essential Tool. The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 9, 2:45, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "Terrorist groups continue recruiting and are using a new, powerful tool." CBS (Sieberg): "It's chilling to watch: Apparent video of an American helicopter shot down by Iraqi insurgents, seven Marines on board killed. It's been viewed by thousands, all over the world, thanks to the Internet. It's one of hundreds of videos posted by terrorist groups that can be found on popular web sites like YouTube." Paul Kurtz, CBS News terrorism consultant: "It is the 'killer app' for terrorist organizations. It's viral marketing at its best."

Houston Al Qaeda Suspect Tied To Muslim Web Site Designer. The Houston Chronicle (3/4, Crowe, 530K) reports, "Daniel Maldonado, the American accused of training with al-Qaida and waging jihad in Somalia, came to Houston two years ago to work for a 24-year-old Web designer linked to Internet sites frequented by terrorism suspects. That man, Sarfaraz Jamal…is emerging as an unlikely yet intriguing figure in the Maldonado saga. And his story helps explain how Maldonado wound up in Houston, where he now awaits trial. Jamal denies any wrongdoing and the FBI is mum, refusing to say even whether he's under investigation. But Jamal acknowledges a connection to Maldonado, saying in an e-mail to the Houston Chronicle that he had hired him to do odd jobs on the Houston-based IslamicNetwork.com."

Arab Bank May Have Directed Saudi Funds To Palestinian Terror Groups. Under the headline, "Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists," the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Meyer, 850K) reports, "A three-year investigation into the activities of one of the Middle East's largest and most influential banks is producing extensive evidence of how tens of millions of dollars have flowed from wealthy Saudi Arabians to Palestinian groups that allegedly used some of the money to pay off suicide bombers and their survivors." The Justice Department "is conducting a criminal investigation into the New York branch of Arab Bank, which is based in Jordan, and its financial links to organizations and individuals accused of terrorism, according to three former U.S. counter-terrorism officials."

Congress Urged To Reinstate Detainees' Habeas Corpus Protection. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (3/4, B7, 690K) Alberto J. Mora general counsel of the Navy from 2001 to 2006, and Thomas R. Pickering, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations from 1989 to 1992, note the Military Commissions Act "eliminates the federal courts' ability to hear habeas petitions filed by certain noncitizens detained by the United States at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere. Late last month the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld this provision and dismissed the lawsuits filed by many of the Guantanamo detainees. We fully recognize that our government must have the power to detain suspected foreign terrorists to protect national security. But removing the federal courts' ability to hear habeas corpus claims does not serve that goal. On the contrary, habeas corpus is crucial to ensure that the government's power to detain is exercised wisely, lawfully and consistently with American values. That is why we have joined with the Constitution Project's broad and bipartisan group of judges, former members of Congress, executive branch officials, scholars and others to urge Congress to restore federal court jurisdiction to hear these habeas corpus petitions."

NYTimes Calls On Congress To Reverse Bush's "Lawless" Anti-Terror Measures. The New York Times (3/4, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "The Bush administration's assault on some of the founding principles of American democracy marches onward despite the Democratic victory in the 2006 elections. The new Democratic majorities in Congress can block the sort of noxious measures that the Republican majority rubber-stamped. But preventing new assaults on civil liberties is not nearly enough. … It will require forceful steps by this Congress to undo the damage. A few lawmakers are offering bills intended to do just that, but they are only a start. Taking on this task is a moral imperative that will show the world the United States can be tough on terrorism without sacrificing its humanity and the rule of law. Today we're offering a list — which, sadly, is hardly exhaustive — of things that need to be done to reverse the unwise and lawless policies of President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Many will require a rewrite of the Military Commissions Act of 2006, an atrocious measure pushed through Congress with the help of three Republican senators, Arlen Specter, Lindsey Graham and John McCain."

DOJ_NMG_0139720

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Brings Support And Sympathy To Tornado-Hit Alabama, Georgia. President Bush's visit to tornado-scarred Alabama and Georgia was the subject of detailed lead reports on all three broadcast networks last night, but print coverage is scant and limited mainly to wire reports. Several stories contrast the quick federal response and the President's immediate attention with Washington's reaction to Hurricane Katrina.

ABC World News (3/3, lead story, 2:40, Weir, 8.78M) said Bush visited "to see the devastation for himself, and offer a shoulder to lean on." ABC (Osunsami): "At Enterprise High School this morning, where a tornado claimed the lives of eight students, the President walked over broken glass and twisted metal remains. He saw for himself what's left of the school's cafeteria. At one point, he passed by the science wing where a number of students took cover and managed to escape." Bush: "One hundred kids got out of here alive. A miracle." Osunsami: "President Bush spent time alone with the families of the children who were killed. He also met with Megan Parks, head of the school's student government association. She explained to him, two of the boys who died were dear friends." Bush: "We can never replace lives and we can't heal hearts except through prayer. And I know, I want the students to know and the families to know, there's a lot of people praying for them." Osunsami: "He shared this same message hours later when he traveled to storm-ravaged neighborhoods in southern Georgia."

The CBS Evening News (3/3, lead story, 3:30, Assuras, 7.66M) reported Bush "got a firsthand look today at the worst of the damage from Thursday's killer tornadoes. In Americus, Georgia, where two people died, the President saw dozens of devastated homes and businesses. Earlier in the day, he was in Enterprise, Alabama, where a high school was directly in the twister's path." CBS (Strassman): "If seeing is believing, then President Bush saw a true disaster here today in Enterprise. He said it looked just as bad in the air as it does here on the ground. … Bush stepped in to a community's sorrow, declared a disaster, and promised Washington will help rebuild it." Bush: "Out of the devastation can come hope and a better tomorrow." Strassman: "Many students are as torn apart as their school. … But in Enterprise, nobody is sitting around waiting for the federal government to come in and help. They're helping each other and they're helping themselves. This is about neighbor helping neighbor, even in many instances when the neighbors have never met before."

NBC Nightly News (3/3, lead story, 2:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush made his way through Alabama and Georgia today to offer comfort and support to communities devastated by this week's tornados. Twenty people died when the severe weather ripped across the south. The President promised quick assistance from the federal government." NBC (Sanders): "The President met with several students here and told them he believes the strength of the community will hold them together and he promised they are not alone. Today President Bush stood where high school students huddled when a tornado struck their school Thursday walking over textbooks, desks, past collapsed walls. He promised the federal government will help." Bush: "We can rebuild buildings. The fundamental question is, will the spirit stay strong in Enterprise, Alabama. I predict it will be strengthened." Sanders: "President Bush visited Americus, Georgia, today, surprising victims on the street where another tornado killed two victims. Today's visit through the south a marked difference to the President's response to hurricane Katrina, staying clear of New Orleans. Also different: federal aid arriving immediately. Today FEMA-supplied blue tarps went up on the roofs."

The Washington Post/AP (3/4, A12, Riechmann) reports Bush "handed out hugs Saturday to people in the South who survived killer tornadoes, and he mourned those who died in the storms, including eight high school students. 'Out of this rubble will emerge a better tomorrow,' Bush said. … 'Today I have walked through devastation that is hard to describe,' he said, standing with students, one of whom had a tear running down her face. 'A hundred kids got out of here alive, which is a miracle.'" The trip, "quickly put together Friday, was intended to highlight the Bush administration's stepped-up efforts, through the Federal Emergency Management Agency in particular, to help disaster victims." FEMA Administrator R. David Paulison "was on the telephone with state emergency officials hours after the storms hit." This AP story appeared in various forms in well over 200 newspapers or news Web sites.

The New York Times (3/4, A24, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports Bush "picked his way through the rubble of the tornado-stricken South on Saturday, promising federal aid for some Alabamians and turning up unexpectedly in a largely African-American neighborhood here in Georgia, where startled residents rushed out of their damaged houses, cell phone cameras in hand, to greet him. The hastily arranged trip...was intended to send an image of a compassionate president leading a competent government response, in sharp contrast with the lingering images of federal indifference and ineptitude after Hurricane Katrina."

DOJ_NMG_0139721

CNN.com (3/3) reports Bush "implored Americans to help out any way they can. 'Some people are going to need your help,' he said. 'I would ask you out of the generosity of your heart to help the folks down here.'" Paulison "said Bush's visit was indicative of 'the new FEMA.'"

Nagin Admits New Orleans "Piled It On" In Assessing Damages. The AP (3/3) reports, "Only $1 billion of the $77 billion the city is seeking from the Army Corps of Engineers is for infrastructure damages it says it suffered because of levee breaches during Hurricane Katrina. The rest is for such things as the city's tarnished image and tourist industry losses. The city 'looked at everything and just kind of piled it on,' Mayor Ray Nagin said. 'We got some advice from some attorneys to be aggressive with the number, and we'll see what happens,' he said."

WPost Contends CFIUS Discouraging Investment In US. The Washington Post (3/4, B6, 690K) editorializes that "since the hysteria of a year ago over Dubai Ports World proposing to manage some U.S. seaports, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), the federal panel responsible for ensuring that national security interests are not harmed by foreign acquisition of U.S. assets, seems to have slid in the opposite direction. A recent study by David Marchick, a former Clinton State Department official, concluded that the CFIUS approval process has become overly difficult and increasingly uncertain, making it riskier for non-Americans to invest in the country. … Enter the House of Representatives, which unanimously passed a bill Wednesday designed to revamp the CFIUS approval process. By making the committee's procedures explicit in statute, the bill would usefully allow foreign investors to plan with some assurance."

Opposition To TSA's "Virtual Strip Search" Noted. In a column for the Washington Post (3/4, B2, 690K) Slate's William Saletan writes, "Last week, TSA began using backscatters to screen airline passengers for weapons. The first machine is up and running in Phoenix. The next ones will be in New York and Los Angeles. The machines have been modified with a 'privacy algorithm' to clean up what they show. But even the more cartoon-like images they now display tell you more than you need to know about the people seated next to you. … The American Civil Liberties Union and the Electronic Privacy Information Center have fought backscatters, calling them a 'virtual strip search.' But the purpose of a strip search is the search. Stripping is just a means. Virtual inspections achieve the same end by other means. They don't extend the practice of strip-searching. They abolish it."

Editorial Urges Greater Security Protections At Supermax Prison. The Canon City Daily Record (3/4) editorializes, "When federal and state bigwigs toured Florence's Supermax prison Feb. 22, officials came away with different views on the safety of the facility. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was assertive as he said the United States Penitentiary Administrative Maximum Security prison, which houses many high-profile terrorists, was being well guarded and mail was being properly monitored. … 'I am confident we are doing what we should be doing, monitoring communications in and out of the facility,' he said." The Record adds, "Not everyone is brimming with Gonzales' confidence. And how much weight that opinion carries should be questioned after just one visit by the Attorney General. … John Gage, President of the American Federation of Government Employees also toured the Florence prison and as expected feels more should be done. Gage represents 600,000 federal union workers across the country, including Bureau of Prisons employees. … Supermax has 208 employees, short of the 240 it had when the prison opened in 1994. Nationwide, the Bureau of Prisons has pledged to reduce its 35,000-strong workforce by 3,118 correction officers. That's cause for concern for not only the Florence prison but other high-profile correction facilities across the United States." The Record notes, "In the absence of more guards, technology is being touted as a sufficient replacement. Bureau Director Harley Lappin said the addition of a number of cameras around the complex have created a safer environment. … But Gage and some others aren't buying that argument. … While Gonzales' tour may not have answered concerns by critics, it certainly has brought more attention to the prison. Officials should continue to monitor security concerns as an obligation to the men and women who work at the prison and the surrounding communities. … An approach that includes continual monitoring of security conditions makes more sense than waiting for a tragic incident to occur, especially one that could have been prevented."

WAR NEWS:

US Airstrikes Hit Insurgents; Three US Soldiers Killed. ABC World News (3/3, story 4, :15, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "US forces say militant bases with links to Al Qaeda were the targets of air strikes and ground raids. In Baghdad, three soldiers were killed on patrol when a roadside bomb exploded next to their vehicle."

DOJ_NMG_0139722

CBS Evening News (3/3, story 3, :20, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "In the battle for Iraq, three US soldiers were killed today in central Baghdad. A roadside bomb exploded near their vehicle while they were on patrol." NBC Nightly News (3/3, story 3, 3:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq today word that three more American soldiers were killed in central Baghdad when a bomb exploded next to their vehicle."

The Washington Post (3/4, A16, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "Several al-Qaeda in Iraq insurgents who had targeted U.S. helicopters were killed in an airstrike north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said Saturday. A second strike killed members of another al-Qaeda cell that has orchestrated car bombings. Meanwhile, three U.S. soldiers on patrol in central Baghdad were killed by a roadside bomb, the military said. The first air assault, near Taji, north of Baghdad, destroyed trucks mounted with antiaircraft guns in an area where several American helicopters have been shot down in recent weeks."

The New York Times (3/4, A10, Cave, 1.16M) reports, "The United States military said Saturday that an airstrike north of Baghdad had killed several insurgents with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who were using heavy artillery and machine guns to fire at American helicopters." US spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver "said the strike did not appear to eliminate the threat to American aircraft because other weapons had been used against helicopters in Falluja and other parts of the country."

British Trace Missile Used Against Helicopter To Iran. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (3/4, Rayment) reports, "A missile that brought down a Royal Air Force Lynx helicopter and killed five British service members was smuggled into Iraq by Iranian agents, an official inquiry into the attack will reveal. The Sunday Telegraph has learned that a British Army Board of Inquiry (BOI) into the events surrounding the May attack will state that the weapon, a shoulder-launched surface-to-air missile known as an SA14 Strella, came from Iran."

Security Plan Irks Sadr City Locals. McClatchy (3/4, Sly) says the US military "has reached an agreement with representatives of the Shiite community in Baghdad's Sadr City enclave that will allow American forces to maintain a permanent presence in the militia stronghold for the first time since 2004, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saturday." But as the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Susman, Salman, 850K) reports, "mixed signals" from Moqtada al-Sadr and Mahdi Army leaders "reflect the delicate situation U.S. and Iraqi officials face as they prepare to bring their security crackdown, seen as a last-ditch effort to quell Baghdad's sectarian warfare, to al-Sadr's stronghold. On the one hand, residents there crave safety and protection from attacks by Sunni Arab insurgents. On the other hand, most are ideologically opposed to what they consider foreign invaders and say al-Sadr's own al-Mahdi Army militia and Iraq's Shiite-led security forces should oversee security."

Weapons From Iran-Iraq War Said To Fuel Violence. A separate AP (3/3, Frayer) report focuses on the continuing role of Iran-Iraq War weaponry on violence in Iraq. "Attention has been focused on the porous, 900-mile border because U.S. military officials allege that Iranian weapons, including advanced roadside bombs, are being smuggled to Shiite extremists." However, "despite the recent spotlight on Iran, U.S. officials say the majority of weapons used by Sunni and Shiite extremists have been in this country for years and were looted from Iraqi military arsenals after" April 2003.

Aid Groups Leaving Iraq As Violence Worsens. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Susman, 850K) reports, "Eventually, for the U.S. nonprofit organization training Iraqi healthcare workers, the risks outweighed the returns. Iraqis couldn't come to them. Americans couldn't go to the Iraqis. So to avoid working in Baghdad, RTI International moved classes to Jordan and Egypt, flying trainees back and forth. ... Most groups pulled out after the 2003 bombing of the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad. Fewer than 10 remain, a minuscule number given the level of need, say those in the aid community. And there are concerns that the number could shrink further after the killing in January of an American woman working for the National Democratic Institute."

Hoagland Says Desperation Helps US Narrow Strategy Options. In the Washington Post (3/4, B7, 690K), columnist Jim Hoagland writes, "The Bush administration is tossing babies off the Iraq sled as the wolves of disintegration creep closer. ... And so it should. Desperation is the right conclusion to reach, and to communicate, to an Iraq that totters on the edge of extinction as a nation-state. ... The sense that even President Bush will be eyeing the exit if Iraq's chaos worsens has spurred Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take serious steps -- at long last -- to encourage Iraqis to look for compromise ... The sobering effect that these steps are having may turn out to be more important than the immediate practical outcomes of the overlapping and in places contradictory initiatives that the administration has recently unveiled."

Changes In Store For Walter Reed As Scrutiny Continues. All three broadcast networks reported on the unfolding Walter Reed Army Medical Center story, with reports portraying Defense Secretary Robert Gates, and his quick reaction to the scandal, favorably. Several stories add that congressional hearings on the problems at Walter Reed begin Monday.

ABC World News (3/3, story 6, 3:00, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "Careers are coming to an abrupt end off revelations of shabby conditions and slow treatment for wounded vets" at Walter Reed. ABC (Hendren): "Today, President Bush announced an investigation into the entire military medical system." Bush: "This review will examine their treatment from the time they leave the battlefield through their return to civilian life as veterans." Paul Rieckhoff, Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America: "Walter Reed is really just the tip of iceberg. And the VA Is chronically under-resourced and under-funded. They are just not ready to receive the over one million veterans who have been through Iraq and Afghanistan." Hendren: "In August, the VA's own inspector general listed 119 hospitals where improvements were needed. Among the problems, access to post-traumatic stress treatment." VA Secretary James Nicholson: "I'm committed to assuring and proving to America's veterans that even in a system that now has over one million patient visits a week that one failure is unacceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0139723

The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 4, 2:05, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The scandal over the substandard care and poor living conditions for veterans at Walter Reed Army Medical Center continues to shake the Bush Administration and the military establishment. But swift, sure reaction by the new defense secretary has signaled new and different leadership at the Pentagon." CBS (Chen): "In an unusually blunt and swift, by Washington standards, reaction, Defense Secretary Robert Gates ousted Army chief Frances Harvey over Harvey's handling of a spiraling scandal at the nation's premier military hospital." Michael O'Hanlon, Brookings Institution: "He wanted to send a message early that this was a different kind of leadership and a different kind of accountability." Chen: "In less than three months on the job Gates' hands-on, no-holds Texas-style has quickly come into play. Jetting off to see the troops on the ground as soon as he was sworn in, and in contrast to the distance reporters had with former Pentagon boss Donald Rumsfeld, setting up a new relationship with the press."

NBC Nightly News (3/3, story 2, 2:15, Yang, 9.87M) reported, "President Bush spent much of the day dealing with tornado damage in the South. He was also dealing with political damage here in Washington. The conditions for wounds soldiers at the Army's premier hospital drew the first public comments from President Bush today." Bush: "It's unacceptable to me, to our country and it is not going to continue." Yang: "Mr. Bush announced a bipartisan committee to review military medical care. … Gates has moved aggressively firing the commander of Walter Reed and just yesterday the Army secretary." Yang: "The Administration is desperate to defuse angry veteran groups. They say the Pentagon's health care system can't cope with the large number of wounded. … On Capitol Hill it is providing more ammunition to those already opposed to the war." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "I think America should look at what happened in Walter Reed with shame and sorrow." Yang: "President Bush can expect more rhetoric like that next week when Walter Reed is the focus of two Congressional hearings."

The Washington Post (3/4, A4, White, Vogel, 690K) reports, "Army officials plan to revise the command structure at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, installing a nonmedical general officer as deputy commander to ensure that administrative operations run smoothly, in the wake of reports of serious problems with outpatient care at the facility, officials said yesterday. A one-star general -- who has not yet been identified -- will work with Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, a physician who was named on Friday to head Walter Reed, according to two defense officials." Congressional hearings on Walter Reed "are scheduled to begin tomorrow. Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army's surgeon general, is expected to face tough questioning about the facility."

Maliki Promises Cabinet Shuffle, Restructuring This Week. The AP (3/4, Reid, Abdul-Zahra) reports Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "said Saturday he will reshuffle his Cabinet within two weeks and pursue criminal charges against political figures linked to extremists as a sign of his government's resolve to restore stability during the U.S.-led security crackdown in Baghdad." He "did not say how many Cabinet members would be replaced. But some officials said about nine would lose their jobs, including all six Cabinet members loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an al-Maliki ally." The AP says Maliki "has been under pressure from the U.S. to bring order into his factious government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds since it took office last May. Rumors of Cabinet changes have surfaced before, only to disappear because of pressure from coalition members seeking to keep power." Also in the interview, Maliki "said he was encouraged by Iraqi public response to the new Baghdad security operation — which has led to a sharp drop in violence in the capital. He also defended his government, saying it managed to 'achieve a lot of harmony and stability' despite attacks by al-Qaida and Saddam Hussein loyalists."

The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 3, :20, Assuras, 7.66M) reported Maliki "said he will announce a cabinet shuffle within days."

Slain Sunnis Had Participated In Reconciliation Conference. The Washington Times/AP (3/4, A1, Murphy) reports, "Gunmen rounded up two Sunni families who had received death threats for joining U.S.-organized talks with local Shi'ites, hauling away the men and boys and killing all six yesterday in a campaign by suspected Sunni insurgents to keep opponents from cooperating with Iraq's government." Another AP (3/3, Murphy) article reports the slayings, saying that on the video of the troops' murder, "Male voices chant repeatedly in Arabic during the video: 'At your service, sister' - a likely reference to the revenge for the allegedly raped Sunni woman."

DOJ_NMG_0139724

The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Susman, Salman, 850K) also reports the slayings of the family members and policemen. The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 3, :20, Assuras, 7.66M) reported the family members' slayings in a single sentence.

Once-Strong Shiite-Sunni Interpersonal Bonds Said To Fray. Both the New York Times (3/4, Cave, 1.16M) and the Washington Post (3/4, A16, Raghavan, 690K) run lengthy stories today on the increasing difficulties of Shiite-Sunni cooperation in daily life. The Times reports, "After centuries full of vibrant interaction, of marrying, sharing and selling across sects and classes, Baghdad has become a capital of corrosive and violent borderlines. Streets never crossed. Conversations never started. Doors never entered. Sunnis and Shiites in many professions now interact almost exclusively with colleagues of the same sect." The Post focuses its coverage on cross-sectarian marriages, noting, "As U.S. and Iraqi forces attempt to pacify the capital, mixed couples who symbolize Iraq's once famous tolerance are increasingly entangled by hate. Forced by militias or insurgents to leave their homes because one partner is from the wrong sect, they find few havens because of the other partner's affiliation. These strains, fueled by displacement, separation and fear, are beginning to tear apart such families, weakening bonds that for many Iraqis hold the hope of sectarian reconciliation."

Iraqis Resort To Dating Online. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Young Iraqis, trapped in their homes in the mean streets of this bloodstained capital, are increasingly turning to the Internet to chat with relatives, hang out with friends and search for love."

Feldman Says US Must Choose Sectarian Allies On "Case-By-Case Basis." In the New York Times Magazine (3/4), Noah Feldman writes, "As the Sunni-Shiite conflict in Iraq polarizes Muslims across the globe, the United States finds itself in the odd position of seeming to favor a Shiite government in Iraq and Sunni leaders everywhere else. ... For the United States to defuse anti-American Islamism, it must be willing to embrace moderates and democrats of all stripes, Sunni or Shiite. From a strategic standpoint, it would also be an error to communicate to Muslims worldwide that the United States supports either Sunnis or Shiites as such. ... So choosing our friends on a case-by-case basis is both morally better and practically wiser."

Military Faces Growing Numbers Of Bereaved Families. The AP (3/4, Crary) reports from Fort Hood, "A few blocks away is a more poignant symbol: an office building recently converted into a first-of-its-kind support center for women and children whose husbands and fathers have died in Iraq and Afghanistan. From Fort Hood alone, the toll has passed 365. ... Of the 3,350 Americans who died in Iraq and Afghanistan through early January, 1,586 of them -- 47.3 percent -- were married. Those fallen warriors left behind 1,954 children, according to the Pentagon's Manpower Data Center. More recent deaths have pushed that figure past 2,000. ... the new generation of bereaved spouses has been vocal ... in pressing for more compassionate, effective support." The result of their pressure "has been numerous policy changes, ranging from improved benefits to better training for the officers who break the grim news of war-zone deaths."

Small-Town 18-Year-Old Joins Army. In a front-page article, the New York Times (3/4, A1, Barry, 1.16M) reports from Needles, Calif., "It is time. The fresh young soldier has a plane to catch. ... The uniform has a name patch, KANE, for Pvt. Resha Kane. Eighteen years old and five feet tall. Of Needles High School, Class of 2006, and, lately, of the United States Army, Fourth Infantry Division." Accompanied by supportive local motorcyclists, "riding in the midst of this caravan of protection and respect, she is bound for Fort Hood in Texas to await deployment — probably to Iraq, she says."

Marine Cross Winner Battles Survivor's Guilt, PTSD. The Washington Post (3/4, D1, Carlson, 690K) reports on Marine and Navy Cross winner Jeremiah Workman, "When the narrator finished reading the story of Workman's 'extraordinary heroism' in Iraq, Brig. Gen. Richard T. Tryon pinned the Navy Cross to Workman's chest ... It was a moment of well-deserved triumph, but it didn't make Workman feel any better." After returning from combat in Fallujah, Workman says, "I would dream this: a staircase, never ending. And I'm running back and forth, being chased by insurgents, and they're throwing grenades at me." A diagnosed PTSD sufferer, Workman "was transferred to Quantico and stationed at the new National Museum of the Marine Corps. He walks around in his uniform, talking to tourists, sometimes posing for pictures with the ones who recognize the importance of the Navy Cross ribbon on his chest." He still "wants to go back to Iraq," saying, "A lot of my friends have been there three or four times. I think if I got one more tour over there, I'd feel better in the heart."

Soldier Convicted Of Negligent Homicide. The AP (3/3) reports, "An Arkansas soldier has been convicted of negligent homicide for the shooting death of a fellow guardsman in Iraq." Spc. Daniel Turner "was convicted Monday in Baghdad and sentenced to 15 years in a military prison." The circumstances surrounding Derek Plowman's death "have not been released by the military. The Defense Department did not immediately return a message seeking comment Saturday."

Military Medical Teams See Brain Injuries. NBC Nightly News (3/3, story 3, 3:00, Bazell, 9.87M) reported, "At the combat hospitals in Iraq, the vast majority of the injuries are from roadside bombs." Unidentified doctor: "Injury to his right head." Bazell: "Many experts worry about long-term brain damage from exposure to so many explosions. The chief army surgical advisor for the Iraqi theatre says the military worries too." Dr. Philip Quanka: "They can do all of the basic things but they have subtle neurological signs that are difficult to tell if it is just fatigue or headache like you or I may have." Bazell: "For now the military has no sense how wide the problem may be."

DOJ_NMG_0139725

Former Fallujah Warden Remembers Experiences. In the Los Angeles Times (3/4, 850K), Mike Carlson, the "officer in charge of the Camp Fallouja Regional Detention Facility from March 2006 to October," gives 12 suggestions on how to cope with "taking charge of a detention center in Iraq." Carlson estimates, "One-third are innocents caught up in sweeps; one-third are jihadists who will slit your throat, and one-third are opportunists who will rat out their neighbors." After leaving Iraq, "You will turn off the TV and sit in the dark and feel your eyes water as you think about how you took 55 Marines and sailors into a combat zone and brought all 55 back home, and that no one in America besides you and those 55 really cares or understands what you went through. You processed 1,230 detainees, without a single incident of abuse, while America sat on the couch and watched girls go wild."

Congress Spurs Debate Over War Authorization Powers. In the New York Times (3/4, WK1, 1.16M), law professor Jeff Rosen writes that current Democratic proposals "raise serious constitutional questions that could affect not only the conduct of the Iraq war, but also the balance of power between Congress and the president in wartime." However, two scholars conclude that "a constitutional crisis may not be the inevitable outcome," with NYU law professor Samuel Issacharoff saying, "I think this will be resolved politically, as it has been in the past, and either the president or Congress will back down." Harvard Law School's Jack Goldsmith says, "Congress will be much more careful in the future about authorizing force without restrictions on presidential power."

Antiwar Caucus Strives To Be Heard. The New York Times (3/4, A23, Luo, 1.16M) reports on the "Out of Iraq Congressional Caucus," "Now, with a change in power in Congress and a new military strategy to increase the number of American troops in Iraq, the members of the group — most of them liberals — are suddenly much in demand, finding themselves at the center of the debate over the war. Yet even with a majority of Americans opposing the war, the caucus is struggling to overcome its fringe image and is becoming increasingly frustrated by what its members say is the Democratic leadership's unwillingness to heed their calls for decisive action to the end the war. ... They reflect the broader struggle among Democrats in Congress, who have been unable to coalesce around a single position on how strongly to confront President Bush over the war."

US Forces Seek "High-Value" Target In Afghanistan. ABC World News (3/3, story 3, 2:10, Weir, 8.78M) reported "out of Afghanistan" that "US forces were involved in an assault aimed at senior leaders of Al Qaeda. The operation is in a very remote area and details are still rough." ABC (Karl): "Our sources in Afghanistan tell us there's a major military operation going on in Kunar province; this is a remote lawless area that borders Pakistan, local sources tell us the operation, is aimed at a high-value Al Qaeda target. ... But we've been down this road before. We've seen false alarms. ... [US officials] hope on both sides of the border to go after top Taliban and Al Qaeda leaders."

Pakistan Denies US Has Authority To Target Militants On Its Territory. The AP (3/3) reports, "Pakistan vehemently denied Saturday the U.S. military's claim that coalition forces in Afghanistan have the authority to pursue Taliban fleeing across the border into Pakistani territory." Representatives of the Pakistani army and Foreign Ministry both rejected the claim: "Aslam's and Arshad's comments came two days after [Lt. Gen. Douglas] Lute told the Senate Armed Services Committee in Washington that 'we have all the authorities we need to pursue, either with (artillery) fire or on the ground, across the border.'" Pakistanis have "arrested at least 700 al-Qaida and Taliban" since 9/11, "But there is growing international pressure on Pakistan to crack down further on Taliban militants on its side of the border, a message delivered on Monday by Vice President Dick Cheney during a visit to Islamabad."

Troops Return To Fort Dix After Year In Afghanistan. The New York Times (3/4, Fahim, 1.16M) reports, "Then slowly, the painting dropped to the ground, and mother and daughter stood quietly, amid the whirl of tearful, laughing, shouting soldiers who had returned to New Jersey after more than a year in Afghanistan. ... Specialist Siverio was among 80 soldiers from the 50th Personnel Services Battalion, based in Lawrenceville, who arrived at Fort Dix on Friday. Many of the returning soldiers were leaving the Guard. Others remained on active duty, and some re-enlisted. In Afghanistan, they had mostly engaged the enemy of paperwork, functioning as a human resources and postal division ... None were killed, and none were seriously injured." However, "many of them were at Bagram Air Base on Tuesday" when a suicide bomber attacked during Vice President Cheney's visit.

DOJ_NMG_0139726

DOJ:

DOJ Says US Attorneys Were Removed Due To Performance. The New York Times (3/4, Johnston, Lipton, Yardley, 1.16M), in a front-page article, reports that the "ouster" of eight US attorneys "has set off a furor in Washington that took the Bush administration by surprise. Summoning five of the dismissed prosecutors for hearings on Tuesday, the newly empowered Congressional Democrats have charged that the mass firing is a political purge, intended to squelch corruption investigations or install less independent-minded successors." Several prosecutors "believe they were forced out for replacements who could gild résumés," while others "may have been vulnerable because they had had run-ins with the Justice Department." Justice Department officials "deny that the dismissals were politically motivated or that the action resulted from White House pressure." DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said, "These decisions were based on the individual concerns about each U.S. attorney's overall performance."

More Commentary. In a column for the Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/4), John L. Smith writes, "How quickly they forget. … On a rainy Tuesday morning in August 2003, Attorney General John Ashcroft came to the Lloyd D. George U.S. Courthouse to address members of the U.S. attorney's office on the importance of teamwork in implementing the USA Patriot Act." Smith continues, "At Ashcroft's side that day was his loyal soldier in the war on terrorism, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden. A career federal prosecutor, Bogden was so square he squeaked. Despite the numerous constitutional concerns over the Patriot Act's use, in a post-9/11 world Ashcroft received rousing support from his troops in the Southern Nevada office. … 'You are the doers,' Ashcroft said. 'You are the achievers. You are the soldiers ... on the ground and in the trenches ... who put your lives on the line to defend life and liberty. Your spirit is the heroic spirit we saw on September 11th, when New York's finest and New York's bravest ran up the stairs of the World Trade Center while others were running down the stairs.' … Bogden appeared so devoted to the prevailing cause, in fact, that civil libertarians questioned his office's use of the Patriot Act to retrieve bank documents in the FBI's public corruption investigation of members of the Clark County Commission. It was believed then to be an unprecedented use of an act touted as essential to fighting the war on terrorism. … Ridiculed by some, Bogden took one for the team as his office moved methodically, if not always successfully, to prosecute corrupt politicians, warring bikers, drug traffickers, topless bar wiseguys and criminals of every stripe." Smith notes, "During his five-year tenure, which ended last week after his unceremonious sacking by the Department of Justice, some colleagues questioned his decisions, but no one questioned his competence. He was a professional, a public servant in the best sense of the words. … Now the 51-year-old Bogden is one of a half dozen terminated U.S. attorneys from around the West in what stacks up as a nakedly political and brazenly hypocritical move by the Bush administration and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. What some critics recently called a glorified attempt at GOP résumé-building by the administration has backfired into one of the most embarrassing moments in recent Department of Justice history." Smith concludes, "On that August morning in 2003, Ashcroft invoked dramatic images of Sept. 11 and said, 'It has transformed the mission of the Justice Department.' … Was this what he had in mind? … The terminations also make a liar out of Gonzales when he talks about how 'our commitment to the rule of law allows ordinary citizens to rely on and expect ... honesty of government officials.' … What could be less honest than playing politics with top federal prosecutors?"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Many States Instituting Indefinite Commitment Of Sex Offenders. The New York Times (3/4, Davey, Goodnough, 1.16M), in a front-page article, reports, "The decision by New York to confine sex offenders beyond their prison terms places the state at the forefront of a growing national movement that is popular with politicians and voters. But such programs have almost never met a stated purpose of treating the worst criminals until they no longer pose a threat." Gov. Eliot Spitzer "suggested that New York's proposed civil commitment law would 'become a national model' and go well beyond confining the most violent predators to also include mental health treatment and intensive supervised release for offenders. … But in state after state, such expectations have fallen short." While the US Supreme Court "has upheld the constitutionality of the laws in part because their aim is to furnish treatment if possible, not punish someone twice for the same crime," only a "small fraction of committed offenders have ever completed treatment to the point where they could be released free and clear."

Former Government Witness Emerges From Shadows. The New York Times (3/4, Roberts) reports, "The 74-year-old man who used to be Leroy Nicholas Barnes, owner of 60 pairs of custom-made shoes, 27 full-length leather coats and more than one Mercedes-Benz, wears baggy Lee dungarees these days and drives to work in a used car he bought five years ago. … With his slight limp and mostly bald pate, he seems the antithesis of his former persona as Mr. Untouchable, the dashing Harlem heroin dealer who posed 30 years ago on a magazine cover in a blue denim suit and a red, white and blue tie." The Times continues, "Mr. Barnes's posture of smug invulnerability so affronted President Jimmy Carter that he ordered his attorney general to, as they say, prosecute Mr. Barnes to the fullest extent of the law. … The Justice Department did just that. And in 1977, Mr. Barnes — a former addict with a junior high education who made a fortune flooding black neighborhoods with heroin and swaggered around as an invincible outlaw — was sentenced to life in prison without parole. … 'He was the No. 1; he had charisma,' said Sterling Johnson Jr., a federal judge and former special narcotics prosecutor in New York City. 'Have you been in the presence of Bill Clinton when he walks down the street? That was Nicky Barnes.'" The Times adds, "While Mr. Barnes, widely known as Nicky, languished behind bars, though, his former cronies, his wife and his girlfriends began cavorting, he said, squandering the criminal enterprise that had made them all millionaires. So much for honor among thieves. Mr. Barnes felt betrayed. … 'They had a sleeping lion, a caged lion,' he recalled, 'and they woke him up.' And so Mr. Barnes roared, so ferocious a government witness that scores of drug dealers were convicted. He was released into the federal witness protection program in 1998. … And then he disappeared." The Times notes, "Years ago, a former associate predicted how difficult it would be for Mr. Barnes to adjust to a life of anonymity if he ever turned informer and was granted a fresh identity. … For nearly a decade, though, Mr. Barnes says, he has managed to seamlessly insinuate himself into mainstream America, this time untouchable by those he incriminated and the friends and families of foes he murdered. … Last weekend, though, Mr. Barnes surfaced briefly, and pseudonymously, to promote a new book about his old life in the feral 1970s, 'Mr. Untouchable,' written with Tom Folsom. This summer, he will appear in a documentary with the same name and later this year a movie, 'American Gangster,' is to be released. It stars Cuba Gooding Jr. as Mr. Barnes, but, to his exasperation, focuses on his chief rival in Harlem's heroin trade, Frank Lucas."

DOJ_NMG_0139727

States Holding Sex Offenders Past Prison Terms. The New York Times (3/4, A1, Davey, Goodnough) reports, "The decision by New York to confine sex offenders beyond their prison terms places the state at the forefront of a growing national movement that is popular with politicians and voters. But such programs have almost never met a stated purpose of treating the worst criminals until they no longer pose a threat." The Times continues, "About 2,700 pedophiles, rapists and other sexual offenders are already being held indefinitely, mostly in special treatment centers, under so-called civil commitment programs in 19 states, which on average cost taxpayers four times more than keeping the offenders in prison. … In announcing a deal with legislative leaders on Thursday, Gov. Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, suggested that New York's proposed civil commitment law would 'become a national model' and go well beyond confining the most violent predators to also include mental health treatment and intensive supervised release for offenders. … 'No one has a bill like this, nobody,' said State Senator Dale M. Volker, a Republican from western New York and a leading proponent in the Legislature of civil confinement. … But in state after state, such expectations have fallen short. The United States Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of the laws in part because their aim is to furnish treatment if possible, not punish someone twice for the same crime. Yet only a small fraction of committed offenders have ever completed treatment to the point where they could be released free and clear." The Times notes, "Leroy Hendricks, a convicted child molester in Kansas, finished his prison term 13 years ago, but he remains locked up at a cost to taxpayers in that state of $185,000 a year — more than eight times the cost of keeping someone in prison there. … Mr. Hendricks, who is 72 and unsuccessfully challenged his confinement in the Supreme Court, spends most days in a wheelchair or leaning on a cane, because of diabetes, circulation ailments and the effects of a stroke. He may not live long enough to 'graduate' from treatment. … Few ever make such progress: Nationwide, of the 250 offenders released unconditionally since the first law was passed in 1990, about half of them were let go on legal or technical grounds unrelated to treatment. … Still, political leaders, like those in New York, are vastly expanding such programs to keep large numbers of rapists and pedophiles off the streets after their prison terms in a response to public fury over grisly sex crimes."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI To Probe North Carolina Civil Rights Cold Cases. The Raleigh News & Observer (3/4, Locke) reports, "Federal Bureau of Investigation agents received a tall order last week when they were asked to take a close look at the deaths of three North Carolina men a half century ago." The N&O continues, "The names of three men who died during the height of the civil rights era landed on the desks of field agents in Charlotte last week as federal Justice Department officials promised to crack open a batch of cold cases flagged by the Southern Poverty Law Center in Alabama. … The center has collected information since the late 1980s on what it feared were 'racially motivated' homicides that were never resolved, said Andrew Blejwas, the center's communications coordinator." The N&O adds, "Ken Lucas, spokesman for the FBI in Charlotte, said agents will scratch at the three cases, hoping to turn up evidence that allows them to prosecute after these many years. It's not clear how much the cases were investigated at the time, if at all. … In Shelby, many older black residents still remember Dr. George Singleton, who was killed in an explosion and fire in his office in 1957. … Details are skimpy for the other two cases. Both men -- William Dallas Owens of New Bern and Clarence Cloninger of Gaston, outside Roanoke Rapids -- died while in jail. … Owens, a disabled World War II veteran, died in jail after being arrested by New Bern police for being drunk. Details in his published obituary suggest Owens was white. His Army unit had not been integrated during World War II. The church and funeral home that handled his burial is traditionally white. … The Southern Poverty Law Center and FBI officials were not aware of Owens' race when he was added to the list. … They will take a look at his case anyway, Lucas said. Federal civil rights laws protect against abuses in local jails and prisons. Plus, it's possible Owens sympathized with blacks during the civil rights movement."

DOJ_NMG_0139728

Prosecutor Praises Grand Jury Inaction In Till Case. The AP (3/4) reports, "Even as the U.S. Department of Justice was announcing a fresh look at unsolved civil-rights-era killings around the South, a Mississippi Delta prosecutor was closing the books on perhaps the most notorious of those cold cases - the brutal 1955 murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till." The AP continues, "To some, the Leflore County grand jury's decision not to return an indictment in the case after an exhaustive three-year federal investigation was a sign that not much has changed in Mississippi in the past 52 years. … But others, including the prosecutor herself, felt that it showed the opposite - a maturing of racial justice in this part of the South. … 'It would have been very easy for that grand jury to have returned a true bill based solely on emotion and the rage they felt, and I commend them for not doing that,' says Joyce Chiles, the black district attorney who directed the case in which the grand jury declined to charge Carolyn Bryant Donham, 73, the object of Till's infamous wolf whistle." The AP notes, "If the grand jurors had acted on the basis of hate, not evidence, Chiles says, that would have been like the Jim Crow justice of 1955. … When federal officials reopened the case in 2004, many had hopes that someone would at last be made to pay for killing the boy whose defiled, river-savaged face helped drive mass opposition to segregation. … The FBI determined that the statutes of limitations had run out on all possible federal crimes. The agency turned the file over to Chiles, with a recommendation that she take a close look at Donham. At the time, Roy Bryant had denied that his wife came along on Till's abduction."

More Commentary. The Sacramento Bee (3/4) reports, "Decades have passed, but the ghosts of Mississippi and the South demand justice. It is no small thing when federal officials stand up and vow to stay on the trail of murderers. Such a public commitment occurred Tuesday when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller linked forces with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Urban League and Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala." The Bee continues, "They announced their commitment to solve racially motivated murders of the civil rights era, when some considered it open season on black people in the South. A year ago, the FBI began identifying hate-crime murders that occurred before 1969. The slayings weren't investigated or reported, or were misclassified as accidental deaths or disappearances." The Bee adds, "Civil rights groups have long wanted Washington's power circle to focus on the lynchings. At long last it has happened. Federal authorities will make about a dozen of 100 cold cases their priority for investigation and prosecution. They didn't disclose which ones. … With new forensic tools available and civil rights groups providing information, authorities should be equipped to right injustices. The passage of time has not erased the need for this country to stand up for its ideals and for the forgotten ones."

Fat Tuesday Presidential Primary Questioned. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (3/4, Murtaugh) reports, "A presidential primary election on Fat Tuesday next year would most directly impact majority-black voting districts, possibly violating federal voting rights laws, according to local officials and lawyers. … 'I really would be extremely surprised if the Justice Department would approve of a Feb. 5 presidential primary,' said Beth Marietta Lyons, an attorney and a lobbyist for the city of Mobile and the Mobile County Probate Court." The Press-Register continues, "The federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 stipulates that several states, including Alabama, cannot change voting procedures unless the U.S. Department of Justice determines that the change had no discriminatory purpose and no discriminatory effect. … Last year, Alabama's Legislature voted to move the state's presidential primary from early June to the first Tuesday in February in order to make the state a more enticing campaign stop for national politicians. … That created a conflict for 2008, as both the primary and Fat Tuesday are scheduled for Feb. 5." The Press-Register adds, "Fat Tuesday parades run through three Mobile voting precincts, all of which are majority black, according to U.S. Census Bureau data for 2000: … While a Mardi Gras primary would affect all of Mobile County, voters in those three precincts would have the hardest time getting to their polling places, according to Probate Judge Don Davis. … He agreed with Lyons that the Justice Department might object if state lawmakers don't change the date. 'That's a factor I would look at if I were in their position,' Davis said."

Texas Juvenile Justice System Roiled By Probes. The New York Times (3/4, Blumenthal) reports, "A sexual abuse scandal in the Texas juvenile justice system has state politics in an uproar, with accusations that damning reports were doctored and shelved and sexual predators in high positions were allowed to resign without facing charges." The Times continues, "Late Friday, Ronnie Earle, the district attorney of Travis County who has jurisdiction over Austin, the state capital, announced a criminal investigation into possible records tampering at the Texas Youth Commission. … And Gov. Rick Perry, pressed by angry legislators to put the commission into conservatorship, appointed a special master, Jay Kimbrough, a former deputy state attorney general and state director of homeland security, to lead an investigation into the agency and 'reports of failures and wrongdoings.'" The Times adds, "According to officials, at least 13 boys and girls were molested by staff members at two state schools run by the commission. Even before Mr. Earle and Mr. Perry took action on Friday, there were already inquiries under a previously appointed special prosecutor and legislative committees. … At a State Senate hearing in the capital Tuesday, parents complained of sexual abuse and other mistreatment of their children in state facilities. … With the state's Republican leadership under strong challenge, a high-level legislative audit committee called on Governor Perry on Friday to appoint a conservator to take over the commission, or, failing that, to send in state auditors to investigate how it was handling nearly 8,000 youthful felons, misdemeanants and parolees in 36 facilities."

DOJ_NMG_0139729

New York Suburb Will Not Appeal Election Ruling. The AP (3/4) reports from Port Chester, NY, "Officials in a suburban New York village will not appeal a federal judge's decision to temporarily block its upcoming election after federal officials said the voting method discriminates against Hispanics and violates the Voting Rights Act." The AP continues, "An appeal was 'not an effective use of taxpayer dollars,' Port Chester Mayor Gerald Logan said after a meeting Saturday with the village trustees." The AP adds, "Officials haven't yet decided whether to continue trying to preserve an at-large method of electing trustees that Justice Department lawyers say has kept Hispanics from gaining elected office. … The village is about 25 miles from New York City and is governed by a mayor and six trustees. It has used at-large elections since 1868. The village, with a population of about 28,000, is 43 percent Hispanic, according to the 2000 Census. The citizen voting-age population was 22 percent Hispanic, but no Hispanic has ever been elected as a trustee. … U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson granted a preliminary injunction Friday stopping the trustees vote from taking place, saying the Justice Department was likely to prevail in its case against the village. The Justice Department wants to divide the village into six districts, including one in which a Hispanic-favored candidate would be more likely to win."

ANTITRUST:

Blackstone Mulls Chrysler Bid. The AP (3/4) reports, "Private equity firm Blackstone Group has emerged as a leading contender to buy DaimlerChrysler's struggling Chrysler unit, according to a report published Saturday." The AP continues, "The Detroit News, citing people familiar with the Chrysler sale process that it didn't name, reported that Blackstone is moving forward with a detailed analysis of Chrysler's finances and operations with an eye toward making a formal bid." The AP adds, "The development is the latest in a series of reports that have surfaced since DaimlerChrysler Chairman Dieter Zetsche said Feb. 14 that all options are on the table for the money-losing Chrysler business and he would not rule out a possible sale. … Among those that analysts say are exploring a purchase of the struggling company are General Motors plus four private equity firms, including Blackstone, Apollo Management, the Carlyle Group and Cerberus Capital Management."

Arizona School District Under E-Rate Probe. The Arizona Daily Star (3/4, Sánchez) reports, "The Tucson Unified School District is being investigated by federal and state officials for wide-ranging problems in its technology department — and has lost multiple opportunities at tens of millions of dollars in federal aid as a result." The Star continues, "Authorities declined to discuss the investigations, but TUSD's problems are evident: Students have slow Web access on school computers, and the technology department is without a director or a coherent technology plan for the future. And — as long as the shadow of the investigations hangs over TUSD — there's little chance the district can obtain federal money to solve the problems. … The turmoil began in 2004, when TUSD officials applied for federal funds to upgrade the district's computer network and phone system. … Not long afterward, employees in the technology department secretly alerted authorities, concerned that the millions of dollars in contracts would go to a small, local company instead of the major national corporations with which the district previously had contracted. … The employees also were concerned the company may have received special treatment because of a friendship between its president and TUSD's technology director." The Star adds, "Two years later, TUSD's Governing Board asked the Arizona Attorney General's Office to investigate the department, citing concerns of possible bid-rigging by a paid consultant. … Hundreds of pages of records obtained by the Arizona Daily Star, many through public records requests, along with dozens of interviews and months of investigation, paint a picture of a department in distress and under deep scrutiny. … Since federal funds for technology improvement — E-Rate funds — became available in 1998, TUSD has had problems obtaining them, and hasn't received any since 2002. In that time, more than $6.2 billion has been disbursed nationwide. … Despite the investigations, TUSD continues to apply for the federal funds — because there's no other single source with that much money to give."

DOJ_NMG_0139730

Sirius CEO Seen As Ultimate Salesman. The New York Times (3/4, Siklos) reports, "Mel Karmazin could sell microwavable ice to Eskimos. He started his career in ad sales at WCBS radio in New York four decades ago, quickly proved himself to be a master closer, and has been peddling his wares ever since. … 'Mel is the singular best salesman I have ever met in my life,' said Joel Hollander, the chief executive of CBS Radio, who spent much of his career working for Mr. Karmazin. 'He's very aggressive, to say the least.'" The Times continues, "The capping moment of Mr. Karmazin's radio career came in 1997, when he sold Infinity Broadcasting (now CBS Radio), a vast collection of stations he and partners had built, to what was then the broadcast company CBS Inc. … Though he had little experience in television, Mr. Karmazin's hero status on Wall Street and his zeal for growth catapulted him into the chief executive's chair at CBS after only a couple of years. A mere nine months later, he pulled off another coup and sold CBS to Viacom, on the condition that he would run the combined media conglomerate as its president." The Times adds, "The Karmazin rocket finally ran out of fuel in 2001, when Viacom's chief executive and controlling shareholder, Sumner M. Redstone, lost confidence in Mr. Karmazin's relentless focus on costs and quarter-to-quarter results, coupled with an unpardonable failure to invite the billionaire to lunch. (Mr. Redstone went a step further last year by sort of undoing the deal and splitting off a new CBS Corporation, which he also controls.) … Anyway, gazing at Mr. Karmazin's career, you start to get the picture behind what happens when you put him in the big chair: he is forever building and selling, even when it looks like he's buying. And so, two years after he became the chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, it should come as no shock that he has struck a deal to merge the company with its only direct rival, XM Satellite Radio. … Not coincidentally, if the deal goes through, he will again end up running the combined entity."

INDIAN AFFAIRS:

DOJ Grant Will Help Track Tribal Crime. The AP (3/4, Forliti) reports from Minneapolis, "Sgt. Bill Blake gave his anti-gang presentation to American Indian communities so many times, he says, that his daughter knew it by heart. Yet it wasn't enough: 'Dad, you have to do more,' he recalls her saying." The AP continues, "Nearly four years later, 20-year-old Erica Rae Blake was dead -- shot in the head at a party on a Wisconsin reservation. Her death was ruled an accident, but memory is driving Blake to work even harder to fight violence on reservations." The AP adds, "Blake set out to improve cooperation between tribal police, federal and local law enforcement, but quickly found a big obstacle: Nobody tracks hard data on crime occurring on tribal lands. … With the help of another Minneapolis police officer, Larry Loonsfoot, and an expected $600,000 grant from the Department of Justice, Blake hopes to create a database that would give tribes a tool to spot trends, share information and track offenders who seek sanctuary elsewhere. … 'We're never going to be able to address these problems and make things better in tribal communities when it comes to crime and quality of life unless we get the data,' said Blake, a member of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa." The AP notes, "The goal is to collect the data in a central location so law enforcement and tribes can identify problems and apply resources where needed. … 'I think what's unique about the Indian community is there is always some connection to the reservation,' said Loonsfoot, a member of Michigan's Keweenaw Bay Indian Community. 'We need to bridge that communication gap where we can directly enforce both ends.' … Blake said the I-CARE project -- it stands for Indian Crime Awareness Research and Evaluation -- will start small, with the ultimate goal of creating a national database. … Technology and money -- too little of both -- sometimes play a part in whether tribes collect and share crime data. A maze of overlapping jurisdictions hurts, too. For example, a crime on a Minnesota reservation may be handled by tribal police, a county sheriff, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the FBI or any combination of law enforcement. … That means data is absorbed by different agencies and a true picture of crime on a reservation can be harder to get. Without good numbers, a tribe may have a hard time getting grant money for a particular problem, or might not make the right choices for spending its crime-fighting dollars, Blake said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge To Rule On Medical Marijuana Case. The New York Times (3/4, Marshall) reports from San Francisco, "A federal judge has asked the United States attorney here to submit all trial preparation memorandums in the case against a leading advocate of medical marijuana so that the court can determine if the government has been pursuing a 'vindictive prosecution.'" The Times continues, "The judge, Charles R. Breyer, ordered the review at the request of lawyers for Ed Rosenthal, a spokesman in the effort to legalize marijuana who has been in a closely watched court battle with the government. … At a motion hearing in Federal District Court here on Friday, defense lawyers for Mr. Rosenthal urged Judge Breyer to dismiss an array of federal drug, money laundering and tax evasion charges against their client, saying an appellate court judge had overturned his conviction in a nearly identical case last year." The Times adds, "The new charges, outlined in a federal grand jury indictment issued in October, accuse Mr. Rosenthal of 14 felonies, including conspiracy to grow and sell marijuana for medical use, laundering $1,850 and failing to report income from the sale of crop plants on his tax returns. … The overall charges are nearly identical to a 2003 federal case against Mr. Rosenthal, which ended with a one-day prison sentence after members of the jury disavowed the verdict, having learned belatedly that Mr. Rosenthal was growing marijuana under Proposition 215, the state's medical marijuana law. … The United States attorney, George Beven, declined to answer questions about the case, citing an office policy. But at Friday's hearing he agreed to provide Judge Breyer with all interoffice memorandums pertaining to his office's decision to seek another trial and expanded charges."

DOJ_NMG_0139731

ATF Helps Iowa Police Tracking Firearms. The Waterloo-Cedar Falls (IA) Courier (3/4, Reinitz) reports, "A new computer program has sped up the first step Waterloo police take when tracing firearms they come across during criminal investigations. The Courier continues, "Last fall, three Waterloo officers were certified to use the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearm's eTrace system, which discloses the name of the person who first bought a certain weapon, the seller and the date of that sale. … In the past, police had to fill out paperwork which was then sent to ATF officials. Unless the trace was a high priority, it could take weeks or longer to get results. … 'Now it's Web-based, so you just go in and run it yourself,' said Sgt. Keith Smith, who works in the police department's crime lab." The Courier adds, "Results aren't instant and can still take hours or weeks. … An officer with investigations and an agent with the Tri-County Drug Enforcement Task Force are also authorized to use eTrace. … Aside from make, model and serial number, eTrace users type in a long list of information about the gun --- the caliber, the type of crime it was used in, what part of the house it was found in and so on. … Smith said the ATF apparently crunches that information for future statistics."

Man Charged After California Police Find Arsenal In Burning House. The Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise (3/4, Klein) reports, "A man who authorities described as a survivalist after investigators found a cache of weapons and ammunitions at his burning (Norco, CA) home has been arrested and jailed, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said Saturday." The P-E continues, "Thomas Lee McKiernan, 62, of Norco was arrested on suspicion of possession of assault weapons, possession of illegal ammunition, and possession of explosives, according to the sheriff's department. … McKiernan, who had been held since Thursday for a mental evaluation, remained at the Robert Presley Detention Center. His bail is currently set for $100,000 and he is scheduled to appear in Riverside Superior Court on Tuesday, according to his booking information." The P-E adds, "The only illegal items investigators have identified so far are five assault rifles, several high-capacity magazines and the 60 pounds of gunpowder, they said. It is illegal to possess more than one pound of gunpowder, Gutierrez said. … The cause of the fire is still unknown. Authorities condemned the house because of the tunnel. … It will take days for deputies and federal agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to document all the weapons and ammunition, Sheriff's spokesman Dennis Gutierrez said."

IMMIGRATION:

Administration Faces Quandary In Border Agents' Case. The Houston Chronicle (3/4, Mittelstadt) reports, "For weeks, defenders of the two former Border Patrol agents imprisoned for shooting a Mexican drug trafficker have bombarded the White House with calls, e-mails and petitions. … Their demand is straightforward: A presidential pardon for a pair of Texans they view as heroes persecuted for doing their jobs. … But the issue is far from simple for President Bush, who is being asked to wade into a highly controversial case where even the most basic facts are in dispute. The quandary for the president: Whether to side with former Border Patrol agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos or with the prosecutors who contend they were rogue officers who wounded a fleeing, unarmed man and then concealed evidence." The Chronicle continues, "During a February 2005 incident near Fabens, Texas, Compean and Ramos pursued Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila and fired 15 rounds at him as he ran back toward Mexico after ditching a vehicle with 743 pounds of marijuana. The wounded trafficker later was given immunity to testify against the agents in a case that has drawn a tremendous outcry from conservatives on and off Capitol Hill, who believe the Bush administration sided with a drug trafficker over its own law enforcement agents. … Though clemency is the one area in which a president has power unlimited by the courts or Congress, Bush thus far has indicated no inclination to sidestep the Justice Department regulations typically followed for pardons cases. … The Justice Department rules require that people petitioning for a pardon wait until five years after they have completed their sentence before filing an application. And the applications must be submitted by the guilty parties themselves." The Chronicle adds, "Compean and Ramos have not applied for a pardon or a commutation of their sentences, Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin said. … Rep. Ted Poe, a Republican from Humble who has championed the ex-agents' cause, has no use for what he views as needless red tape. … Douglas Berman, an Ohio State University law professor who has followed the Texas case, argues that while the Justice rules may protect the president, they also 'eliminate some of the virtue' of the pardon power. … By citing the regulations, Bush 'may be trying to cushion himself from the public clamoring to do something in this case,' Berman said."

DOJ_NMG_0139732

DOJ Says Prosecutor In Border Agents Case Is Safe. The San Antonio Express-News (3/4, Contreras) reports, "The Justice Department's recent firings of eight top federal prosecutors across the country have come amid allegations that the agency bowed to political pressure. … Even as the Justice Department rebuts the accusations, some are wondering who might be next." The Express-News continues, "In Central and West Texas, Johnny Sutton has held the post of U.S. attorney for more than five years, but he has come under fire recently over a case in El Paso in which Sutton's office gained convictions of Border Patrol agents who shot an alleged drug smuggler. … In a federal trial in El Paso last year, jurors convicted Ignacio 'Nacho' Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean on charges that they shot the alleged smuggler in the buttocks Feb. 17, 2005, and counts alleging they covered up the shooting. Ramos got 11 years in prison. Compean was sentenced to 12. Both have appealed. … Hailing them as 'heroes' who were wrongly convicted, some foes of illegal immigration and Republican members of Congress are pushing for President Bush to pardon them. … Without a satisfactory answer from the White House on the request, supporters of the agents are aiming at Sutton who, from Austin, supervises 120 federal prosecutors in the largest federal district in the country, a territory that stretches from Waco to San Antonio, south to Del Rio and west to El Paso and Midland/Odessa. … Sutton 'has violated the public's trust, and must be removed from office immediately,' said .J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, the union that represents 10,000 Border Patrol agents. … 'Our federal government had to make a choice between prosecuting somebody who was bringing in $1 million worth of drugs, and prosecuting two border agents who did not follow policy,' said U.S. Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, who stopped short of seeking Sutton's removal but has collected more than 40 signatures from fellow House members seeking congressional hearings on the case. 'The government chose the wrong side.' … The Justice Department had no comment Friday on whether mounting criticism would have an effect on Sutton's post. But a high-ranking department official told the Senate Judiciary Committee last month that Sutton's job is safe. The Feb. 6 hearing was to review the wave of terminated U.S. attorneys, the transcripts show. … 'No,' Paul J. McNulty, the No. 2 man in the Justice Department, responded to a question of whether Sutton's job was in danger over the controversial border agent case."

Colorado Using Inmates To Ease Farm Labor Shortage. The New York Times (3/4, A25, Frosch, 1.16M) reports, "As migrant laborers flee Colorado because of tough new immigration restrictions, worried farmers are looking to prisoners to fill their places in the fields. In a pilot program run by the state Corrections Department, supervised teams of low-risk inmates beginning this month will be available to harvest the swaths of sweet corn, peppers and melons that sweep the southeastern portion of the state. Under the program, which has drawn criticism from groups concerned about immigrants' rights and from others seeking changes in the criminal justice system, farmers will pay a fee to the state, and the inmates, who volunteer for the work, will be paid about 60 cents a day, corrections officials said." The Times notes that last year, the Colorado General Assembly "passed tough legislation that included giving local law enforcement broader powers to check immigration status and restricting access to social services for workers without proper documentation."

Illegals Pay Thousands Of Dollars For Citizenship Documentation. The Washington Times/AP (3/4) reports, "Government raids at meatpacking plants in six states in December stemmed from an investigation that uncovered up to 4,300 workers with questionable documentation." Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman Tim Counts "said that investigation revealed documents were available for a price in places as open as Kmart parking lots. He said genuine documents were the most expensive, costing up to $1,500, and the most effective against detection." Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke "said there isn't much specific information on the extent of the problem. 'Irrespective of the mode of identity theft, the issue itself is prevalent and it's something we're striking at very aggressively,' Mr. Knocke said.'"

Congress May Ease Restrictions On Children Of Filipino WWII Vets. The Washington Post (3/4, A6, Aizenman, 690K) reports, "virtually everyone in Congress appears to agree" that Filipino-born veterans "who fought alongside U.S. troops during World War II deserve a break. Denied the right to immigrate to the United States until 1990, they came hoping that their children could follow them here later, just as other groups have done. But the adult children have been required to wait twice as long -- up to 16 years -- as anyone else. With the veterans often too old and sick to travel home, many have died while waiting to be reunited with their families. Now, after several longtime backers have risen to key positions in Congress, Filipino American advocates are hopeful that legislation will be pushed through to exempt the veterans' children from the immigration delay. They also are optimistic about a potentially more controversial bill that would grant Filipino veterans military pensions."

DOJ_NMG_0139733

WPost Questions Bush's Commitment To "Pathway To Citizenship." The Washington Post (3/4, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "The early signs" regarding the prospects for immigration reform "are generally encouraging. The authors of the most realistic legislation in the last Congress…are again preparing to introduce a bipartisan bill. As for Mr. Bush, he has also sounded the right notes by calling in his State of the Union address for a 'legal and orderly path for foreign workers to enter our country,' and for resolving the status of more than 11 million illegal immigrants already here, 'without animosity and without amnesty.' Still, the president's fuzziness is worrying. He did not mention a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country in the State of the Union speech, and two of his Cabinet secretaries sidestepped it during recent testimony on Capitol Hill."

Columnist Says "We Should Uphold Our End Of The Bargain" For Immigrants. In his column for the Los Angeles Times (3/4, 850K) Gregory Rodriguez writes, "For hardworking illegal immigrants who've established roots here, we should uphold our end of the bargain and give them a chance to achieve their piece of the American dream."

TAX:

Cost Of AMT Repeal Analyzed. In a "Week in review" piece for the New York Times (3/4, WK7, 1.16M), David Cay Johnston writes, "Repealing the alternative minimum tax would cost the government almost $70 billion this year, while putting everyone on the alternative and repealing the regular income tax would cost only $63 billion. Simply removing personal tax exemptions and credits and indexing for inflation would reduce the number of taxpayers affected by 85 percent. … For now, the only area of wide agreement is to keep enacting temporary patches until Congress and some future administration tackle fundamental changes in the tax code."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Champion Substantial Expansion Of CHIP Coverage. The Washington Post (3/4, A8, Lee, 690K) reports the "success" of the Children's Health Insurance Program "is exposing Washington's familiar ideological divisions over health care." Members of Congress from both parties "want to continue the popular $5 billion-a-year effort, which at any given time provides health insurance to more than 4 million children. … But Republicans and Democrats cannot agree on how much money the program should get, and whom it should cover." The CBO estimates CHIP "will require $13 billion to $15 billion above current funding levels just to keep covering the same number of children for the next five years. The Bush administration has proposed $4.8 billion, saying that is enough to maintain enrollment for 'priority low-income children.' Many Democrats on Capitol Hill and advocates for children call the White House proposal inadequate, but the dispute is about more than numbers. Some Democrats…would like to increase funding levels by as much as $50 billion over five years to extend coverage to many of the nation's 8.3 million uninsured children -- and to some uninsured parents and childless adults as well."

WPost Urges Congress To Include Dental Care As CHIP Benefit. The Washington Post (3/4, B6, 690K), in an editorial, notes that 12-year-old Deamonte Driver "died last week because of a succession of breakdowns in a system set up to ensure that children get basic dental care that is critical to their health. Equally tragic is that there are many more children like Deamonte who are at risk. … Although not required, most states provide dental care under the State Children's Health Insurance Program to low-income children who don't qualify for Medicaid. That act is now up for reauthorization. Congress would do well to include dental care in the menu of benefits, as well as help out states that face budget shortfalls. Those worried about cost should think about Deamonte."

Warhead Plan Provokes Congressional Opposition. The Washington Post (3/4, A5, Pincus, 690K) reports, "The selection of a basic design for what could become a new generation of U.S. nuclear warheads has drawn immediate opposition from some key members of Congress." Rep. Peter J. Visclosky, the "new chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee that controls the funds for the nuclear weapons complex, has sharply questioned why a new warhead is needed," while Sen. Dianne Feinstein, "a longtime opponent of new nuclear weapons, has declared that she is '100 percent opposed' to building the RRW." However, some lawmakers support the plan, including Rep. Ellen Tauscher, whose district includes Livermore.

FDA On Verge Of Approving Antibiotic Despite Mounting Concerns. The Washington Post (3/4, Weiss, 690K), in a front-page article titled, "FDA Rules Override Warnings About Drug," reports the government "is on track to approve a new antibiotic to treat a pneumonia-like disease in cattle, despite warnings from health groups and a majority of the agency's own expert advisers that the decision will be dangerous for people. The drug, called cefquinome, belongs to a class of highly potent antibiotics that are among medicine's last defenses against several serious human infections. No drug from that class has been approved in the United States for use in animals." The FDA's advisory board last fall rejected a request "to market the drug for cattle. Yet by all indications, the FDA will approve cefquinome this spring."

DOJ_NMG_0139734

Boxer, Waxman Question Regulator's Ties To Chemical Industry. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Cone, 850K) reports on its front page, "For nearly a decade, a federal agency has been responsible for assessing the dangers that chemicals pose to reproductive health. But much of the agency's work has been conducted by a private consulting company that has close ties to the chemical industry, including manufacturers of a compound in plastics that has been linked to reproductive damage. In 1998, the Center for the Evaluation of Risks to Human Reproduction was established within the National Institutes of Health to assess the dangers of chemicals and help determine which ones should be regulated. Sciences International, an Alexandria, Va., consulting firm that has been funded by more than 50 industrial companies, has played a key role in the center's activities." Sen. Barbara Boxer and Rep. Henry Waxman "called for an explanation of the company's role and disclosure of its potential conflicts of interest before the panel convenes Monday."

Two New Books Jab At Bush From Different Angles. In a piece for the New York Times Book Review (3/4), Jacob Heilbrunn reviews "Leviathan On The Right: How Big-Government Conservatism Brought Down the Republican Revolution," by Michael D. Tanner; and "It Can Happen Here: Authoritarian Peril in the Age of Bush" by Joe Conason. Tanner "offers the fullest exposition" of the argument that Bush "isn't conservative enough" and exposes "Bush and the Republican leadership as apostates who foolishly believe big government can be employed for conservative ends." As for Conason, he "surveys the concentration of corporate and political power in Washington. He ably catalogs the Bush administration's attempts to subvert civil liberties. But it soon becomes apparent that he has a proclivity for substituting hyperbole for insight."

Newsweek Poll Finds Bush Approval At 31%, Cheney At 33%. A Newsweek poll of 1,017 registered voters surveyed February 28-March 1 (+/- 3%) finds 31% approve of the way President Bush is handling his job, while 61% disapprove and 8% don't know. On Iraq, 27% approve of Bush's performance, while 67% disapprove and 6% don't know. On terrorism and homeland security, 43% approve of Bush's performance, while 50% disapprove and 7% don't know. As for Vice President Cheney, 33% approve of the way he is handling his job, while 51% disapprove and 16% don't know.

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke "Quietly" Making His Presence Felt. The CBS Evening News (3/3, story 5, 2:10, Assuras, 7.66M) reported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke was left with "big shoes to fill" when he succeeded Alan Greenspan, who had "reached cult-like status and he still holds a lot of sway." Bernanke "faced his first major challenge" last week "when the Dow and Nasdaq suffered their biggest weekly drop in more than four years. How did Bernanke do?" CBS (Mason): "Quietly, Bernanke has tried to put his own imprint on the economy and the Fed…and Wall Street generally gives him high marks for keeping the economy on track, even as it slows down." Charles Schwab Chief Investment Strategist Liz Ann Sonders: "I think we will look back in history at an environment where Bernanke probably became as important and as noted as Alan Greenspan."

LATimes Sees Rarity Of Market Sell-Offs As Evidence Of Economic Stability. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, 850K), in an editorial, contends the "remarkable thing about last week's harrowing stock market plunge was how remarkable it was. And that's because for all the talk of the dangers of a post-9/11 world vulnerable to terrorism, oil shocks, warfare and rising anti-Americanism, the last few years have been unusually prosperous and stable for the global economy."

Newsweek Poll Finds Tight General Election Matchups. A Newsweek poll of 1,017 registered voters surveyed February 28-March 1 (+/- 3%) finds Rudy Giuliani leading Sen. Hillary Clinton 47% to 46% in a general election matchup. Giuliani leads Sen. Barack Obama 48% to 43%, and Giuliani leads John Edwards 47% to 45%. Clinton leads Sen. John McCain 47% to 46%, while Obama leads McCain 45% to 43%, and Edwards leads McCain 48% to 43%. Clinton leads Mitt Romney 53% to 38%, Obama leads Romney 54% to 34%, and Edwards leads Romney 58% to 30%. Among Democrats (+/- 6%), in a one-on-one nomination race Clinton leads Obama 55% to 35%, Clinton leads Edwards 62% to 29%, and Obama leads Edwards 46% to 39%. Among Republicans (+/- 7%), in a one-on-one nomination race Giuliani leads McCain 59% to 34%, McCain leads Romney 59% to 26%, and Giuliani leads Romney 70% to 20%. Also among Republican respondents, 51% said they are not sure where Giuliani stands on abortion, while 12% said he is pro-life; 67% are not sure where Giuliani stands on gun control; and 70% said they are not sure where Giuliani stands on gay marriage.

Romney Wins CPAC Straw Poll, With Giuliani Finishing Second. Mitt Romney won the presidential

DOJ_NMG_0139735

straw poll at the Conservative Political Action Conference, where 21% of the 1,705 voting attendees named the former Massachusetts governor as their first choice for the GOP nomination. Rudy Giuliani was second with 17%, followed by Sen. Sam Brownback at 15%, Newt Gingrich at 14%, and Sen. John McCain at 12%, with no other candidate topping five percent. ABC World News (3/3, story 8, 2:00, Weir, 8.78M) was the only network to report on CPAC, saying "it was the weekend for the conservatives to prove what they're made of. GOP presidential hopefuls are in Washington trying to show they have the conservative pedigree to win the crucial backing of the party's right wing."

The Washington Post (3/4, A4, Shear, 690K) said Romney's win is "a very early indication of how an important Republican constituency might vote," and "underscored the difficulty" McCain is facing in "drawing conservative support because of past views and statements." The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Hamburger, 850K) says McCain was "the only leading candidate who did not attend the event… and the mention of his name drew occasional boos from the audience."

On its front page, the Washington Times (3/4, Hallow, Dinan, 88K) says Gingrich "received a hero's welcome" at CPAC, tying Romney "for second place in the conference's combined first- and second-choice straw poll." With second-choice ballots included, Giuliani "vaulted to the top," followed by Gingrich and Romney, Brownback, McCain, and Rep. Tom Tancredo. American Conservative Union Executive Vice President J. William Lauderback said the "combined choice is the most important yardstick because it measures depth of support. … 'The Romney [second choice] number was markedly shallow at 9 percent,' he said."

The AP (3/3) says in last year's CPAC straw poll, then-Sen. George Allen led with 22%, followed by McCain at 20%, Giuliani at 12%, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at 10%.

GOP Frontrunners Condemn Coulter's Remark About Edwards. The New York Times (3/4, A24, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Giuliani, McCain, and Romney all "denounced" Ann Coulter, "one of their party's best-known conservative commentators," for "using an antigay epithet" in commenting on Democrat John Edwards in her Friday CPAC Speech. The three GOP frontrunners' statements "came after Democrats, gay rights groups and bloggers raised a storm of protest over the remarks." Giuliani said, "The comments were completely inappropriate and there should be no place for such name-calling in political debate." A McCain spokesman said, "The comments were wildly inappropriate." A Romney spokesman said, "It was an offensive remark. Gov. Romney believes all people should be treated with dignity and respect." The Times says the "criticisms by the Republican candidates put them in a difficult position" because CPAC "has been gathering for conservative and Republican leaders for over 25 years."

CNN.com (3/4) says "prominent politicians from both parties" were among those who "condemned right-wing commentator"
Coulter. The Edwards campaign "posted the video on their Web site, and asked readers to help them 'raise $100,000 in "Coulter Cash" this week to keep this campaign charging ahead and fight back against the politics of bigotry.'"

In a commentary for The Politico (3/3), conservative writer Jennifer Rubin says, "It's about time for a presidential contender, perhaps all of them in the spirit of Newt Gingrich's crusade for improving public discourse, to say 'enough.' Coulter's never-ending stream of venom is not amusing, unhelpful to Republicans, and not in keeping with the ideals of a party that fancies itself as the proponent of a colorblind society and heir to Lincoln."

Giuliani Tests Assumptions About His Ability To Win Nomination. Under the front-page headline "Giuliani Has No Real Chance With GOP Voters... Or Does He?" the Washington Post (3/4, Balz, 690K) writes that though the "presidential campaign is just weeks old," already "an article of faith within the Republican Party -- the belief that no politician who favors abortion rights and gay rights can win the GOP nomination -- is being challenged" by Rudy Giuliani. The former New York mayor "is now leading in a slew of national polls. He is testing whether cultural and religious conservatives in the GOP will support a candidate who offers strong leadership on security and terrorism rather than ideological purity on social issues." Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie, "who is neutral in the nominating battle," said, "This is the first Republican presidential primary since Sept. 11. Rudy Giuliani is a candidate who can clearly test the proposition that a Republican who is more moderate on social issues can capture the nomination. He's testing it now."

Romney Defends Judeo-Christian Tradition. The New Hampshire Union Leader (3/4, Rayno) reports Mitt Romney "said the Judeo-Christian values that helped found America continue to guide the country today. On the campaign trail and in the media, Romney has faced questions about his Mormon faith" and whether it will hurt his campaign. Romney said that "while this country welcomes Muslims, Hindus, Buddhists and other faiths…the Judeo-Christian tradition remains its foundation." In an interview, Romney said, "The fundamental principle of faith of Judeo-Christian [belief] is there is a God, who is our heavenly Father and all the people on this earth and every speck of humanity on this earth is a creation of God…and every creation of humanity is a child of God."

DOJ_NMG_0139736

Hunter Campaign Drops Two South Carolina State Co-Chairmen. South Carolina's The State (3/4) reports the presidential campaign of Rep. Duncan Hunter has "dropped" two state co-chairmen "for making unpopular remarks." Last week, Horry County Auditor Lois Eargle said she "told a woman looking for free legal help for her abused child 'to get back to Mexico.'" In addition, Henry Jordan, a onetime school board member, was cut from the campaign because he said during a board meeting 10 years ago, "Screw the Buddhists and kill the Muslims." The campaign "took the pair off its list of a fistful of state co-chairmen -- honorary titles for regional supporters -- because it feared the increasing scrutiny from bloggers and media, said Ron Tyler, Hunter's spokesman."

Thompson Campaigns In Iowa. The AP (3/3) reports Tommy Thompson "may not have drawn huge crowds during campaign stops across southern Iowa" Saturday, "but some of the Iowans who saw him liked what they heard. Thompson covered several domestic issues and detailed his plan for handling the Iraq war to about three dozen people at a Mount Pleasant restaurant." One man said Thompson "has qualities the country needs in a president including intelligent leadership," while one woman "says she liked Thompson's solutions to welfare reform in Wisconsin."

Selma Is Latest Stop In Clinton-Obama Fight For Black Support. The New York Times (3/4, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports on its front page that Democratic frontrunners Sen. Hillary Clinton, John Edwards, and Sen. Barack Obama "are embroiled in what party officials believe is one of the most competitive scrambles for black supporters since the Voting Rights Act was passed four decades ago." Clinton and Obama will be in Selma, Alabama, today to "commemorate the 42nd anniversary of Bloody Sunday, when hundreds of activists…crossed the Edmund Pettus Bridge during a civil rights march from Selma to Montgomery." Edwards will be speaking on civil rights at the University of California, Berkeley. Rep. John Lewis, a Selma marcher, says he "is agonizing over whether to choose Mr. Obama, whom he once described as 'the future of the Democratic Party,'" or Clinton. The Times says in early primaries in states like Alabama and South Carolina, "black support could be vital," and "at least 16 states are considering voting on Feb. 5, including Florida, California, Illinois, New York and Texas, all states where black voters could hold considerable sway."

The Washington Post (3/4, D1, 690K) interviews Lewis, who said, "If you have Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama in a formal presence there on the bridge walking together, I think it will send a strong message of people coming together. It will be beyond politics. What happened in Selma 42 years ago, and what I hope will happen [today], transcends politics. It says something about the distance we've come and the progress we've made as a nation and a people, to have the top two contenders for the nomination for president to be a woman and an African American."

Newsday (3/4, Thrush) says 21-year-old South Carolina State Rep. Bakari Sellers, the "youngest legislator in the United States and one of the African-American Democrats most rabidly courted by the 2008 presidential contenders," was "personally lobbied" by Clinton, but he is now about to endorse Obama. Seller said, "For her sake, she needs to get Bill Clinton out there a lot more."

Geffen Feud Said To Have Hurt Clinton Against Obama. The Washington Times (3/4, Lambro, 88K) reports on its front page that "political pollsters said" Clinton's "decline in the polls stems partly from her attack" on Obama. The "numbers changed after the senators traded political blows through their spokesmen when movie mogul David Geffen" criticized Clinton. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Braun, Morain, 850K) examines the relationship between ex-President Clinton and Geffen, saying that while Geffen "lavished nearly $1.2 million on the Clintons and other Democrats during the Clinton White House years, gaining extraordinary access to the president," their relations "were in constant flux. Intimates of the two said that flashpoints surfaced often." Their alliance "was marked by genuine affection, colleagues say, and a large measure of self-interest. Whether its meltdown has any lasting significance remains to be seen, but Geffen's recent broadside against the Clintons left the political world agape."

In his Washington Post (3/4, B7, 690K) column, George Will writes that Clinton's campaign "did not display overconfidence when it directed the recent fusillade" at Obama. Her campaign's "rhetorical megatonnage was in response to a prominent Obama contributor saying rude things about her. Her overreaction was one of several developments that have clarified the Democratic contest. Bill Clinton has said, regarding presidential candidates, that Republicans like to fall in line and Democrats like to fall in love. Which explains the Clinton campaign's palpable panic: Democrats have fallen in love, but not with her." Her supposed "aura of inevitability…annoys voters by telling them that they really have no choice. And that can provoke them to play the game that G.K. Chesterton called 'Cheat the Prophet': The players listen politely to explanations of what is inevitable, then they make something else happen."

In his New York Times (3/4, WK12, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich says the "long-running Iraq catastrophe is now poised to mow down a second generation of political prey: presidential hopefuls who might have strongly challenged Bush war policy when it counted and didn't." As for Clinton, her poll numbers "are showing erosion -- some of it because of Mr. Obama's growing profile among African-Americans, but some of it…after her dust-up with the Hollywood tycoon David Geffen. Most Washington hands declared Mrs. Clinton the winner in that spat because she had forced Mr. Obama off his high horse of 'hope.' But there's no evidence to support this theory. In the real world, most Americans don't know who Mr. Geffen is. … The most revealing aspect of the incident was not in any case the who's-up-who's-down prognostications for a primary process some 10 months away. Rather, it was the fervor with which the Clinton campaign accused Mr. Geffen and Mr. Obama of practicing 'the politics of personal destruction.' This over-the-top reaction seemed detached from reality, almost as if the Clinton camp were nostalgically wishing it could refight the last political war -- and once again clobber repellent old impeachment nemeses."

DOJ_NMG_0139737

Clinton's Style Of Apologizing Examined. The New York Times (3/4, WK4, Healy, 1.16M) says Clinton does not have "an allergy to apologizing. She just does it in her own, very Hillary way, as a review of her apologies shows." She "can be rather artful" at "turning around her apologies to generate sympathy for herself," and "self-deprecation is another trademark." And, "like many talented politicians, on matters of state…her admission of error can be so nuanced that listeners may wonder if an apology was really her point."

Obama Addresses Labor Activists In Chicago. ABC World News (3/3, story 7, :20, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "On the campaign trail today, Sen. Barack Obama rallied supporters in Chicago promising to back legislation friendly to organized labor." The Chicago Tribune (3/4, McCormick, 617K) reports Obama, addressing about 1,500 labor activists, "reflected on the crusades of Martin Luther King in support of the labor movement. 'He didn't just march for justice that day,' he said. 'They were marching for jobs.'" Two protesters "briefly interrupted Obama's speech. One of them carried a large sign that appeared to be critical" of Obama's Friday assertion that he "would not rule out military action against Iran. … 'OK. We appreciate that,' Obama said, trying to deflect the situation, as the protesters were escorted from the ballroom. 'I oppose the war in Iraq.'" The AP (3/3) also reports on Obama's speech.

Richardson Says He Will Work Harder Than Frontrunners To Win. The Des Moines Register (3/3, Beaumont, 160K) reports Gov. Bill Richardson "said Friday on his first trip to Iowa as a presidential candidate that he will challenge the better-known Democrats running for the 2008 nomination by working harder to reach party activists in the leadoff caucus state." Richardson said, "My campaign mode is shaking hands, meeting people, being scrutinized, talking issues. Iowans, I understand, like to decide . They like to decide, not who the pundits and the polls decide." He said that "getting U.S. troops out of Iraq within a year and dramatically diminishing the nation's use of petroleum in 10 years" are his "top priorities. … 'Bill Richardson is not a rock star,' Richardson said during a taping of Iowa Press, a public affairs program on Iowa Public Television. 'Bill Richardson is a grass-roots candidate.'"

Brooks Lauds Richardson. In a flattering column in the New York Times (3/4, WK12, 1.16M) headlined "Neither Clinton, Nor Obama," David Brooks considers Richardson's candidacy, writing that while "watching a cattle call of Democratic presidential candidates on C-Span," he was "quietly contemplating suicide. … In their five-minute speeches, they were laying it on thick with poll-tested, consultant-driven clichés of the Our Children Are Our Future variety. The thought of having to spend the next two years listening to this drivel set me wondering if it was literally possible to be bored to death. Then Bill Richardson walked onstage" and "gave the best presentation, by far." He is "the most experienced person running for president. He served in Congress for 14 years. He was the energy secretary. … He's a successful two-term governor…with foreign policy experience. He was U.N. ambassador. He worked in the State Department. He's made a second career of negotiating on special assignments with dictators like Saddam, Castro and Kim Jong Il. He negotiated a truce in Sudan." Brooks says he "wouldn't bet a paycheck on Richardson. But I wouldn't count him out. At the moment, he's the candidate most likely to rise."

Kucinich Lays Out Iraq Withdrawal Plan In New Hampshire. The New Hampshire Union Leader (3/4, Kozubek) reports Rep. Dennis Kucinich "outlined his 12-point plan for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq during a meeting with residents in the basement of the Merrimack Public Library yesterday." Kucinich said the "initial and perhaps most important step for a stable Iraq is to stop funding military operations that are contributing to a civil war, insurgency and more casualties."

Past GOP House Candidates Call For Changes At NRCC. The Boston Globe (3/4, Klein, 413K) reports that "four months after Republicans lost control of Congress," many defeated or slimly elected Republicans "are calling for major changes" at the National Republican Congressional Committee. They "depict the committee as a rogue attack-ad shop that shielded party leaders from having to account for the claims in their ads -- encouraging over-the-top accusations that often hurt GOP candidates." Ray Meier, a GOP candidate in upstate New York "whose Democratic opponent was wrongly accused of making adult fantasy calls," said, "They weren't just attacking my opponent -- they were, bit by bit, destroying a reputation that I had spent years and years building." Rep. Christopher Shays, "who is among the 2006 candidates who feel the NRCC's actions hurt his campaign, said he plans to file a bill that would allow candidates in both parties to prohibit the national parties from advertising on their behalf." But Rep. Tom Reynolds, who headed the NRCC during the 2006 cycle, "defended the ads, saying they were well-documented and generally effective. He conceded that his independent expenditure arm 'took a lot of liberties,' but said Democratic committees also stretched the truth." He said NRCC ads "saved 10 to 20 Republican-held seats."

DOJ_NMG_0139738

Pioneering Lobbyist Cassidy Profiled. The Washington Post (3/4, A1, Kaiser, 690K) profiles Gerald Cassidy, founder of Cassidy & Associates, saying he "helped invent the new Washington, which had made him seriously rich. … He and his original partner, whom he forced out of the firm 20 years earlier, devised a new kind of business, subsequently mimicked by many others. Their innovation was the first modern 'earmarked appropriations.'" The Post says that while the Jack Abramoff story "is a crude pulp thriller punctuated by free dinners, lavish golfing outings, big campaign contributions, arm-twisting and old-fashioned bribery," Cassidy's "is a subtler epic that probably reveals more about the culture of Washington, D.C. It, too, involves favors, gifts and contributions, but they are supplemented by the disciplined application of intellect, hard work, salesmanship and connections."

Defense Appropriations Bill Earmarks Described. The Washington Post (3/4, B2, 690K) reports, "Last week, the Washington group Taxpayers for Common Sense released a compendium of 2,646 spending projects earmarked for lawmakers' home states and congressional districts in the 2007 defense appropriations bill. In many cases, the legislation itself provides only a vague description of the project, and omits the name of the company or community that would benefit. Taxpayers for Common Sense filled in the details by using lobbying disclosure databases, congressional news releases and Internet sites. New measures passed by Congress this year will require detailed disclosure in future legislation of the recipient of such earmarks, as well as the identity of the member seeking them." The Post goes on to list several earmarks and provide brief background information on their origins.

Bush's Recent Foreign Policy Shifts Draw Mixed Reaction. In an analysis piece, Peter Baker writes in the Washington Post (3/4, A5, 690K) that the "same president who mocked the idea of talking with Iran and Syria as recently as two weeks ago is now sending emissaries to a regional conference to talk with Iran and Syria. … Last week's decision was the latest of several reversals on issues on which he once refused to budge." Bush has fired Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "authorized direct talks with North Korea, sent more troops to Iraq," and "agreed to discuss the contours of a Palestinian state in Middle East peace negotiations" -- all ideas "he rejected earlier." Among those quoted in the piece who approve of the president's recent moves are ex-Rep. Lee Hamilton and ex-Sen. Warren Rudman, but Michael Ledeen of the American Enterprise Institute is quoted as saying, "I have never seen an administration with such an enormous gulf between the president's public statements and its actions. … Presidential statements should reflect policy. They don't seem to in this administration."

Bush May Encounter "Aura" Of Chavez During Latin America Trip. The Houston Chronicle (3/4, Althaus, Otis, Reinert, 530K) previews President Bush's Latin America trip, which begins Thursday. "Packing strategies for fostering trade, fighting drug-traffickers and fending off the regionwide shift to the political left," Bush will "start a swing through the friendlier parts of Latin America. He'll talk energy and free trade in Brazil and Uruguay. Those topics -- as well as crime, punishment and border jumping -- will dominate the conversations in Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico." The Chronicle adds, "At every turn, Bush almost certainly will work to counter" Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who "ranks among the world's more vocal and influential Bush-bashers" and whose "aura hovers over Bush's trip like a holiday-spoiling drizzle." The White House is trying to portray the trip "as a show of support for democratic governments." Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Shannon said "the visit also is meant to deliver the message that the governments must lift up their poor and vulnerable."

Ahmadinejad, Abdullah Agree To Curb Middle East Violence. ABC World News (3/3, story 5, :20, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "The president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, made his first official visit to Saudi Arabia today. Since the Saudis are major American allies and Sunnis, there is hope talks with the Shiite Iranians could help ease tensions throughout the Middle East. The White House still accuses Iran of fueling violence in Iraq and Lebanon while secretly building nuclear weapons."

The New York Times (3/4, A10, Fattah, 1.16M) reports the two leaders met in Riyadh yesterday "to address the Middle East's growing sectarian and political crises." Ahmadinejad "was greeted at the airport by King Abdullah, a rare honor from the aging monarch," and "he was the guest of honor at a state dinner put on by the king and attended by top Saudi officials and dignitaries." The visit "is widely believed to have been set up at the behest of the Iranians. It was the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts by the two regional powers, as well as other Arab countries." The two leaders

DOJ_NMG_0139739

"were believed to be focused on finding ways to end the political standoff in Lebanon between Hezbollah" and Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government. Saudi Arabia and Iran "have expressed alarm at the sectarian violence in Iraq, worrying that it could fuel similar tensions throughout the Middle East."

AFP (3/3, Georgi) says the talks "had been expected to focus on the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq, the crisis in Lebanon and Tehran's nuclear row with the West." BBC.com (3/4) notes the two leaders "agreed to work together to fight sectarian strife in the Middle East." Their "summit comes at a time of sectarian division and tension between Saudis and Iran over events in Iraq and Lebanon."

Iranian Merchants Not Pleased By Their President. NBC Nightly News (3/3, story 4, 2:30, Ian Williams, 9.87M) sampled public opinion inside Iran, where "politically powerful" merchants "are not a particularly happy bunch." Reza Elmanan, carpet trader: "Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has not delivered on his economic promises." Williams: "Inflation and Iran's growing isolation are hitting them where it hurts most, in their wallets." Mohamad Yasrebi, jewelry trader: "Sales are much worse than last we're year. I am worried about sanctions. Things will get even worse than they already are." Williams: "Many blame as what they see as Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reckless policy towards the United States."

North Korean Nuclear Inspections Could Test US Claims. Under the headline, "North Korea Inspections Will Put U.S. To The Test Too," the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Drogin, 850K) reports, "North Korea's unexpected promise last month to open its nuclear weapons arsenals and production facilities to U.N. inspectors provided a welcome foreign policy success for the White House, but may prove embarrassing as well." Renewed inspections could show whether or not "the Bush administration overstated a purported secret North Korean program to produce highly enriched uranium for nuclear bombs in 2002." Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte "said Friday that inspections should resolve the questions. The recent accord calls for a 'full and complete' accounting of North Korea's nuclear programs, including 'its uranium enrichment activities,' he told reporters in Tokyo." An anonymous "U.S. diplomat with access to the intelligence said the administration was 'trying to walk back some of the rhetoric. The problem is they've opened up a can of worms. Was this another case of faulty intelligence, like Iraq? Or is it possible they cooked the books?'"

A McClatchy (3/4) analysis of this week's North Korean talks says the dialogue "will be a turning point for both countries -- and it could be the beginning of a transformation for President Bush." Noting "a bipartisan tradition of two-term presidents turning to diplomacy in their final years in office," McClatchy says "one big question about Bush's opening to North Korea and steps last week that could lead to a dialogue with Iran and Syria is whether a vision of peace is the driving force or desperation over a string of diplomatic failures, last fall's elections and a failing war in Iraq."

China Warns Negroponte Against Missile Sales To Taiwan. The AP (3/4, McDonald) reports Chinese officials "pressed visiting Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte on Saturday to reject a proposed sale of missiles to Taiwan, the self-ruled island that Beijing claims as its own territory." A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman is quoted saying, "The Chinese side expressed that it is firmly opposed to the export and sale of weapons to Taiwan and the United States maintaining official relations with Taiwan." Taiwan "is trying to buy 218 AMRAAM medium range air-to-air missiles and another 235 Maverick missiles at an estimated cost of $421 million." Under the headline, "China Warns Negroponte On Taiwan Arms Sales," AFP (3/4, Martin) notes Beijing "warned" Negroponte "that plans to sell American missiles to Taiwan threatened to harm Sino-US ties."

Amid "Renewed Confidence," Beijing To Accelerate Defense Spending. The AP (3/4) notes comments by National People's Congress spokesman Jiang Enzhu that Beijing's "military spending, a point of contention with the United States, will jump 17.8 percent this year." Jiang said "that military spending would hit $44.94 billion in 2007 — an increase of $6.84 billion over last year, though experts believe the true figure of China's military spending could be several times the amount that it reports." He "said most of the money would be spent on boosting wages and living allowances for the 2.5 million-member People's Liberation Army, and on upgrading armaments." The AP says Beijing's "renewed confidence" and "certainty says much about change in a political system in which the Communist Party tightly controls the reins of power but ordinary Chinese, emboldened by economic and social changes, feel increasingly free to voice opinions."

Chinese Stock Markets Evolve As Status Grows. In a front-page piece, the Washington Post (3/4, Cha, 690K) examines the growing international importance of China's "quirky" stock markets. "The Shanghai exchange and its smaller counterpart in Shenzhen, near the country's extreme southern border, have long been viewed skeptically by global capitalists, even those enthusiastic about the broader Chinese economy. … Though China's is one of the fastest-growing economies in the world, it remains heavily influenced by the Communist state. The stock markets are not the main source of capital in China -- that role is played by banks, all of them controlled or heavily influenced by the Chinese government. Many analysts also see the stock markets as subject to more government manipulation than is the norm in capitalist countries." A New York Times (3/4, WK3, Porter, 1.16M) piece looks at the possible ramifications of last weeks' nine percent drop in the Shanghai stock exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0139740

Researcher Says US Policies Have Strengthened China. In a Washington Post (3/4, B7, 690K) op-ed today, novelist and Claremont Institute fellow Mark Helprin says US policymakers should focus their nuclear nonproliferation efforts on Beijing, not Pyongyang. Chinese officials have found success amid "chaos, poverty and without modern arms, but with strategy bred in the bone." Beijing has "received generous assistance from the past two American presidents, who have accomplished first a carefree diminution of our orders of battle and then the incompetent deployment of what was left, in a campaign analogous to losing a protracted struggle with Portugal. China advances and we decline because, among other things, its vision is disciplined and clear, while ours is burdened by fear, decadence and officials who understand neither Chinese grand strategy nor its nuclear component." Helprin clarifies, "The danger lies not solely in quantitative instabilities but in potential nuclear strategies that technical evolution has elevated above Cold War paradigms."

Anti-Putin Rally In St. Petersburg Ends In Violence, Arrests. Under the headline, "Russian Police Beat Democracy Activists," the Washington Post/AP (3/4, A14) notes Russian "police clubbed protesters and dragged them into waiting buses Saturday in response to a defiant demonstration against the Kremlin in the heart of President Vladimir Putin's home town." Protesting "what they said was Russia's rollback from democracy," the activists created "a rare gathering of the country's often fractious opposition." The AP notes "riot police beat dozens of protesters with truncheons, but several thousand broke through police cordons." Garry Kasparov, "who helped organize the event, said on Echo Moskvy radio that as many as 6,000 people participated, though the crowd appeared to be about half that number." The New York Times (3/4, Kramer, 1.16M) calls the protest "one of the higher-profile actions by Mr. Kasparov since he retired from professional chess to dedicate himself to opposition politics."

Russian Academic Says Cooperation Begins With Recognizing Russia's Role. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (3/4, B5, 690K), the Russian Academy of Sciences' Sergey Rogov says both Russia and the US are to "blame" for their failure to become "strategic partners" after the Cold War ended. "The relationship with Russia no longer dominates America's foreign policy. Washington has stopped treating Moscow as an equal player. … On issues of international security, Russia has been treated as a second-rate power whose complaints can be ignored." In addition, "the old arms-control regime is half-dead." Russia is back as an international player" and "should be treated as a responsible player, sharing the rights and the duties of membership in the community of democratic market economies in a globalized world." Both nations' "goal should be a new cooperation, not a new Cold War."

Pentagon Policy Review Could Remove Balkans' "Combat" Designation. The Washington Post (3/4, A6, White, 690K) notes Defense Department officials "are considering a proposal to downgrade the combat status of U.S. forces who are part of the NATO peacekeeping mission in Kosovo, a decision that could cause the 1,500 U.S. soldiers currently deployed there to lose hundreds or even thousands of dollars each month in tax benefits and combat pay." That move "would indicate that Pentagon officials do not believe Kosovo is still a combat zone, despite rising tensions in the Balkans over Kosovo's ongoing bid for independence and frequent U.S. missions that involve dangerous interdictions of smuggling rings, raids on armed extremist groups and encounters with improvised bombs."

Ethnic Albanians Demonstrate In Kosovo's Capital. The New York Times (3/4, A6, Wood, 1.16M) reports, "For the second time in less than a month, thousands of ethnic Albanians took to the streets" of Kosovo's capital city, Pristina, "on Saturday to protest a United Nations proposal for Kosovo's future — a plan that they say falls far short of their desire for an independent state." Protests leaders "complain that [the UN] proposal is merely a ruse to sustain foreign domination and give unacceptable rights to the province's Serbs."

Mexican Drug Cartels Shift To Overland Trafficking Routes. On its front page today, the Los Angeles Times (3/4, Tobar, 850K) says "Central America has become a crucial way station in the billion-dollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies." The Times adds, "Everyone from impoverished fishermen and small-town mayors to legislators and high-ranking police officials has been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico." A DEA official said "Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs 'for the foreseeable future.'"

Paredes Takes Over Leadership Of Mexico's PRI. The Los Angeles Times (3/4, Enriquez, Sánchez, 850K) reports former governor and federal lawmaker Beatriz

DOJ_NMG_0139741

Paredes will attempt "to steer the PRI toward the left and back to glory." Today she "assumes leadership of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which in the span of a decade sank from Mexico's greatest political force to third-place finisher in last year's presidential election." While the PRI "still holds a majority of local and state offices," it "is fractured by competing interest groups and politicians, and broad discontent among its formerly loyal base, Mexico's 50 million poor." Paredes said "she would lead a new, more democratic PRI."

Sudan's President Refuses To Extradite Accused War Criminals. The AP (3/4, Osman) notes Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "said again on Saturday that his country would not hand over for trial any citizen sought by international courts for crimes against humanity." He is quoted saying, "(The) Sudanese judiciary is honest and qualified to try any Sudanese… The government will not hand over any citizen for trial outside the country." Last week, an International Criminal Court "prosecutor accused a minister and a member of the security forces of a combined 51 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their actions in Darfur."

Frist Implores US To Intervene To End Attacks On Aid Workers. In an op-ed in the Washington Times (3/4, 88K), former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says "the world's effort to stop genocide [in Darfur] has run into serious trouble." He argues that "it's time for the United States and the rest of the developed world to take serious action and ensure the aid flow continues." The "very presence of international aid operations has made a truly awful disaster a tad less terrible. … The risks in Darfur are particularly grave: Because of Darfur's climate, even a brief disruption of water supplies alone can kill children and any who already are sick." Now, "the perpetrators of the genocide appear intent on launching a systematic campaign of violence against humanitarian aid workers." Frist concludes that, should attacks on aid workers continue, "an already gruesome death toll will grow even higher. The United States needs to help."

New Indian Child Labor Law Has "Little Effect" On Industry. The New York Times (3/4, A8, Gentleman, 1.16M) says changes to Indian child labor laws have not curtailed abuses. "India has no outright ban on child labor and had long allowed the employment of children under 14 in all but what are deemed 'hazardous' occupations. But last October a stricter law took effect; it prohibits the employment of children under 14 in hotels and restaurants, and as domestic servants. Five months later, children's rights advocates say, the law has had little effect. Under-age children, mostly girls, are as in demand as ever to be maids and nannies." Officials estimate "that 12 million children under 14 are employed; children's advocates say the figure could be closer to 60 million."

British MP Says US-UK Relations Could Rebound After Blair. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/4, B1, 690K), British MP and former Cabinet minister Sir Malcolm Rifkind writes, "The British have been puzzled about Tony Blair for some time. Americans, particularly the one who lives in the White House, must be beginning to share the same feelings." Blair announced British troop reductions in Iraq "at precisely the same time that President Bush, his close friend, is trying to convince Congress and the American people of the wisdom of a substantial increase in the U.S. troop commitment to the same country." Blair's "own domestic weakness dictated this timetable," and Rifkind says "there is now a widespread belief in the United Kingdom that Iraq has been the worst disaster in British foreign policy since" the 1956 invasion of Egypt. … It would be wrong to ignore the fact that the Iraq war and the unilateral, Manichaean foreign policy of the Bush presidency has had a profound impact on British opinion." However, "that mood is far from irreversible," and "there is little evidence of British public opinion turning to the European Union as an alternative to the United States in its affections."

Kristof Lauds US Base In Djibouti For Diplomatic Humanitarian Outreach. In his New York Times (3/4, WK13, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof praises the "little-known" US military in Djibouti "that represents one of our best strategies to fight terrorism in the coming years: The aim is to build things rather than blow them up." He continues, "After 9/11, the focus of America's response to terrorism has been mostly on using military force to destroy possible threats in places like Iraq and intimidate just about everyone." This "strategy has backfired catastrophically, particularly in Iraq, and turned us into Al Qaeda's best recruiter. So that's why the softer touch in Centcom's strategy [in Djibouit] is so welcome. It aims to help bring stability to northeastern Africa and to address humanitarian needs -- knowing that humanitarian involvement will make us safer as well."

Authors Attribute Local Climate Changes To Global Trends. Today the New York Times (3/4, 1.16M) features three international authors' takes on global climate change. Iain McCalman writes that Australia "feels like a war zone. Cities and towns across the country are enveloped in a perpetual smoke haze, and the braying of fire sirens is as commonplace as birdsong." Tahmima Anam says a "mere two-degree rise in the global climate will cause large tracts" of the Bangladesh delta "to disappear, and two degrees after that, the rivers will be wider than the plains, and two degrees after that, the water will have swallowed Bangladesh." Kristin Steinsdottir says in the icinity of Reykjavik, Iceland, "the skiing areas had been shut down one by one during the previous winters, and the little snow that actually fell was always blown away. … The last 10 years in Reykjavik were the warmest on record, at least since records have been kept."

DOJ_NMG_0139742

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Drug Traffickers Re-Route Through Central America."
"Chemical Regulators Tied To Products."
"Sloan Tries To Make MGM Roar Again."
"Disney 'Fairy Tale' Isn't For Everyone."

New York Times:
"Doubts Rise As States Hold Sex Offenders After Prison Terms."
"Recalling Civil Rights, Democrats Seek Black Votes."
"A Teenage Soldier's Goodbyes On The Road To Over There."
"A New Mystery To Prosecutors: Their Lost Jobs."
"In Baghdad, Sectarian Lines Too Deadly To Cross."
"Facing N.C.A.A., The Best Defense Is A Legal Team."

Washington Post:
"The Power Player: How The Rise Of One Lobbying Firm Helped Transform The Way Washington Works."
"FDA Rules Override Warnings About Drug."
"China's Quirky Stock Market Finally Matters."
"Giuliani Has No Real Chance With GOP Voters… Or Does He?"

Washington Times:
"Not In Race, Gingrich Still Has Right Stuff."
"Sunnis Slain Over Talks With Shi'ites."
"State Ruling Awaited On Sex-Ed Challenge."
"Hillary's Snipe At Obama Erodes Standing In Polls."
"Silicon Valley Redirects Its Energies To Clean Fuels."

Detroit Free Press:
"Manhunt Continues."
"Stephen Grant: 'I Was The Perfect Mom -- Not Tara.'"
"Harper Woods Car Crash Leaves Three Dead."
"Indians Show Tigers Their Muscle."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Survivor: 'I Knew We Were Flipping.'"
"Father 'Had A Really Bad Feeling.'"
"Many Crashes At Northside Exit."
"Players Visit Injured Coach."

Dallas Morning News:
"Fair Park-Area Businesses Hope Rivalry Games Stay Put."
"Power Failure Came Before TXU Buyout."
"Dallas Mayoral Hopefuls Need Diverse Support."
"FW Law Students Reviewing Dallas County Cases."
"Ishmael Beah's Memoir Details Horrors Of Life As A Child Soldier."
"The Gift Of Friendship."
"Longhorns Can't Finish What They Started."
"Seniors Have Their Day For A&M."

Houston Chronicle:
"Freed Sex Offenders Fall Through Cracks."
"Job Lured Alleged Al-Qaida Trainee To Houston."
"Pastor, Gamer Nabbed In Texas Warrant Sweep."
"Chavez's Clout Clouds Bush Latin America Trip."
"Two Charged In Montrose Marijuana House Case."
"Texans Redo Johnson's Deal, Miss Out On QB."
"Rockets Lose Poise, Fall 97-74 To Spurs."
"Hip-Hop Stars Help Fans Focus On Finances."
"Cy-Fair Girls Come Up Short In Bid For A State Title."
"Houston Officials Plan For Inner Loop Growth."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush-Tornado Areas; Midwestern Storm; Al Qaeda-Afghanistan; Iraq Violence; Ahmadinejad-Saudi Arabia; Walter Reed; Obama-Clinton; CPAC; Atlanta Bus Crash; Stolen Rockwell; Denmark Riots; Homelessness; Swiss-Lichtenstein; Rock Camp.
CBS: Bush-Tornado Areas; Atlanta Bus Crash; Iraq Violence; Walter Reed; Bernanke-Economy; Subprime Mortgages; Stolen Rockwell; Lunar Eclipse; Terrorism Web Sites; Free Throw Coach.
NBC: Bush-Tornado Areas; Atlanta Bus Crash; Walter Reed; Military Medical Teams; Iran-Public Opinion; Denmark Riots; Stolen Rockwell; Daylight Savings Time; Lunar Eclipse; Adventure Vacations.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:
PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: COUNTIES _ The National Association of Counties (NACo) holds its 2007 Legislative Conference. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW. Contacts: Jim Phillipps, 202-942-4220. Notes: Media may obtain a conference press pass by visiting the Bancroft Room on the Terrace Level. Contact Jim Philipps at 202-942-4220 or jphilippsnaco.org for more information.

DOJ_NMG_0139743

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS _ The Institute of International Bankers holds its Washington conference. Location: Four Seasons Hotel, 2800 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. Contacts: William Goodwin, 212-421-1611 ext 12.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0139744

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, March 5, 2007 8:17 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, March 04, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070304.pdf; dojclips070304.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Job Lured Alleged Al-Qaida Trainee To Houston (HC) 4
Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists (LAT) 5
Extend Legal Rights To Guantanamo (WP) 7
The Must-Do List (NYT) 8

Homeland Response:

Bush Tours Tornado-Damaged Areas In South (WP/AP) 11
Bush Consoles Victims Of Tornadoes In The South (NYT) ... 11
Bush To Americans: 'Help The Folks Down Here' (CNN) 12
Mayor: New Orleans 'Piled It On' For $77 Billion Lawsuit (AP) 13
After Dubai Ports World (WP) 14
Naked Came The Passenger (WP) 14
Editorial: Everyone Not As Confident As AG On Supermax (CCDR) 15

War News:

Airstrikes Kill Insurgents, U.S. Says (WP) 16
U.S. Airstrikes Hit Qaeda Post In Iraq (NYT) 17
British Trace Missile In Copter Strike To Iran (WT) 18
Agreement Allows U.S. Presence In Sadr City (KCS/MCT) 19
Iran War Weapons Fuel Iraq Insurgency (AP) 20
Iraq Violence Takes Toll On Aid Groups (LAT) 21
Desperation Helps Out In Baghdad (WP) 23
Walter Reed Changes Planned (WP) 24
Iraq PM Vows Cabinet Shakeup In 2 Weeks (AP) 25
Sunnis Slain Over Talks With Shi'ites (WT/AP) 26
Iraq Terror Group Posts Tape Of Killings (AP) 28
In Baghdad, Sectarian Lines Too Deadly To Cross (NYT) 29
Marriages Between Sects Come Under Siege In Iraq (WP) ... 32
In Iraq, 'Dating' Happens Online (LAT) 34
Choosing A Sect (NYT) 36
Military Faces Growing Ranks Of Bereaved (AP) 37
A Teenage Soldier's Goodbyes On The Road To Over There (NYT) 40
A Hero Who Didn't Save Himself (WP) 41
Soldier Convicted Of Negligent Homicide In Iraq Shooting (AP) 46
The Warden Of Fallouja (LAT) 46
In Wartime, Who Has The Power? (NYT) 49
Antiwar Caucus Wants To Be Heard Now (NYT) 50
Pakistan Denies U.S. Claim Of Having Authority To Target Militants Inside Pakistan (AP) 52
Returning, Safe, After A Year's Service In Afghanistan (NYT) .53

DOJ:

A New Mystery To Prosecutors: Their Lost Jobs (NYT) 54
JOHN L. SMITH: Patriot Act Lets Politics Trump Professionalism With U.S. Attorney's Firing (LVRJ) 56

Criminal Law:

Doubts Rise As States Hold Sex Offenders After Prison Terms (NYT) 57
Crime's 'Mr. Untouchable' Emerges From Shadows (NYT) .. 63

Civil Rights:

FBI To Look At Deaths From Jim Crow Era (RNO) 65
Prosecutor Sees Virtue In Failure To Try Emmett Till Case (AP) 66
Editorial: A Welcome Partnership To Right Old Injustices (SACBEE) 66
Primary On Mardi Gras Day Illegal? (MR) 67
Investigations Multiplying In Juvenile Abuse Scandal (NYT) .. 68
N.Y. Suburb Scraps Election After Suit (AP) 70

Antitrust:

Report: Private Equity Firm Blackstone Considering Chrysler Bid (AP) 70
Feds, State Probe TUSD Tech Mess (AZDS) 71
The Karmazin Way: Build It, Sell It, Run It, Repeat (NYT) 74

Indian Affairs:

Tracking Crime On Tribal Lands (AP) 76

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge To Decide Validity Of Case On Marijuana (NYT) 77
ATF Computers Help Police Track Guns (WCFC)..... 77
Man With A Million Bullets In Home Charged (RPE) 78

Immigration:

Bush In A Quandary Over Border Agents' Case (HC) 79
Prosecutor Stands In Political Storm (SAEN) 81
Inmates Will Replace Wary Migrants In Colorado Fields (NYT) 83
Americans Selling Personal Identity To Illegal Aliens (WT/AP) 84
Hope For Amends To Filipino Immigrants (WP) 85
Immigration Reform, Take 2 (WP)..... 87
Illegal Immigrants -- They're Money (LAT)..... 87

Tax:

The Untaxed Rich, Found And Then Lost (NYT) 89

Congress-Administration:

Children's Health Care On Agenda (WP) 90
A Boy's Death (WP)..... 91
Nuclear Warhead Plan Draws Opposition (WP)..... 92
FDA Rules Override Warnings About Drug (WP) 93
Public Health Agency Linked To Chemical Industry (LAT) 96
Why They Fight (NYT) 98

Other News:

The Return Of Volatility (LAT) 99
Romney Wins Conservatives' Straw Poll (WP)..... 100
Conservatives Pick Romney In Straw Poll (LAT)..... 101
Not In Race, Gingrich Still Has Right Stuff (WT)..... 102
Romney Favored Among Conservatives In Straw Poll (AP) .. 103
G.O.P. Candidates Criticize Slur By Conservative Author (NYT) 103
Coulter Drops F-bomb Onto Political Battlefield (CNN)..... 104
Ann Coulter, You're No Sister Souljah (POL) 105
Giuliani Has No Real Chance With GOP Voters... Or Does He? (WP)..... 106
Romney Values Old Time Religion (NHUL)..... 108
Auditor Kicked Off Campaign (TSSC) 109
Former Wisconsin Governor Campaigns In Iowa (AP)..... 110
Recalling Civil Rights, Democrats Seek Black Votes (NYT) 110
The Bridge From Selma, 42 Years Down The Road (WP) .. 112
Clinton Courts Black Support Amid Obama Surge (NSDY).. 113
Hillary's Snipe At Obama Erodes Standing In Polls (WT) 114
Geffen, Clinton Were Often At Odds (LAT)..... 115
Tripping Over The Inevitable (WP)..... 117
Bring Back The Politics Of Personal Destruction (NYT) 118
Politics Means Sometimes Having To Say You're Sorry (NYT)..... 120
Obama Headlines Labor Rally (CHIT)..... 122
Obama: Senate Will Pass Labor Union-backed Measure (AP)..... 123
Richardson Vows To Outwork Rivals (DMR)..... 123
Neither Clinton, Nor Obama (NYT)..... 124
Kucinich Outlines Plan For Iraq Withdrawal (NHUL) 125
Ex-GOP Candidates Turn Attacks Back On National Panel (BOS) 126
The Power Player (WP) 128
Your Tax Dollars At Work: Buckytubes And RedOwls (WP) .. 134
Bush Shows New Willingness To Reverse Course (WP)..... 135
Chavez's Influence Hovers Over Bush Trip To Latin America (HC)..... 136
Iran President Meets Saudi To Discuss Mideast Issues (NYT)..... 138
Iran's Ahmadinejad Visits Saudi Amid Regional Crises (AFP) 139
Mid-East Vow To Curb Sectarianism (BBC) 140
North Korea Inspections Will Put U.S. To The Test Too (LAT) 141
N. Korea Talks May Lead To New Era (MCT) 142
U.S. Urged To Reject Taiwan Missile Sale (AP) 143
China Warns Negroponte On Taiwan Arms Sales (AFP)..... 144
China To Increase Its Military Budget (AP)..... 144
China's Quirky Stock Market Finally Matters (WP)..... 145
Shanghai What-If: How A Shock Can Become A Shock Wave (NYT)..... 148
The Nuclear Threat From China (WP) 149
Russian Police Beat Democracy Activists (WP/AP) 150
Police And Protesters Clash In St. Petersburg (NYT) 151
A Russian Plea For Collaboration (WP) 152
American Troops In Kosovo May Lose Their Combat Status (WP)..... 154
Again, Kosovar Albanians Demonstrate Against U.N. (NYT) . 155
Traffickers Re-route Drugs Through Central America (LAT) 156
Mexico's No. 2 Party Gets A New Leader (LAT) 158
Sudan President: No Handover Of Citizens (AP) 159
Despair In Darfur (WT) 160
Stricter Law Fails To Diminish The Demand For Child Laborers In India (NYT) 161
Our Brit Poodle, Off His Leash (WP) 163
Aid Workers With Guns (NYT) 165
While Australia Burns (NYT) 166
Losing Bangladesh, By Degrees (NYT) 167

DOJ_NMG_0139747

Memories Of A Colder Iceland (NYT) 168

TERRORISM NEWS:

Job Lured Alleged Al-Qaida Trainee To Houston (HC)

By Robert Crowe

Houston Chronicle, March 4, 2007

Daniel Maldonado, the American accused of training with al-Qaida and waging jihad in Somalia, came to Houston two years ago to work for a 24-year-old Web designer linked to Internet sites frequented by terrorism suspects.

That man, Sarfaraz Jamal, a former BMX enthusiast and "Seinfeld" fan from suburban Columbus, Ohio, is emerging as an unlikely yet intriguing figure in the Maldonado saga. And his story helps explain how Maldonado wound up in Houston, where he now awaits trial.

Jamal denies any wrongdoing and the FBI is mum, refusing to say even whether he's under investigation.

But Jamal acknowledges a connection to Maldonado, saying in an e-mail to the Houston Chronicle that he had hired him to do odd jobs on the Houston-based IslamicNetwork.com.

"A small kind of job, answering e-mails, etc." is how he described it.

Jamal said he continued to pay him after Maldonado moved to Egypt.

"I had no idea he was going anywhere but Egypt," said Jamal, who is now living in Jordan so he, his wife and their children can study Islam. "Had I known, I would not have probably risked the whole guilt-by-association thing. ... I would have tried to stop him had I known of his motivation to go there."

Others who knew Jamal in Houston say he wasn't always so interested in Islam.

"According to what I've heard from him, (Jamal) was not a practicing Muslim," said Shaikh Isam Rajab of Masjid Hamza, a mosque in far southwest Houston, who arranged for Jamal to design the Web site for the Arees Institute, an Islamic school. "So he was considering himself a bad person, and then he started practicing. And maybe that's what got to him, and he became so enthusiastic."

Married and convertedMaldonado, 28, accused of training with al-Qaida from September to January and studying bomb-making with a man who produced explosives in Somalia, faces up to life in prison if convicted. He awaits trial here because his last U.S. address was an apartment in a sprawling complex off Beltway 8 in southwest Houston.

Maldonado, the son of Puerto Rican immigrants, grew up in New Hampshire, where he met and later married Tamekia Cunningham. After their marriage, they converted to Islam. In August 2005, they moved to Houston, and Jamal helped them settle in.

Jamal grew up in a family that regularly attended mosque — his parents were from Pakistan — but he took more interest in his Hoffman BMX bike and the Internet before discovering Islam. His passions for computers and religion would soon converge.

While living in his parents' Ohio home in 2001, the teenager started ClearGuidance.com, an online discussion site for young Muslims. According to a profile in The Globe and Mail, a Canadian newspaper, the Web site began with 172 members but its audience quickly grew to thousands, "from the suburbs of Detroit to the suburbs of London."

ClearGuidance made the news after Canadian authorities thwarted a plot to bomb the Toronto Stock Exchange and Canadian Parliament last June, and the newspaper disclosed that some of the suspects had been on the site discussing using weapons and killing infidels.

Jamal, also known as Sas, shut down the site in 2004.

"It was a bit too distracting. I got bored of it," he told the Chronicle. "And it was overrun by people who spent more time on it than I did."

Helped Maldonado relocateInternet relationships played a key role in Jamal's move to Houston from his parents' house in Ohio. He met Fatima Hye, a Clear Lake High School graduate and daughter of a prominent Quran translator on AlMaghrib.com. They married in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0139749

For Hye, now 31, just divorced with three children and deep roots here, moving in with Jamal's parents in Ohio wasn't practical.

She and Jamal established a new Web site, Islamic Network, and ran it from their southwest Houston apartment.

"Even if we are radical, I don't think it's much different from what people see as 'Jesus freaks,'" Hye told the Chronicle by telephone. "We're just really into our religion."

Jamal also stayed in touch with Maldonado, whom he had met at an Islamic conference, through mutual acquaintances and the Internet. After the Maldonados arrived in Houston in the fall of 2005, Jamal realized he couldn't afford to cover their expenses and pay his own family's bills. Islamic Network does not generate revenue, Hye said, adding that Jamal earns a living through contract computer programming, graphics and Web design.

Because Maldonado had expressed an interest in living in a Muslim country, Jamal and Hye helped the family relocate to Egypt, where Maldonado could still work for Islamic Network via the Internet, Hye said.

But living in Egypt was more difficult than expected. Maldonado didn't speak Arabic, the $270 a month Jamal paid him didn't cover expenses, Internet connectivity was spotty at best and Tamekia was pregnant.

"We just lost touch," said Hye, explaining that she heard the news of Daniel's arrest and Tamekia's death from malaria "when the world did."

Of Tamekia's death, she said, "it just broke my heart because she was my sister."

Mentoring JamalAlso in the fall of 2005, Jamal met Shaikh Rajab, who had recently moved to Houston to work at Masjid Hamza. The tech-savvy Jamal asked him if he would answer questions on Islamic Network.

"He's an amazing person with very weird stuff sometimes, but that's what attracted me," said Rajab. "Some of his ideas, they're really great."

Though he was warned about Jamal, Rajab thought he could be a mentor to the young man.

"Some people came to me and told me, 'Be careful, this guy, uh, he has a past,'" Rajab said. "So I asked him what happened. He said, 'No. No. Nothing. There was just a Web site with some problems, and it was just closed.'"

Rajab added, "Youth can get overzealous. They can do some crazy stuff. But I believe Sas has finally bypassed that stage. He is finally weighing things."

Uncensored dialogueThe FBI warned Congress in September about violent extremism on the Internet, and the possibility of radicalizing a small group of American Muslims.

"These online activities further their indoctrination, create links between extremists located around the world and may serve as a springboard for future terrorist activities," said Donald Van Duyn, deputy assistant director of the FBI's counterterrorism division.

Jamal and Hye say Islamic Network — as ClearGuidance once did — encourages uncensored dialogue about such controversial topics as polygamy, jihad and U.S. foreign policy — " ... which is why I guess 'extremists' will talk more on some of the sites I am a part of versus talking less on sites which censor people," Jamal told the Chronicle by e-mail.

Under the user name Daniel Aljughaifi, Maldonado was a paid message board moderator for Islamic Network. Before his capture in January while fleeing Somalia, he was one of many members to discuss attempts to establish Islamic law in that African nation.

He's now the first American to be charged with joining Islamic extremists in Somalia.

Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A three-year investigation into the activities of one of the Middle East's largest and most influential banks is producing extensive evidence of how tens of millions of dollars have flowed from wealthy Saudi Arabians to Palestinian groups that allegedly used some of the money to pay off suicide bombers and their survivors.

The information being turned up by government inquiries and lawyers suing Arab Bank "will give people a better understanding of the way money moves in that part of the world to support Hamas" and other militant groups in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, said Stephen Kroll, a terrorism finance specialist and until recently counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs.

"It's important in focusing the public's attention on the issue of what is and what is not acceptable for banks to be involved in," Kroll said.

The Justice Department is conducting a criminal investigation into the New York branch of Arab Bank, which is based in Jordan, and its financial links to organizations and individuals accused of terrorism, according to three former U.S. counter-terrorism officials.

In 2005, the bank agreed to pay the federal government $24 million in fines for violating U.S. laws aimed at preventing terrorist financing, including failing to report suspicious transactions.

The bank is also being sued in federal court in Brooklyn by Americans and Israelis injured in suicide bombings or other fighting in Israel and the occupied territories, and by the relatives of others who were killed. No trial date has been set, but assuming the cases go to trial, they could establish ground rules for what obligations banks have in handling money bound for militant groups. They could also provide an unusually detailed and public look at the flow of money from Saudi donors to Palestinian groups that the U.S. and Israel list as terrorist.

Lawyers suing Arab Bank accuse the firm of facilitating acts of terrorism by providing accounts and other financial services to Hamas, Islamic Jihad and similar groups. Arab Bank also acted as the administrator of a plan in which suicide bombers and others designated as "martyrs" by the Palestinian Authority and other organizations were compensated for their actions on a sliding scale, based on the extent of their injuries, according to documents filed in the cases. The lawsuits charge that the payments — and thus Arab Bank — provided an incentive for suicide bombings.

Arab Bank officials deny such charges and say they have never knowingly supported acts of terrorism. Bank officials say their agreement to pay the fine in 2005 was not an acknowledgment of any wrongdoing.

Bank officials say they provide an important financial service in the impoverished Palestinian territories and that they were merely acting as intermediaries between banks representing Saudi donors and Palestinian organizations and individuals who were being compensated for suffering at Israeli hands.

They also say that a "martyr" can mean almost any Palestinian killed or injured as part of the struggle with Israel, including innocent victims.

"Arab Bank had reason to believe these were humanitarian payments or social welfare payments, and there was certainly nothing in any of the public information that suggested to the bank at the time that these were in any way [meant] to induce terrorism or reward terrorism," said Robert Chlopak, a Washington-based spokesman for the bank.

Chlopak said the bank had checked out clients and transactions and that it did not process any payments to individuals or organizations that were designated as terrorist.

In one instance in which plaintiffs' lawyers allege that Arab Bank maintained an account for Hamas in Beirut, bank officials said that once they learned of the suspicious account, they froze it and reported it to authorities.

Arab Bank also said that it was primarily transferring funds sent to it from other banks on behalf of legitimate Saudi donors that have not been linked to terrorist activities. To win their case, the plaintiffs' lawyers would have to prove that Arab Bank knew that it was doing business with terrorist individuals or entities.

In 2005, the Treasury Department and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency found that Arab Bank's New York branch had transferred funds between 2001 and 2004 for organizations that were later designated by the U.S. as terrorist groups. The Treasury Department said the bank had "largely complied" with the requirement to stop the transfers after the groups were identified.

But the department said that after the government designated these groups as terrorist, the bank failed to go back and review its accounts to see what dealings it had had with them and report any suspicious activities.

Some of the initial allegations in the lawsuits, most of which were filed in 2004, were based on documents seized by the Israeli military during raids on charities, businesses and other locations in the West Bank and Gaza in 2002. Among the documents were records indicating that Arab Bank provided financial services for Hamas and at least 41 organizations and individuals allegedly related to it or to Islamic Jihad.

DOJ_NMG_0139751

Plaintiffs' lawyers Gary Osen and Michael Elsner used those records as a jumping-off point for a wider investigation in which they have gained access to tens of thousands of financial records from Arab Bank.

The records detail financial transactions that began in 2000 with the start of the second Palestinian intifada, or uprising. Saudi government officials created two special fundraising committees to help Palestinians battle Israeli forces and otherwise resist the occupation, according to court documents.

One of them, the Saudi Committee for Aid to the Al Quds Intifada, decreed that the life of anyone who died as a "martyr" in the conflict with Israel was worth 20,000 Saudi riyals, about $5,300 at the time. The committee began wiring that sum into accounts that families were instructed to set up at Arab Bank branches, the lawsuits allege. The average Palestinian salary is about $3,000 a year.

In all, the Saudi Committee made about 200,000 wire transfers for the Palestinian cause, totaling more than $90 million, Shukry Bishara, Arab Bank's chief banking officer, said in a court declaration. Much of that money went to pay for hospitals and social welfare programs, or to compensate people injured or imprisoned — or the families of those killed — in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But the money also included an undetermined amount paid to the families of suicide bombers, and those injured or imprisoned by Israel, according to the lawsuits.

The plaintiffs allege that bank officials knew that those listed as "martyrs" included suicide bombers because it was publicly advertised. They cited a Feb. 10, 2001, edition of the Saudi newspaper Al Jazirah in which the Saudi Committee listed the names of Palestinian martyrs, including those killed in suicide bombings, whose families received payments.

Several lawmakers and Bush administration officials involved in the investigation of Arab Bank have expressed concerns about its activities.

At one House Finance Committee hearing in May 2005, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said that during his visit to the West Bank city of Ramallah to discuss the issue, the Arab Bank manager for the Palestinian territories told him that he "had not filed a single suspicious activity report in the past two years across all the Arab Bank branches in the West Bank and in Gaza."

"It appears that such controls were indeed sorely lacking at Arab Bank across all of their global operation," Levey said.

Extend Legal Rights To Guantanamo (WP)

By Alberto J. Mora, Thomas R. Pickering

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

For more than 200 years, the courts have served as the ultimate safeguard for our civil liberties. A critical part of this role has been the judicial branch's ability to consider writs of habeas corpus, through which people who have been imprisoned can challenge the decision to hold them in government custody. In this way, habeas corpus has provided an important check on executive power. However, because of a provision of the Military Commissions Act passed last fall, this fundamental role of the courts has been seriously reduced.

Habeas corpus -- the Great Writ -- has been the preeminent safeguard of individual liberty for centuries by providing meaningful judicial review of executive action and ensuring that our government has complied with the Constitution and the laws of the United States. Habeas review has always been most critical in cases of executive detention without charge because it provides prisoners a meaningful opportunity to contest their detention before a neutral decision maker.

In 2004, the Supreme Court held that the protections of habeas corpus extend to detainees at Guantanamo Bay, who may rely on them to challenge the lawfulness of their indefinite detentions. The court noted that at its historical core, "the writ of habeas corpus has served as a means of reviewing the legality of Executive detention, and it is in that context that its protections have been strongest."

But the Military Commissions Act eliminates the federal courts' ability to hear habeas petitions filed by certain noncitizens detained by the United States at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere. Late last month the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld this provision and dismissed the lawsuits filed by many of the Guantanamo detainees.

We fully recognize that our government must have the power to detain suspected foreign terrorists to protect national security. But removing the federal courts' ability to hear habeas corpus claims does not serve that goal. On the contrary, habeas corpus is crucial to ensure that the government's power to detain is exercised wisely, lawfully and consistently with American values. That is why we have joined with the Constitution Project's broad and bipartisan group of judges, former members of Congress, executive branch officials, scholars and others to urge Congress to restore federal court jurisdiction to hear these habeas corpus petitions.

The unconventional nature of the "war on terrorism" makes habeas corpus more, not less, important. Unlike what is found in traditional conflicts, there is no clearly defined enemy, no identifiable battlefield and no foreseeable end to the fighting. The government claims the power to imprison individuals without charge indefinitely, potentially forever. It is essential that there be a meaningful process to ensure that the United States does not mistakenly deprive innocent people of their liberty. Habeas corpus provides that process.

We recognize that the Military Commissions Act still enables the Guantanamo detainees to have hearings before a Combatant Status Review Tribunal, which is charged with determining whether the detainee is in fact an "enemy combatant." But unlike court hearings, the tribunal hearings rely on secret evidence, deny detainees the chance to obtain and present their own evidence, and allow the government to use evidence obtained by coercive interrogation methods. While these tribunals have some utility, they cannot replace the critical role of habeas corpus.

The government has detained some Guantanamo prisoners for more than five years without giving them a meaningful opportunity to be heard. The United States cannot expect other nations to afford its citizens the basic guarantees provided by habeas corpus unless it provides those guarantees to others.

And in our constitutional system of checks and balances, it is unwise for the legislative branch to limit an established and traditional avenue of judicial review.

Americans should be proud of their commitment to the rule of law and not diminish the protections it provides. Our country's detention policy has undermined its reputation around the world and has weakened support for the fight against terrorism. Restoring habeas corpus rights would help repair the damage and demonstrate U.S. commitment to a counterterrorism policy that is tough but that also respects individual rights. Congress should restore the habeas corpus rights that were eliminated by the Military Commissions Act, and President Bush should sign that bill into law.

Alberto J. Mora was general counsel of the Navy from 2001 to 2006. Thomas R. Pickering was undersecretary of state for political affairs from 1997 to 2000 and U.S. ambassador to the United Nations from 1989 to 1992.

The Must-Do List (NYT)

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

The Bush administration's assault on some of the founding principles of American democracy marches onward despite the Democratic victory in the 2006 elections. The new Democratic majorities in Congress can block the sort of noxious measures that the Republican majority rubber-stamped. But preventing new assaults on civil liberties is not nearly enough.

Five years of presidential overreaching and Congressional collaboration continue to exact a high toll in human lives, America's global reputation and the architecture of democracy. Brutality toward prisoners, and the denial of their human rights, have been institutionalized; unlawful spying on Americans continues; and the courts are being closed to legal challenges of these practices.

It will require forceful steps by this Congress to undo the damage. A few lawmakers are offering bills intended to do just that, but they are only a start. Taking on this task is a moral imperative that will show the world the United States can be tough on terrorism without sacrificing its humanity and the rule of law.

Today we're offering a list — which, sadly, is hardly exhaustive — of things that need to be done to reverse the unwise and lawless policies of President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Many will require a rewrite of the Military Commissions Act of 2006, an atrocious measure pushed through Congress with the help of three Republican senators, Arlen Specter, Lindsey Graham and John McCain; Senator McCain lent his moral authority to improving one part of the bill and thus obscured its many other problems.

•

Our list starts with three fundamental tasks:

DOJ_NMG_0139753

Restore Habeas Corpus

One of the new act's most indecent provisions denies anyone Mr. Bush labels an "illegal enemy combatant" the ancient right to challenge his imprisonment in court. The arguments for doing this were specious. Habeas corpus is nothing remotely like a get-out-of-jail-free card for terrorists, as supporters would have you believe. It is a way to sort out those justly detained from those unjustly detained. It will not "clog the courts," as Senator Graham claims. Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the Democratic chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has a worthy bill that would restore habeas corpus. It is essential to bringing integrity to the detention system and reviving the United States' credibility.

Stop Illegal Spying

Mr. Bush's program of intercepting Americans' international calls and e-mail messages without a warrant has not ceased. The agreement announced recently — under which a secret court supposedly gave its blessing to the program — did nothing to restore judicial process or ensure that Americans' rights are preserved. Congress needs to pass a measure, like one proposed by Senator Dianne Feinstein, to force Mr. Bush to obey the law that requires warrants for electronic surveillance.

Ban Torture, Really

The provisions in the Military Commissions Act that Senator McCain trumpeted as a ban on torture are hardly that. It is still largely up to the president to decide what constitutes torture and abuse for the purpose of prosecuting anyone who breaks the rules. This amounts to rewriting the Geneva Conventions and puts every American soldier at far greater risk if captured. It allows the president to decide in secret what kinds of treatment he will permit at the Central Intelligence Agency's prisons. The law absolves American intelligence agents and their bosses of any acts of torture and abuse they have already committed.

•

Many of the tasks facing Congress involve the way the United States takes prisoners, and how it treats them. There are two sets of prisons in the war on terror. The military runs one set in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantánamo Bay. The other is even more shadowy, run by the C.I.A. at secret places.

Close the C.I.A. Prisons

When the Military Commissions Act passed, Mr. Bush triumphantly announced that he now had the power to keep the secret prisons open. He cast this as a great victory for national security. It was a defeat for America's image around the world. The prisons should be closed.

Account for 'Ghost Prisoners'

The United States has to come clean on all of the "ghost prisoners" it has in the secret camps. Holding prisoners without any accounting violates human rights norms. Human Rights Watch says it has identified nearly 40 men and women who have disappeared into secret American-run prisons.

Ban Extraordinary Rendition

This is the odious practice of abducting foreign citizens and secretly flying them to countries where everyone knows they will be tortured. It is already illegal to send a prisoner to a country if there is reason to believe he will be tortured. The administration's claim that it got "diplomatic assurances" that prisoners would not be abused is laughable.

A bill by Representative Edward Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, would require the executive branch to list countries known to abuse and torture prisoners. No prisoner could be sent to any of them unless the secretary of state certified that the country's government no longer abused its prisoners or offered a way to verify that a prisoner will not be mistreated. It says "diplomatic assurances" are not sufficient.

•

Congress needs to completely overhaul the military prisons for terrorist suspects, starting with the way prisoners are classified. Shortly after 9/11, Mr. Bush declared all members of Al Qaeda and the Taliban to be "illegal enemy combatants" not entitled to the protections of the Geneva Conventions or American justice. Over time, the designation was applied to anyone the administration chose, including some United States citizens and the entire detainee population of Gitmo.

To address this mess, the government must:

Tighten the Definition of Combatant

DOJ_NMG_0139754

"Illegal enemy combatant" is assigned a dangerously broad definition in the Military Commissions Act. It allows Mr. Bush — or for that matter anyone he chooses to designate to do the job — to apply this label to virtually any foreigner anywhere, including those living legally in the United States.

Screen Prisoners Fairly and Effectively

When the administration began taking prisoners in Afghanistan, it did not much bother to screen them. Hundreds of innocent men were sent to Gitmo, where far too many remain to this day. The vast majority will never even be brought before tribunals and still face indefinite detention without charges.

Under legal pressure, Mr. Bush created "combatant status review tribunals," but they are a mockery of any civilized legal proceeding. They take place thousands of miles from the point of capture, and often years later. Evidence obtained by coercion and torture is permitted. The inmates do not get to challenge this evidence. They usually do not see it.

The Bush administration uses the hoary "fog of war" dodge to justify the failure to screen prisoners, saying it is not practical to do that on the battlefield. That's nonsense. It did not happen in Afghanistan, and often in Iraq, because Mr. Bush decided just to ship the prisoners off to Gitmo.

•

Prisoners designated as illegal combatants are subject to trial rules out of the Red Queen's playbook. The administration refuses to allow lawyers access to 14 terrorism suspects transferred in September from C.I.A. prisons to Guantánamo. It says that if they had a lawyer, they might say that they were tortured or abused at the C.I.A. prisons, and anything that happened at those prisons is secret.

At first, Mr. Bush provided no system of trial at the Guantánamo camp. Then he invented his own military tribunals, which were rightly overturned by the Supreme Court. Congress then passed the Military Commissions Act, which did not fix the problem. Some tasks now for Congress:

Ban Tainted Evidence

The Military Commissions Act and the regulations drawn up by the Pentagon to put it into action, are far too permissive on evidence obtained through physical abuse or coercion. This evidence is unreliable. The method of obtaining it is an affront.

Ban Secret Evidence

Under the Pentagon's new rules for military tribunals, judges are allowed to keep evidence secret from a prisoner's lawyer if the government persuades the judge it is classified. The information that may be withheld can include interrogation methods, which would make it hard, if not impossible, to prove torture or abuse.

Better Define 'Classified' Evidence

The military commission rules define this sort of secret evidence as "any information or material that has been determined by the United States government pursuant to statute, executive order or regulation to require protection against unauthorized disclosure for reasons of national security." This is too broad, even if a president can be trusted to exercise the power fairly and carefully. Mr. Bush has shown he cannot be trusted to do that.

Respect the Right to Counsel

Soon after 9/11, the Bush administration allowed the government to listen to conversations and intercept mail between some prisoners and their lawyers. This had the effect of suspending their right to effective legal representation. Since then, the administration has been unceasingly hostile to any lawyers who defend detainees. The right to legal counsel does not exist to coddle serial terrorists or snarl legal proceedings. It exists to protect innocent people from illegal imprisonment.

•

Beyond all these huge tasks, Congress should halt the federal government's race to classify documents to avoid public scrutiny — 15.6 million in 2005, nearly double the 2001 number. It should also reverse the grievous harm this administration has done to the Freedom of Information Act by encouraging agencies to reject requests for documents whenever possible. Congress should curtail F.B.I. spying on nonviolent antiwar groups and revisit parts of the Patriot Act that allow this practice.

The United States should apologize to a Canadian citizen and a German citizen, both innocent, who were kidnapped and tortured by American agents.

DOJ_NMG_0139755

Oh yes, and it is time to close the Guantánamo camp. It is a despicable symbol of the abuses committed by this administration (with Congress's complicity) in the name of fighting terrorism.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Tours Tornado-Damaged Areas In South (WP/AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

ENTERPRISE, Ala., March 3 -- President Bush handed out hugs Saturday to people in the South who survived killer tornadoes, and he mourned those who died in the storms, including eight high school students.

"Out of this rubble will emerge a better tomorrow," Bush said.

Bush climbed over piles of concrete, roofing, insulation, broken glass and textbooks at shattered Enterprise High School. Be strong and set an example for the other 1,200 students, he told the student government president and three others.

The president walked alone down a hallway lined by blue lockers, the corridor where the eight students succumbed and scores more were trapped in Thursday's storm. He also saw the school wing, now just rubble, where students had hunkered down -- and survived -- as the tornado approached.

"Today I have walked through devastation that is hard to describe," he said, standing with students, one of whom had a tear running down her face. "A hundred kids got out of here alive, which is a miracle."

During the visit, Bush designated Coffee County as a disaster area, releasing federal dollars for recovery and individual assistance. His disaster relief chief came along for a firsthand look at the damage so he could make quick recommendations to the White House on requests for help from Washington.

The trip, quickly put together Friday, was intended to highlight the Bush administration's stepped-up efforts, through the Federal Emergency Management Agency in particular, to help disaster victims. The White House came under withering criticism for its sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

In southeastern Alabama, a tornado injured 50 people and damaged or destroyed about 370 homes among the 22,000 residents.

Bush also toured Americus, Ga., about 120 miles south of Atlanta, where storms killed two people and destroyed dozens of homes and businesses.

Before visiting the Alabama school, he got a bird's-eye view of the scene as his Marine One helicopter followed the storm's extensive path. The town's white water tower -- with the words "Enterprise, City of Progress" -- still stood. But nearby, the high school looked like a wrecking ball had struck it.

R. David Paulison, the head of FEMA, said he was on the telephone with state emergency officials hours after the storms hit. Agency teams have nearly completed preliminary damage assessments in Alabama and planned to begin similar work in Georgia on Saturday.

He said FEMA moved in truckloads of water, ice, tarps, plastic sheeting and communications equipment to help states take care of residents -- a response he called "the new FEMA."

Bush Consoles Victims Of Tornadoes In The South (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

AMERICUS, Ga., March 3 — President Bush picked his way through the rubble of the tornado-stricken South on Saturday, promising federal aid for some Alabamians and turning up unexpectedly in a largely African-American neighborhood here in Georgia, where startled residents rushed out of their damaged houses, cell phone cameras in hand, to greet him.

The hastily arranged trip, following a massive storm system that produced at least 31 tornadoes from Minnesota to the Gulf of Mexico, was intended to send an image of a compassionate president leading a competent government response, in sharp contrast with the lingering images of federal indifference and ineptitude after Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0139756

The president's day began in Enterprise, Ala., where eight students were killed as a tornado on Thursday ripped apart Enterprise High School. Mr. Bush, accompanied by Mayor Kenneth Boswell and several student leaders, made his way through a destroyed wing of the school, stopping in the hallway, where raining chunks of metal and concrete cost the students their lives.

"Out of this rubble will emerge a better tomorrow," the president said afterward, his hands resting gently on the shoulders of the 17-year-old student government president, Megan Parks. He called the scene one of "devastation that's hard to believe," adding, "The biggest effect of the storm is the shattered lives."

Ms. Parks, clearly shaken, bit her lip and wiped away tears as Mr. Bush spoke. She had left school 30 minutes before the storm hit, stopping along the way to pick up her little brother from elementary school to take him home. Saturday was her first time back.

"It's so hard to see our school like this," she said.

The president declared Coffee County, which encompasses Enterprise, a federal disaster area. The designation allows affected households to receive up to $28,200 in aid, according to R. David Paulison, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, who accompanied Mr. Bush on the trip.

Mr. Paulison said he had worked through the night preparing paperwork for the disaster declaration, which Mr. Bush approved aboard Air Force One on Saturday morning. White House officials said a similar declaration for Georgia was being considered.

After the Enterprise visit, Mr. Bush took an hour-long helicopter ride to hard-hit Americus, south of Atlanta, where his published schedule listed only a briefing here by local officials in the parking lot of a damaged hospital. Instead, the president's motorcade drove straight to a modest neighborhood of faded clapboard homes, stopping at a duplex where two people had died seeking shelter from the storm.

As Mr. Bush made his way from house to house to shake hands, giddy residents thrust their cell phones at him, imploring him to stop for pictures and, in some cases, to talk to boyfriends or girlfriends on the other end of the line. Laughing, he obliged.

It was a striking post-Katrina image for a president whose standing among black voters — never very high to begin with — fell even lower after the hurricane.

"He's lifting spirits in a very difficult situation," said Senator Johnny Isakson, Republican of Georgia, who accompanied Mr. Bush.

One person whose spirits appeared lifted was Felicia Stafford, who said the tornado had blown the roof off her house and ruined its wood floors. "He's very nice, loving and warm," she said after meeting Mr. Bush. "He's got very soft hands."

Bush To Americans: 'Help The Folks Down Here' (CNN)

CNN.com, March 3, 2007

AMERICUS, Georgia (CNN) -- President Bush assured tornado victims Saturday that help is on the way as he toured towns in Alabama and Georgia that were among the hardest hit by Thursday's storms.

Bush called the devastation "hard to describe" as he visited with officials in Americus, Georgia, where the storms had claimed two lives and shut down Sumter Regional Hospital as doctors cared for victims.

Sumter is one of six Georgia counties that Gov. Sonny Perdue has declared in a state of emergency.

Earlier Saturday, Bush was in Enterprise, Alabama -- where nine people, including eight students in a high school, were killed. He told Gov. Bob Riley and Mayor Kenneth Boswell that Coffee County had been declared "a major disaster area." That designation means extra federal dollars for recovery.

"You can never heal a heart, but you can provide comfort knowing that the federal government will provide help for those whose houses were destroyed or automobiles were destroyed," the president said.

Bush also implored Americans to help out any way they can.

"Some people are going to need your help," he said. "I would ask you out of the generosity of your heart to help the folks down here."

Speaking to reporters on Air Force One en route to Alabama, Federal Emergency Management Agency Director David Paulison said Bush's visit was indicative of "the new FEMA."

DOJ_NMG_0139757

Before Paulison's tenure, the agency drew fierce criticism for its handling of the Hurricane Katrina aftermath. Paulison told reporters that in the past FEMA didn't intervene in disaster recovery until the state and local community became overwhelmed.

That system doesn't work, Paulison said. After Thursday's storms, FEMA immediately sent 14 teams armed with food, water, ice, tarps, plastic sheeting and communications equipment.

"We have to go in as partners, so that's what we're going to be doing," Paulison told reporters.

In all, Thursday's storms killed 20 people: 10 in Alabama, nine in Georgia and a 7-year-old girl in Missouri.

Bush attended a morning briefing at the Enterprise Municipal Airport before embarking on a tour of the town's storm damage and later meeting with families.

Bush's visit to Enterprise came on the heels of a tour by Riley, who declared a state of emergency for the area and ordered the National Guard to send troops, medics and roving security patrols to the southern portion of the state.

The president visited Enterprise High School, where eight 16- and 17-year-olds were killed while seeking shelter in the school auditorium.

Thinking the Thursday tornado warnings constituted a standard drill, students were joking around in the auditorium as they waited out the storm. That is, until the school went black and glass from a skylight crashed to the ground.

"Everyone got really quiet -- we knew it was serious. No more than five seconds later, it was just like a big explosion and everything -- debris started hitting us," said Mitchell Mock, who was injured during the tornado.

Students were huddled in the building's interior, away from all windows, but no place was safe when the school took a direct hit from a tornado shortly after 1 p.m. The school's roof partially collapsed, trapping students in an avalanche of rubble.

"I had a wall fall on top of me, and the roof fell on top of us," student Brent Smith said.

"There was just hundreds of kids coming down the hallway, and a lot of them were covered with blood," said Kim Lewis, Mitchell's mother.

Dylan Lewis was trapped under rubble after the twister passed. When he emerged, "there were no more people -- it was just cement and air-conditioning parts," he said.

His collarbone was broken, but Dylan and his brothers helped rescue others before going to the emergency room themselves.

Four juniors, two sophomores and two seniors were killed. The Enterprise School Board identified the dead as Michael J. Bowen, 16; Peter James Dunn II, 16; Andrew Joel Jackson, 16; Ryan Andrew Mohler, 17; Kathryn Madora Strunk, 16; Michael D. Tompkins, 17; Jamie Ann Vidensek, 17; and Alice Michelle Wilson, 16.

Officials said the storms killed at least two others in Alabama, one of them in Enterprise and one in Wilcox County.

After delivering havoc to south Alabama, the storms moved into Georgia where nine people were killed -- six in Baker County, two in Americus and one in Taylor County -- spokesman Buzz Weiss of the Georgia Emergency Management Agency said.

In Americus, a tornado slammed into the Sumter Regional Hospital, shutting it down as health workers were treating victims coming in from the storm, Weiss said.

The patients, none of whom was killed, were transferred to other hospitals, Weiss said.

The twister also destroyed the local headquarters of the Red Cross, its generators and three of its disaster trailers, an official said.

Mayor: New Orleans 'Piled It On' For $77 Billion Lawsuit (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Louisiana (AP) -- Only $1 billion of the $77 billion the city is seeking from the Army Corps of Engineers is for infrastructure damages it says it suffered because of levee breaches during Hurricane Katrina. The rest is for such things as the city's tarnished image and tourist industry losses.

The city "looked at everything and just kind of piled it on," Mayor Ray Nagin said.

"We got some advice from some attorneys to be aggressive with the number, and we'll see what happens," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139758

New Orleans has joined big business and thousands of homeowners in filing claims seeking compensation from the corps for damages sustained when the levees broke during the 2005 storm, flooding 80 percent of the city.

The claims allege poor design and negligence by the corps led to the failure of flood walls and levees.

The city attorney's office also considered such things as "decreases in the city's image, tourist industry activity and potential business industry, losses in the tax base and generated revenue, and a decrease in the city's overall population," in making the assessment, according to a statement from City Hall.

A spokeswoman for the mayor could not explain how the city quantified losses not tied to infrastructure. A 43-page form filed with the corps, reserving the city's right to sue for $77 billion, also provides little insight. It does not quantify "loss of tax revenue," for example, and supporting documents for city-owned properties, such as a police crime lab and libraries, omit any estimates of property values or flood-related damages, The Times-Picayune newspaper reported Saturday.

After Dubai Ports World (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Investing in the United States should be easier.

KEEPING AMERICA a magnet for foreign investment should be an obvious national priority. Flows of foreign cash provide the U.S. economy with valuable capital and access to innovation, and they help mitigate the country's large trade deficit. U.S. policymakers aggressively hawk the benefits of a liberal investment climate to other countries.

But since the hysteria of a year ago over Dubai Ports World proposing to manage some U.S. seaports, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), the federal panel responsible for ensuring that national security interests are not harmed by foreign acquisition of U.S. assets, seems to have slid in the opposite direction. A recent study by David Marchick, a former Clinton State Department official, concluded that the CFIUS approval process has become overly difficult and increasingly uncertain, making it riskier for non-Americans to invest in the country.

In 2006, Mr. Marchick found, voluntary filings of paperwork with the committee were up dramatically, indicating that foreign investors are increasingly worried about possible CFIUS scrutiny. The committee opted to conduct many more time-consuming second-stage investigations of proposed transactions than in years past, leading to more investors withdrawing during the approval process. And the Financial Times reported last week that CFIUS is threatening to impose enormous penalties on companies that violate even minor points in agreements brokered by the panel. These are bad signs.

Enter the House of Representatives, which unanimously passed a bill Wednesday designed to revamp the CFIUS approval process. By making the committee's procedures explicit in statute, the bill would usefully allow foreign investors to plan with some assurance. Especially given its provenance in the Dubai Ports World controversy, the bill, introduced by Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.) and shepherded through the House by Finance Committee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.), represents sensible middle ground.

Now the action moves to the Senate, which last year passed a needlessly and harmfully stringent reform bill sponsored by Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.). This year we hope that the Senate emulates the House in finding a better balance between security and economic freedom. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), the new chairman of the Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee, has said that he will introduce CFIUS legislation. He should do so soon; Americans cannot let their fears continue to scare off valuable investment.

Naked Came The Passenger (WP)

By William Saletan

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Psssst. Want to see Susan Hallowell naked? Look at the Feb. 24 New York Times. She's on page A10.

Hallowell runs the Transportation Security Administration's research lab. Four years ago, she volunteered to be scanned by a backscatter X-ray machine, which sees through clothing. She was wearing a skirt and a blazer. But in the picture, she's as good as naked.

Last week, TSA began using backscatters to screen airline passengers for weapons. The first machine is up and running in Phoenix. The next ones will be in New York and Los Angeles. The machines have been modified with a "privacy algorithm" to clean up what they show. But even the more cartoon-like images they now display tell you more than you need to know about the people seated next to you.

DOJ_NMG_0139759

Are you up for this? Are you ready to get naked for your country?

This is no joke. The government needs to look under your clothes. Ceramic knives, plastic guns and liquid explosives have made metal detectors obsolete. Carry-on bags are X-rayed, so the safest place to hide a weapon is on your body. Puffer machines can detect explosives, but only if you're sloppy. Backscatters are different. They can scan your whole surface, locating and identifying anything of unusual density -- not just metals, which have high atomic numbers, but drugs and explosives, which have low ones.

Why isn't this technology in lots of airports already? One reason is fear of radiation. That's a needless worry. You get less radiation from a scan than from sitting on a plane for two minutes. If that's too much for you, don't fly.

The main stumbling block has been privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union and the Electronic Privacy Information Center have fought backscatters, calling them a "virtual strip search." But the purpose of a strip search is the search. Stripping is just a means. Virtual inspections achieve the same end by other means. They don't extend the practice of strip-searching. They abolish it.

When American Science and Engineering, which makes the backscatter machines, introduced the technology in prisons nine years ago, the point was to replace strip searches. "The scan requires no physical contact between the operator and the subject, thus vastly reducing the threat of assault against law enforcement personnel and the spread of communicable diseases," the company argued. The rationale, like the machine, conveyed not an ounce of human warmth. The inmates preferred to be seen rather than touched. Better to be depersonalized than degraded.

Because of terrorism, the rest of us now face the same choice. Under TSA policy, if you set off an airport metal detector or are chosen for secondary screening, you're subject to a pat-down inspection that "may include sensitive areas of the body," such as your chest and thighs. Unless, that is, you're lucky enough to be in Phoenix, where you can choose a backscatter instead.

The impersonality of machines can also filter out racism. Five years ago, the ACLU objected to body scans because they were administered selectively, "based on profiles that are racially discriminatory." But the best way to remove selection bias would be to scan everyone. In Phoenix, the TSA has put the backscatter monitors in a room 50 feet from the security checkpoint, so the officers who staff them can't see you. All they can see are X-ray images, which capture density, not pigment.

The key to reconciling airport security with privacy is that the officer who sees you on the monitor never sees you in the flesh -- never sees your face, never knows who you are. In Phoenix, the TSA hasn't just put the monitors in a separate room. It's laying cables to put them in an entirely different terminal. Likewise, the officer who sees you in the flesh never sees you on the monitor. It's like the blind men and the elephant: Nobody has the whole picture.

That brings us back to Susan Hallowell. The Times did not name the naked woman in its Feb. 24 photo. It did, however, mention that the machines were made by ASE. On the company's Web site, I found a news release complaining that pictures circulating in the media were obsolete, because they had been taken in 2003. Then I ran across a 2004 article that said Hallowell had demonstrated the technology the previous year. I typed her name into a search engine, and up came a 2003 wire story with a photo of her, fully clothed, next to a monitor showing her essentially naked except for a bomb and gun she had hidden under outfit. It is the same image that appeared in the Times.

Hallowell volunteered for this publicity. But this sort of easy identification is exactly what must not happen to others. In the age of body scans, privacy means keeping your name, your face and your nude image apart. That job doesn't end at the security gate; it begins there. Will your scan leak? "Images will not be printed, stored or transmitted," TSA swears on its Web site. Directly above that assurance, the agency has posted four nude pictures -- "actual images shown to the Transportation Security Officer during the backscatter process." And you thought airport screeners had no sense of humor.

Enough with the fairy tales. We lost our innocence when the planes hit the twin towers. Now we're losing our modesty. If we're going to be ogled, at least protect us from being Googled.

Editorial: Everyone Not As Confident As AG On Supermax (CCDR)

Canon City Daily Record, March 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139760

When federal and state bigwigs toured Florence's Supermax prison Feb. 22, officials came away with different views on the safety of the facility.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was assertive as he said the United States Penitentiary Administrative Maximum Security prison, which houses many high-profile terrorists, was being well guarded and mail was being properly monitored.

"I am confident we are doing what we should be doing, monitoring communications in and out of the facility," he said.

Not everyone is brimming with Gonzales' confidence. And how much weight that opinion carries should be questioned after just one visit by the Attorney General.

John Gage, President of the American Federation of Government Employees also toured the Florence prison and as expected feels more should be done. Gage represents 600,000 federal union workers across the country, including Bureau of Prisons employees.

"There have been cuts in correctional officers," Gage said. "There have been cuts in service. The number of assaults on guards are up. We want something done about this."

Supermax has 208 employees, short of the 240 it had when the prison opened in 1994. Nationwide, the Bureau of Prisons has pledged to reduce its 35,000-strong workforce by 3,118 correction officers. That's cause for concern for not only the Florence prison but other high-profile correction facilities across the United States.

In the absence of more guards, technology is being touted as a sufficient replacement. Bureau Director Harley Lappin said the addition of a number of cameras around the complex have created a safer environment.

But Gage and some others aren't buying that argument.

"The thing that really irritates me about this technology argument is they have cameras, but they're not manned," he said. "This is not replacement technology for a professional correctional officer."

While Gonzales' tour may not have answered concerns by critics, it certainly has brought more attention to the prison. Officials should continue to monitor security concerns as an obligation to the men and women who work at the prison and the surrounding communities.

An approach that includes continual monitoring of security conditions makes more sense than waiting for a tragic incident to occur, especially one that could have been prevented.

WAR NEWS:

Airstrikes Kill Insurgents, U.S. Says (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

First of Two Assaults Hits Area Where Helicopters Were Downed

BAGHDAD, March 3 -- Several al-Qaeda in Iraq insurgents who had targeted U.S. helicopters were killed in an airstrike north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said Saturday. A second strike killed members of another al-Qaeda cell that has orchestrated car bombings.

Meanwhile, three U.S. soldiers on patrol in central Baghdad were killed by a roadside bomb, the military said.

The first air assault, near Taji, north of Baghdad, destroyed trucks mounted with antiaircraft guns in an area where several American helicopters have been shot down in recent weeks.

"Coalition forces believe key terrorists were killed during the airstrike," the military said in a statement. "Results are still being assessed at this time."

Sunni insurgents say they have downed at least six U.S. helicopters since Jan. 20. After several helicopters crashed in the first weeks of this year, U.S. officials ordered a reevaluation of how troops are moved around in an increasingly hostile war zone. Helicopters are being used more frequently in Iraq because sophisticated roadside bombs have made ground travel more dangerous.

The second airstrike destroyed a car bomb factory in southern Baghdad, killing seven people inside, the U.S. military said, adding that "this cell is responsible for a large and devastating number" of attacks in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0139761

In Ramadi, 60 miles west of Baghdad, a car bomb apparently targeting an Iraqi police checkpoint exploded about noon near Anbar University. At least 12 people were killed, including two police officers, and 15 were injured, police said.

In Yusufiyah, about 15 miles south of Baghdad, gunmen killed six male members of a Sunni family after raiding their home. The attack apparently was in response to the family's efforts to reconcile with local Shiites, news services reported.

A senior adviser to Iraq's defense minister was kidnapped in western Baghdad, according to Iraqi television reports.

Meanwhile, a roadside bomb targeting the top police commander in Salahuddin province, Brig. Hamad al-Jubury, killed two of his bodyguards, police said.

U.S. Airstrikes Hit Qaeda Post In Iraq (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 3 — The United States military said Saturday that an airstrike north of Baghdad had killed several insurgents with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who were using heavy artillery and machine guns to fire at American helicopters.

The strike occurred Friday west of Taji, where several American helicopters were shot down in recent weeks, and the American assault destroyed at least two pickup trucks with mounted machine guns, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman in Baghdad.

He said the strike did not appear to eliminate the threat to American aircraft because other weapons had been used against helicopters in Falluja and other parts of the country.

“We have seen other systems,” he said. “When the other helicopters were shot down, it wasn’t always heavy machine guns that did that. Part of the assessment we’re doing now is trying to figure out where in the network these weapons fit in.”

Military authorities on Saturday night were still investigating the identities of the gunmen and how many men were killed. An American military statement said, “Coalition forces believe key terrorists were killed during the airstrike.”

The attack was the latest effort to eliminate an emerging threat to American troops. At least eight American helicopters have crashed or been shot down since January.

Military officials have said that Sunni insurgents might be especially motivated to shoot down helicopters as a way of discrediting the new American and Iraqi security plan and undermining military transportation.

Helicopters have also become ever more important over the past few years as ground convoys became increasingly vulnerable. Army helicopters logged 240,000 hours in 2005, 334,000 hours in 2006, and are projected to log 400,000 hours in 2007, the military said.

And in a sign of what officials have described as an increased use of offensive air power in Iraq, a second airstrike destroyed a car bomb factory on Saturday in southern Baghdad, the United States military said.

Two precision-guided bombs destroyed a building and killed at least seven people suspected of being insurgents who had been firing at American troops in the area, an American military statement said.

Colonel Garver said that the announcement of two airstrikes on the same day did not necessarily mean that more bombs were being dropped, but that it did reflect a broadened presence of American air power over Iraq, with more jets in the air flying closer to American troops on the ground.

“The role has expanded to include other missions that we maybe have not used it for in the past, such as a show of force,” he said.

Three American soldiers died Saturday after a roadside bomb exploded beside their vehicle in central Baghdad, the military said in a statement.

Witnesses in the Sunni Adhamiya section of Baghdad said that two roadside bombs hit an American convoy around 2:30 p.m. The first explosion burned the lead Humvee, and when the convoy tried to escape from the area, a second blast tore through another Humvee, rolling it onto its side as it slid into a small shack on the side of the road.

American reinforcements arrived about 15 minutes later to secure the area and search nearby homes alongside Iraqi Army soldiers. Residents said at least 15 people were detained, and that one resident might have been shot during the searches.

DOJ_NMG_0139762

The military also said that an Iraqi detainee died Friday at an American-run prison from "injuries sustained after being assaulted from other detainees."

The detainee's death is under investigation, according to a military statement.

In Yusifiya, gunmen killed six Sunni men, including four brothers, at a family gathering, the local authorities said.

Wire services reported that insurgents had sent death threats to members of the family after they had met local Shiite leaders to pursue reconciliation.

But an official of the local security forces said that the killing appeared to have been motivated by an intratribal dispute over property. The attackers approached the family on foot and fled immediately after shooting.

Four separate roadside bombings against Baghdad police patrols killed at least one officer and wounded at least eight others, an Interior Ministry official said.

In the contested neighborhood of Ghazaliya in western Baghdad, a commander of a Baghdad police brigade was also shot and killed in what appeared to be an assassination, the official said.

In Ramadi, a suicide bomber killed at least 12 people, including a child and 5 policemen, when he blew up his car at an Iraqi police checkpoint near Anbar University, the Iraqi police said. At least 22 others were wounded.

Police officials in Saladin Province reported that a roadside bomb aimed at the province's top commander, Maj. Gen. Hamad al-Jubori, killed two of his guards. General Jubori survived.

British Trace Missile In Copter Strike To Iran (WT)

By Sean Rayment

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

LONDON -- A missile that brought down a Royal Air Force Lynx helicopter and killed five British service members was smuggled into Iraq by Iranian agents, an official inquiry into the attack will reveal.

The Sunday Telegraph has learned that a British Army Board of Inquiry (BOI) into the events surrounding the May attack will state that the weapon, a shoulder-launched surface-to-air missile known as an SA14 Strella, came from Iran.

The attack, which was responsible for the death of Flight Lt. Sarah Mulvihill, the first British servicewoman to be killed on active service since World War II, appears to provide further evidence of Iran's direct involvement in the deaths of British troops serving in Iraq.

A Defense Ministry spokesman declined to comment on the inquiry.

"The board of inquiry process has not yet been concluded. It would be wrong to speculate about the cause of the crash until this process has finished," a ministry spokesman said.

It is understood that the inquiry, which has assessed evidence from military engineers and scientists, will conclude that the aircraft was shot down with an Iranian SA14 missile. The inquiry, which is conducted by senior air force and army officers, will deliver its finding to defense chiefs next month.

The report also will reveal whether the helicopter's self-defense systems were working properly and whether they provided adequate protection from a missile fired from relatively short range.

Traditionally, the role of a military board of inquiry, which can examine everything from the loss of a piece of equipment to the deaths of servicemen, is not to attribute "blame" for a particular incident. Instead, senior officers make recommendations to prevent another similar incident.

The Foreign Office is expected to use the findings to step up diplomatic pressure on the Iranian government, which has been asked to crack down on units within its defense and security services believed to be supplying weapons and bomb-making technology to insurgents in Iraq.

Dozens of British soldiers have been killed in Iraq by improvised explosive devices in the form of roadside bombs, thought to have either been manufactured in Iran or by insurgents trained by the Iranians.

Hundreds of thousands of Strellas were produced by the Soviet Union in the 1970s and were used to equip armies throughout the Warsaw Pact, Central Asia and the Middle East, including Syria and Iran. The same weapon system is also thought to have been responsible for bringing down several U.S. helicopters in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0139763

Although the weapon is cheap to produce and easy to assemble, operators need some skill to use it effectively, suggesting that the missile was fired either by an Iranian agent or by someone who had been trained by a skilled soldier.

The attack also claimed the life of the most senior British officer to have been killed in the three-year conflict, Wing Cmdr. John Coxen, 46, who was about to take over command of the British helicopter fleet in southern Iraq.

The other three men killed were the pilot, Lt. Cmdr. Darren Chapman, 40; his co-pilot, Capt. David Dobson, 27; and the door gunner, Marine Paul Collins, 21.

The Lynx Mark 7 was traveling low over central Basra on a sortie to familiarize Cmdr. Coxen with the dangers his pilots might face. Although it was believed at first that the helicopter had been brought down by a "lucky hit" from a rocket-propelled grenade, British troops found discarded missile parts in a nearby building after the incident.

Agreement Allows U.S. Presence In Sadr City (KCS/MCT)

The Kansas City Star/McClatchy, March 4, 2007

The U.S. military has reached an agreement with representatives of the Shiite community in Baghdad's Sadr City enclave that will allow American forces to maintain a permanent presence in the militia stronghold for the first time since 2004, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saturday.

Under the agreement, the U.S. will open one of the joint security stations that are a prominent feature of the new Baghdad security plan, living alongside Iraqi forces in a police station just inside the impoverished neighborhood, said Rahim al-Daraji, one of Sadr City's two mayors.

But there is still some uncertainty about the degree to which U.S. forces at the combat outpost will be welcome to move freely around the neighborhood, the scene of two fierce battles in 2004 between the U.S. and the Mahdi Army militia headed by anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Al-Daraji said the deal means U.S. forces will man checkpoints, conduct raids and mount patrols in conjunction with Iraqi forces throughout Sadr City, just as they are doing elsewhere in Baghdad. It is expected they will move into the station by mid-March, said al-Daraji, an independent politician who has been negotiating with U.S. officials on ways to secure the entry of American forces into the neighborhood since late January.

"All movements and political tendencies are ready to welcome the multinational forces into Sadr City in order to make the security plan succeed," he said. "There will be multinational forces at every checkpoint alongside Iraqi forces."

However, Naim Kaabi, a Sadrist official and one of Baghdad's deputy mayors, said only a small number of U.S. troops would be based at the police station and they would not be permitted to move around Sadr City on a regular basis, only to act as emergency backup for Iraqi security forces.

"The Iraqi security forces are welcomed here, and there is no need to have any American forces," he said. "Americans will not get involved unless there is an emergency. They will not do operations, and this is part of the agreement."

Maj. Steven Lamb, a military spokesman in Baghdad, declined to discuss details of the upcoming deployment and said there are still some specifics to be worked out. The intention is to treat Sadr City just like any other Baghdad neighborhood, he said.

"Things are looking very favorable," he said. "I can say that the Sadr City people are very welcoming to us at this time."

He wouldn't say how many soldiers will eventually move into Sadr City, but according to a U.S. military statement, troops are preparing for a "significantly increased presence" in the 6-square-mile district of 2 million people.

The 2nd Brigade Combat Team of the 82nd Airborne Division, newly arrived in Baghdad, is expected to deploy at the joint security station, one of dozens of smaller military outposts being established across Baghdad in an effort to bring U.S. forces into closer contact with local communities.

The brigade is the first of five extra units due to be deployed as part of President Bush's troop escalation in support of the Baghdad security plan, the central plank in his revised Iraq strategy and the biggest effort yet to bring the capital under control.

Since the plan formally went into effect Feb. 14, U.S. troops have significantly intensified their presence on the streets, and U.S. officials have expressed cautious optimism as the level of violence appears to be falling.

DOJ_NMG_0139764

There were no reported bombings against Iraqi targets in Baghdad on Saturday, an unusually quiet day, but three U.S. soldiers were killed when a roadside bomb struck their convoy in Baghdad, the military said.

Though car bombings blamed on Sunni insurgents have continued, the sectarian killings for which Shiite militias were held largely responsible have dropped, suggesting the Mahdi Army is complying with orders from its leaders to stay off the streets.

Al-Sadr has also dropped out of sight and is reportedly in Iran. A week ago, a representative read a statement on al-Sadr's behalf to his followers in Sadr City in which he criticized U.S. involvement in the security plan but also said Iraqi security forces should be supported in their efforts to pacify the city.

The statement was widely interpreted as a gesture of support for the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, though it left uncertain the question of how the Mahdi Army will respond if U.S. troops extend their reach deep into Sadr City.

If American forces do deploy in the streets of the slum, the Mahdi Army will not confront them, predicted Sadr City's other mayor, Hassan Karim, an al-Sadr supporter. He said he has not been informed of the agreement and does not want to see U.S. forces based at the police station.

"But of course there will be no resistance," he said. "American forces are already everywhere on the ground in Iraq, and we do not welcome them anywhere."

Iran War Weapons Fuel Iraq Insurgency (AP)

By Lauren Frayer, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 4, 2007

Mud roads crisscross green hills between palm groves. Snowcapped mountains rise in the distance across the Iranian border. Donkeys stroll along footpaths, carrying the region's harvest — land mines.

Risking their lives, Iraqi shepherds are increasingly venturing into these deadly fields to dig up mines planted during the Iran-Iraq war two decades ago, according to U.S. soldiers, who say insurgents then use the mines to fashion roadside bombs that kill American troops.

With Iraq's economy still struggling, shepherds need the money. And the insurgents are looking for more sources of weapons and explosives as the war enters its fifth year.

"They're going out there and farming them," said Capt. Jesse Stewart of Seattle, Wash., who runs a training school for Iraqi border guards at this border station 90 miles northeast of Baghdad. "Shepherds are digging them up and selling them on the black market."

Old Iran-Iraq war era land mines were used in about 15 percent of the roadside bombs that exploded or were detected in northern Iraq during January, according to Navy Lt. Sarah Wilson, an explosives officer based in Tikrit.

Many of them were believed to have come from this border area.

"All of that unexploded ordnance, minefields and shrapnel — it's still out there," said Lt. Col. Ron Ward, 49, who helps train Iraqi guards.

The vast majority of harvested mines reach their insurgent buyers undetected.

In November, U.S. troops confiscated 53 anti-tank mines and a rocket strapped to the backs of six donkeys found wandering on a footpath outside Khanaqin, about five miles from Iran.

The mines were older Soviet and Italian models of the same type Saddam Hussein's army used along this border during the Iran-Iraq war, the U.S. military said.

And there's plenty more where that came from.

The International Campaign to Ban Landmines estimates that Saddam ordered between 12 and 16 million mines planted along the border with Iran during the war. A U.N. project cleared less than 10,000 mines between 1998 and 2002 before work was halted.

Attention has been focused on the porous, 900-mile border because U.S. military officials allege that Iranian weapons, including advanced roadside bombs, are being smuggled to Shiite extremists here. Iran has denied the allegation, but U.S. officials insist they have compelling evidence that components for "explosively formed projectiles" were manufactured in Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0139765

American officials say the EPFs account for a relatively small percentage of the roadside bombs used in Iraq but have still killed more than 170 U.S. and coalition soldiers since mid-2004.

Despite the recent spotlight on Iran, U.S. officials say the majority of weapons used by Sunni and Shiite extremists have been in this country for years and were looted from Iraqi military arsenals after the fall of Saddam in April 2003.

About 30 percent of the insurgent weapons found here in Diyala province date back to the Iran-Iraq war, said Maj. Suzanne MacDonald, an intelligence officer with the 1st Cavalry Division's 3rd Brigade.

They include not only mines planted along the Iranian border but also weapons caches buried by the Iraqi military decades ago in a labyrinth of clay dunes and stone outcroppings, said MacDonald, 38, from Georgetown, Texas.

"Terrorists go and collect those weapons — land mines and mortars — that are left from the Iran-Iraq war," said Gen. Nazim Shareef Muhamed, a former Kurdish guerrilla fighter who heads the Iraqi Department of Border Enforcement in Khanaqin.

It is easier for locals, who have farmed this difficult terrain for generations, to find the buried weaponry, said Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon, commander of U.S. forces in northern Iraq.

They "don't need night vision technology" to locate it, Mixon said. The Iraqis then presumably remove the detonators before transporting the mines for sale to insurgents.

Those recycled weapons have been used against U.S. and Iraqi forces across a wide area of eastern Iraq.

"In Balad Ruz, we got hit by 18 anti-tank mines that I'm 100 percent sure came from right here," Stewart said, referring to a town about 60 miles to the south.

The Red Cross said in 2001 that an average of 30 Iraqis per month were injured by land mines and unexploded ordnance in this region. But surveys have been impossible since then and many injuries are believed to go unreported. An Iraqi border guard lost his leg last year in an explosion from a land mine here.

U.S. officers believe economics is responsible for an increase in the harvesting of old mines and weapons — although they did not know how much an anti-tank or anti-personnel mine can fetch on the black market.

And with Iraq's economy faltering and unemployment in some areas as high as 60 percent, Iraqis who have no direct role in the insurgency are turning to small-scale arms deals for their livelihood.

"If you're working either for the bad guys or just to feed your family, you've just found a couple dollars that might take care of your family for the week if you sell it," said Wilson, the Navy lieutenant in Tikrit.

Human Rights Watch estimates than nearly 150,000 Iraqi families — or about 900,000 people — live in communities near mine fields. The area is mostly Kurdish but has substantial numbers of Arabs.

"Most folks here don't think there will be success in the Iraqi government," MacDonald said. "The less optimism they have for the future, the more they think of themselves and their clan or hometown."

Anti-tank mines are the safest to collect because they are not as sensitive as anti-personnel mines and are less likely to explode during harvesting, said Wilson, from Moon Township, Pa.

And, she added, "They're the easiest thing for the enemy to use against us, because they're already manufactured. It's simple: Drop and go."

Iraq Violence Takes Toll On Aid Groups (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

There are fewer than 10 organizations active in the country, but the number may fall after the killing of a worker.

BAGHDAD — First it was the curfew. Then the checkpoints and the car bombs. Later, it was the Iraqis' fear of being seen entering a compound occupied by foreigners.

Eventually, for the U.S. nonprofit organization training Iraqi healthcare workers, the risks outweighed the returns. Iraqis couldn't come to them. Americans couldn't go to the Iraqis.

So to avoid working in Baghdad, RTI International moved classes to Jordan and Egypt, flying trainees back and forth.

DOJ_NMG_0139766

RTI trained hundreds of Iraqis, who in turn trained thousands more when they returned to Iraq. But the hurdles they encountered along the way are typical of the challenges facing the handful of international aid and development organizations still working in Iraq.

Most groups pulled out after the 2003 bombing of the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad. Fewer than 10 remain, a minuscule number given the level of need, say those in the aid community.

And there are concerns that the number could shrink further after the killing in January of an American woman working for the National Democratic Institute, a Washington-based group that since 2003 has been helping Iraqis build their new government.

The attack was a stark reminder of the perils of aid work in Iraq, be it building sewer systems, teaching fair polling practices or tending to people displaced by sectarian violence.

At least 82 foreign and Iraqi staffers of the U.N. and nonprofit organizations, known as NGOs, have been killed since the war began in March 2003, according to the umbrella group NGO Coordination Committee in Iraq. Scores of workers have been abducted.

For aid groups, which step in when governments cannot or will not care for their people, the decision to leave can be agonizing, particularly when the crisis is growing as clearly as it is in Iraq.

After a decade of sanctions, a foreign invasion and now a civil war, Iraq is in need of everything from road repairs to security — just drive along Baghdad's gray and battered streets, past the concrete blast barriers, the sagging, bullet-pocked buildings and intersections guarded by gunmen.

Tens of thousands of people have been driven from their homes in the sectarian "cleansing" that followed the February 2006 bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, a revered Shiite shrine. The population shifts have disrupted schools and medical facilities, overwhelming them in areas suddenly flooded with newcomers.

People's fear of simply stepping outside has made it difficult for many to shop for food, send their children to school or visit doctors, which over time can lead to increased malnutrition, illiteracy and illness.

"If I look at how many NGOs are at work in Iraq, and I look at the violence and the threats of violence to the average Iraqis, all I can tell you is the need is huge," said David Holdridge of Mercy Corps, an international organization with headquarters in the U.S. and Britain that has remained in Iraq.

A group's decision to pull out usually comes after the death or abduction of an employee. Even then, aid workers wrestle with their consciences.

The New York-based International Rescue Committee left Iraq at the end of 2004 because of security concerns after an employee was kidnapped. George Biddle, the IRC's senior vice president, said it left in part also because the humanitarian crisis anticipated early in the war had not materialized by 2004. The assistance needed then was large-scale reconstruction, which the group does not provide.

The humanitarian needs have soared since then, but so have the security risks. Choosing to stay away is difficult, Biddle said, "but if NGOs don't feel they can go about their business, they spend all their time and resources focusing on security."

Security is such a major concern among organizations still in Iraq that most refuse even to acknowledge their presence.

Nearly all are U.S.-based groups, and, like the National Democratic Institute, they depend on U.S. government money to fund their projects. Because of that, even those that admit to being in Iraq refuse to say where their projects or their employees are based.

Holdridge says Mercy Corps has been able to work in Iraq by never launching projects without first winning the support of local tribal and religious leaders.

However, this can require altering programs to suit the leaders, many of them Shiite Muslim clerics who have objected to, among other things, women leading computer courses. "The message was clear: Don't cross the boundaries," Holdridge said.

An aid worker involved in the RTI project, who declined to be identified for security reasons, said the problems the North Carolina-based nonprofit group encountered grew after the Samarra mosque bombing.

A government-imposed curfew in Baghdad after the blast made it difficult for trainees to get to their sessions on time. As violence increased, Iraqis needed to leave for home earlier to get off the streets before dark.

DOJ_NMG_0139767

The growing number of car bombs and militia checkpoints scared many of them off the road altogether, as did the risk of entering the compound where the training was taking place, said the aid worker. It became virtually impossible for trainees coming from outside Baghdad to reach the city safely.

"It became harder and harder to recruit people as the situation deteriorated," the aid worker said.

RTI says the 20-month program, which ended in December, nevertheless was a success and showed that by adjusting methods to suit the environment, aid organizations could continue their work. More than 4,600 Iraqis, from doctors to social workers, have been trained, most of them by other Iraqis who were taught by RTI.

But organizations such as the National Democratic Institute, which work closely with political groups and leaders, cannot necessarily achieve their goals from a distance.

Their ability to help Iraqis build democratic government institutions depends on regular face-to-face contact, even if that means visiting dangerous areas where the arrival of heavily guarded foreigners cannot be missed. The NDI workers were attacked after one such meeting.

A Western aid official working with another U.S. group, which has programs similar to NDI's but fears going public because of security issues, says the organization rarely has direct contact with Iraqis anymore.

Non-Iraqi staffers only leave their compound to visit the fortified Green Zone, where U.S. and Iraqi government and military headquarters are based. Even those trips are rare. Visiting staffers outside Baghdad is impossible, as is visiting programs to gauge their effectiveness.

None of this bodes well for success in Iraq, say aid workers, who emphasize the need for their organizations to form partnerships with Iraqi communities they are trying to assist.

That means being on the ground with them, having regular contact and, in essence, being "embedded in a community," said Sam Worthington, the president of InterAction, an alliance of U.S.-based aid organizations. "Without that being present, it makes it very difficult for reconstruction, let alone the building of a society."

Desperation Helps Out In Baghdad (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

The Bush administration is tossing babies off the Iraq sled as the wolves of disintegration creep closer. Desperation runs through the flurry of initiatives that the White House and State Department have breathlessly wheeled out to deal with Iraq's war in recent weeks.

And so it should. Desperation is the right conclusion to reach, and to communicate, to an Iraq that totters on the edge of extinction as a nation-state. Desperation is Iraq's ground truth, a ground truth the administration has long sought to deny and evade.

The sense that even President Bush will be eyeing the exit if Iraq's chaos worsens has spurred Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take serious steps -- at long last -- to encourage Iraqis to look for compromise rather than endlessly pursue revenge against each other and to persuade Washington to give Iraq more room to deal with its neighbors in its own right.

The sobering effect that these steps are having may turn out to be more important than the immediate practical outcomes of the overlapping and in places contradictory initiatives that the administration has recently unveiled. These include Bush's military "surge," a regional political "realignment" and an international conference in Baghdad. Individually, none of these measures does much beyond buying time while the administration stalls critics and moves to define success in Iraq downward.

"The administration has been so focused on perception that it has frequently missed the point" of Iraq's complex realities, says Qubad Talabani, Washington representative of the Kurdistan Regional Government. "If how it looks in Washington becomes more important than how it works out in Baghdad, we all lose."

That is a caution that applies to war critics who insist on unrealistic benchmarks or deadlines as well as to war supporters who insist on Bush's freedom of action. Both tend to overestimate U.S. ability to manage withdrawal -- or escalation -- on its own terms, relegating Iraqis and others in the region to the status of bit players in an American political drama.

DOJ_NMG_0139768

The addition of 17,500 troops into Baghdad that Bush announced Jan. 10 smacked initially of being another gimmick, of resembling an exit-covering escalation, as in an old Western where the gunslinger backs out the saloon door with guns blazing.

But the impression of impending crisis has either prompted or helped Maliki to develop a political initiative of his own to accompany the surge -- and has encouraged U.S. officials to give him more room to maneuver. Bypassing the dysfunctional " national unity" cabinet that U.S. officials helped force on him nearly a year ago, the prime minister has created four committees to work directly with Gen. David Petraeus in implementing the new Baghdad security plan.

"General Petraeus seems to agree that the prime minister's Baghdad security plan should not be seen as a crackdown but as a political effort that has important security aspects," Ahmed Chalabi, who heads the committee charged with building public support for the new effort, told me by telephone from Baghdad last week.

Maliki has turned to the energetic but controversial Chalabi -- once supported by key figures in the Bush administration and then dumped by the White House, allegedly because of his ties to Iran -- to work on the task of reconciliation between Shiites and Sunnis at the neighborhood level. "People are fed up with the violence" and may be ready to overcome old differences, says Chalabi, who seems to have noticeably softened his harsh judgments of the limited place ex-Baathists should occupy in Iraqi society.

Another sign of change: Washington settled last week for effective federalism in Iraq rather than clinging to unrealistic hopes for centralization of state power. U.S. officials prodded Maliki's cabinet into accepting a new petroleum law allowing the Kurdish regional government to let contracts for exploration and production in the north while promising Sunnis a fair share of all oil revenue.

Iraq-centered realism may also be at work on the diplomatic track. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's newly declared willingness to go to Baghdad to meet with Iranian, Syrian and other regional officials -- if a preparatory ambassadorial meeting to be held there Saturday makes progress -- rewards persistent efforts by Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari to host an international conference in the Iraqi capital. This looks like a more promising option than Rice's previously announced effort to exploit a diplomatic "realignment" that in effect would have pitted Sunnis against Shiites throughout the region.

These shifts amount to straws in a hurricane that still has to run its course. But in the Middle East, as elsewhere, desperation is frequently the mother of all progress.

Walter Reed Changes Planned (WP)

By Josh White, Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Nonmedical General To Be Named as Deputy Commander

Army officials plan to revise the command structure at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, installing a nonmedical general officer as deputy commander to ensure that administrative operations run smoothly, in the wake of reports of serious problems with outpatient care at the facility, officials said yesterday.

A one-star general -- who has not yet been identified -- will work with Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, a physician who was named on Friday to head Walter Reed, according to two defense officials. The new deputy will be a general who will bring a nonmedical eye to the operation to "make it run like it's supposed to run," said one Army official familiar with the decision.

Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, has also directed that an infantry officer -- one who recently served in Iraq -- assume the leadership of a new unit at Walter Reed called the "Wounded Warrior Transition Brigade," whose specific aim is to take care of outpatients. The brigade will address problems such as those identified in a series of Washington Post reports about substandard conditions and bureaucratic tangles that affected the care of injured soldiers who had returned from Iraq and Afghanistan.

"The changes will allow commanders to provide direct organizational leadership without any other distraction," said Brig. Gen. Anthony A. Cucolo III, the Army's top spokesman.

Since the problems at Walter Reed were made public, the Army has begun refurbishing Building 18, an off-campus facility where dozens of outpatients stay, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman was relieved as Walter Reed commander, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey resigned under pressure from Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

DOJ_NMG_0139769

Congressional hearings on Walter Reed are scheduled to begin tomorrow. Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army's surgeon general, is expected to face tough questioning about the facility. Kiley commanded Walter Reed until 2004, when he became the Army's top doctor.

Also yesterday, the Army released a statement indicating Weightman acted upon a warning last year from a subordinate about a shortage of workers at Walter Reed and resolved the critical issues that were raised. Col. Peter Garibaldi, the Walter Reed garrison commander, issued a statement through the Army to follow up on an internal memorandum he wrote in September.

In that memo, released publicly Friday by the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, Garibaldi warned that "patient care services are at risk of mission failure" because of staff shortages brought on by the privatization of the hospital's support workforce.

Garibaldi said yesterday that Weightman "evaluated the situation and recognized its importance. Consequently, all of three critical issues I highlighted were resolved."

On Friday, Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), who heads the panel's national security subcommittee, cited Garibaldi's memo as raising "a new dimension to the problems at Walter Reed."

Tierney said Friday that he intends to ask Army officials at tomorrow's hearing, about the memo and the reasons that the workforce was privatized.

Iraq PM Vows Cabinet Shakeup In 2 Weeks (AP)

By Robert H. Reid And Qassim Abdul-Zahra, Associated Press Writers

AP, March 4, 2007

Iraq's prime minister said Saturday he will reshuffle his Cabinet within two weeks and pursue criminal charges against political figures linked to extremists as a sign of his government's resolve to restore stability during the U.S.-led security crackdown in Baghdad.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki also told The Associated Press during an interview at his Green Zone office that Iraq will work hard to ensure the success of a regional security conference.

The conference in Baghdad, tentatively set for next weekend, is expected to bring together all of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, as well as the United States and Britain to find ways to ease this country's security crisis.

Iran has not announced whether it will attend, but Iraqi officials believe that Tehran will send a representative.

Al-Maliki has been under pressure from the U.S. to bring order into his factious government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds since it took office last May. Rumors of Cabinet changes have surfaced before, only to disappear because of pressure from coalition members seeking to keep power.

Nevertheless, al-Maliki said there would be a Cabinet reshuffle "either this week or next."

After the changes are announced, al-Maliki said he would undertake a "change in the ministerial structure," presumably consolidating and streamlining the 39-member Cabinet.

The prime minister did not say how many Cabinet members would be replaced. But some officials said about nine would lose their jobs, including all six Cabinet members loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an al-Maliki ally.

Al-Sadr also controls 30 of the 275 parliament seats, and his support for al-Maliki has been responsible for the government's reluctance to crack down on the cleric's Mahdi Army militia, blamed for much of the Shiite-Sunni slaughter of the past year.

U.S. officials had been urging al-Maliki to cut his ties to al-Sadr and form a new alliance of mainstream Shiites, moderate Sunnis and Kurds. Al-Maliki had been stalling, presumably at the urging of the powerful Shiite clerical hierarchy that wants to maintain Shiite unity.

But pressure for change has mounted since President Bush ordered 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq last January despite widespread opposition in Congress and among the U.S. public — weary of the nearly four-year-long war.

DOJ_NMG_0139770

Last month, U.S. and Iraqi troops arrested Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili, an al-Sadr ally, for allegedly diverting millions of dollars in government funds to the Mahdi Army and allowing death squads to use ambulances and government hospitals to carry out kidnappings and killings.

During the interview, al-Maliki said other top officials would face prosecution for ties to insurgents, sectarian militias and death squads — including members of parliament.

"There has been coordination between us and the Multinational Forces ... starting at the beginning of this year ... to determine who should arrested and the reasons behind arresting them," he said.

Al-Maliki did not elaborate on the U.S.-Iraqi coordination but said Iraqi judicial authorities were reviewing case files to decide which to refer to an Iraqi investigative judge, who must decide whether there is enough evidence to order a trial.

Al-Maliki said he was encouraged by Iraqi public response to the new Baghdad security operation — which has led to a sharp drop in violence in the capital.

He also defended his government, saying it managed to "achieve a lot of harmony and stability" despite attacks by al-Qaida and Saddam Hussein loyalists.

The prime minister did not say how many politicians and officials might be targeted for formal investigation, an Iraqi legal step that corresponds to a grand jury probe.

But five senior Iraqis — two of them generals and three from Shiite and Sunni parties — have told the AP that up to 100 prominent figures could face legal proceedings.

The five spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk about the subject to the media. All five had direct knowledge of the case review.

U.S. officials have said privately that a number of prominent Iraqis were believed to have ties to armed groups.

One Shiite parliament member, Jamal Jaafar Mohammed, is believed to have fled to Iran after U.S. authorities learned that he was convicted by a Kuwaiti court in absentia and sentenced to death in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. and French embassies in Kuwait.

Mohammed fled Kuwait for Iran before he could be arrested and returned after the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003. U.S. officials have alleged he was a conduit for Iranian weapons and supplies smuggled to Shiite militias.

U.S. military officials have expressed concern over alleged Iranian weapons shipments and financial support to Shiite parties allied with al-Maliki. The Shiite-led government hopes the upcoming regional conference will ease tensions between the U.S. and Shiite-dominated Iran — and allay Washington's fears of Tehran's influence here.

The U.S. also hopes the conference will encourage Syria and other Arab countries — most of them Sunni-led — to increase their support for Iraqi's leadership, despite regional unease over the Shiite-led government's ties to Iran.

"In fact the importance of the upcoming conference lies in the fact that the Iraqi government has the ability to serve as a proper venue for solving conflicts," al-Maliki said.

"So we will exert the utmost effort to find solutions to all pending questions, either among regional countries themselves or between them and Iraq, or between them and powers such as the U.S. and Britain and the international community."

Sunnis Slain Over Talks With Shi'ites (WT/AP)

By Brian Murphy

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Gunmen rounded up two Sunni families who had received death threats for joining U.S.-organized talks with local Shi'ites, hauling away the men and boys and killing all six yesterday in a campaign by suspected Sunni insurgents to keep opponents from cooperating with Iraq's government.

Also, the al Qaeda-affiliated group Islamic State of Iraq posted an online video of the execution of 18 Iraqi security troops, shot in the back of their heads while kneeling in a field.

The three-minute video, posted on a Web site previously used by the Islamists, said the 18 kidnapped government security personnel were slain in retaliation for the purported rape of a Sunni woman by members of the Shi'ite-dominated police. The video's authenticity could not be immediately verified.

DOJ_NMG_0139771

The group also claimed responsibility for the deaths of 14 policemen whose bodies were found Friday in the northeast province of Diyala.

Some of the victims were decapitated, according to an Associated Press photographer. Their remains were cleansed in Muslim tradition before burial in the Shi'ite city of Najaf, 100 miles south of Baghdad.

U.S. forces, meanwhile, reported air strikes and raids on what they described as Sunni militant bases linked to the group al Qaeda in Iraq.

A recent wave of Sunni reprisals appears linked to increasingly high-profile attempts to stir popular momentum against Sunni terrorists and militants who are trying to drive out the Shi'ite-led government and its American backers.

Those targeted include a range of Sunnis raising their voices against violence: imams, clan-based vigilantes and activists trying to bridge deep rifts with majority Shi'ites.

"We are seeing more people beginning to challenge the insurgents," said Marine Brig. Gen. John Allen, who oversees units in the militant heartland west of Baghdad.

The families gunned down at sunrise yesterday had received death threats for weeks after attending gatherings of Sunni and Shi'ite leaders, police said.

The first meeting, organized by U.S. military officials on Feb. 13, brought together leaders of prominent clans from both sides, said military spokesman Maj. Webster M. Wright III.

The clan chiefs held another round on their own about a week later and appointed a joint council "to discuss the terms of reconciliation" around Youssifiyah, a Sunni-dominated area about 12 miles south of Baghdad, Maj. Wright said.

At dawn, gunmen stormed the home of two families belonging to the influential Sunni Mashhada tribe, said police 1st Lt. Haider Satar. Two fathers and their four sons were separated from their wives and sisters. They were executed at point-blank range.

In the morgue in nearby Mahmoudiya, AP Television News footage showed at least two victims had their hands bound behind their backs.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, is under pressure from Washington to take a stronger stand against Sunni insurgents, as well as a Shi'ite militia that forms part of his power base.

In an interview with the Associated Press, Mr. al-Maliki said he will reshuffle his 39-seat Cabinet "either this week or next" and pursue criminal charges against political figures -- and even members of parliament -- linked to extremists.

He said there has been coordination between Iraqi and multinational forces from the beginning of the year "to determine who should be arrested and the reasons behind arresting them."

The prime minister did not say how many Cabinet members would be replaced, but some officials said about nine would lose their jobs, including all six Cabinet members loyal to radical anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who leads the powerful Mahdi's Army militia.

U.S. officials had been urging Mr. al-Maliki to cut his ties to Sheik al-Sadr and form a new alliance of mainstream Shi'ites, moderate Sunnis and Kurds.

Mr. al-Maliki has won some breathing room in recent days with a notable -- but perhaps temporary -- drop in bloodshed in Baghdad. It comes as a U.S.-led security crackdown concentrates on areas considered staging grounds for Sunni insurgent car bombs and mortar attacks.

The Mahdi's Army also was strong-armed by Mr. al-Maliki to pull back. Its suspected death squads once left dozens of Sunni victims around the city -- a figure that has fallen off significantly.

In western Baghdad, meanwhile, a top adviser to Iraq's Defense Ministry was kidnapped in western Baghdad, said an aide to Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the largest Sunni bloc in parliament.

In U.S. raids north of Baghdad, nine suspected insurgents were captured, including two thought to be responsible for recruiting and helping foreign militants in Baghdad, the U.S. military said. The suspects also were accused of harboring al Qaeda in Iraq leaders, it said, but gave no further details.

DOJ_NMG_0139772

U.S. warplanes also struck a suspected car bomb factory in Arab Jabour, south of Baghdad, the military said. Seven suspected insurgents were killed when two precision-guided bombs destroyed the structure where they were hiding, the military said.

Iraq Terror Group Posts Tape Of Killings (AP)

By Brian Murphy

AP, March 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) - An al-Qaida-affiliated group said Saturday it killed 18 kidnapped government security forces in retaliation for the alleged rape of a Sunni woman by members of the Shiite-dominated police, posting an online video of the officers being shot in the back of their heads while kneeling in a field.

The authenticity of the three-minute video, posted on a Web site previously used by the Islamic State of Iraq, could not be immediately verified.

The group also said it had killed 14 policemen, whose bodies were found Friday in the northeast province of Diyala, in retaliation for the alleged rape. Some of the victims were decapitated, according to an Associated Press photographer.

Meanwhile, gunmen rounded up two Sunni families that had received death threats for joining U.S.-organized talks with local Shiites, hauling away the men and boys and killing all six Saturday as suspected insurgents expanded a campaign of fear against opponents.

U.S. forces also reported airstrikes and raids on what it called Sunni militant bases linked to al-Qaida in Iraq.

A recent wave of Sunni reprisals appears linked to increasingly high-profile attempts to stir popular momentum against Sunni extremists trying to drive out the Shiite-led government and its American backers.

Among those targeted include a range of Sunnis raising their voices against violence: imams, clan-based vigilantes and activists trying to bridge deep rifts with majority Shiites.

The execution video released Saturday first depicts the 18 men, some in Iraqi military uniforms, blindfolded, hands tied behind their backs and lined up in three rows before a screen. The men in the front row are kneeling. Armed masked men were seen pointing machine guns at the captives.

Two masked militants, with checkered scarves on their heads, then fire from handguns at close range into the backs of the men's heads, while a third militant carries a black banner ahead of them. As they are shot, the victims fall, head forward to the ground. The shooting is accompanied by chants of "Allahu Akbar," or "God is the Greatest."

Male voices chant repeatedly in Arabic during the video: "At your service, sister" - a likely reference to the revenge for the allegedly raped Sunni woman.

Another male voice is heard reading from the Islamic State of Iraq's statement posted on the same Web site Friday, saying the group's court had ordered the 18 security troops executed because Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government had failed to meet the group's demands to hand over the officers who allegedly assaulted the Sunni woman in Baghdad last month, and to release all Sunni women detainees from Iraqi prisons.

A 20-year-old woman told Arab television stations that she was detained in a Sunni area of west Baghdad on Feb. 18, taken to a police garrison and assaulted by three officers. The woman gave a name which identified her as Sunni.

Al-Maliki, a Shiite, announced an investigation Feb. 19 but cleared the officers the following day, stirring outrage among Sunni politicians. Al-Maliki said the rape claim was fabricated to tarnish the reputation of the police and the security crackdown in Baghdad.

The two families gunned down at sunrise Saturday had received death threats for weeks after attending gatherings of Sunni and Shiite leaders, police said.

The first meeting, organized by U.S. military officials on Feb. 13, brought together leaders of prominent clans from both sides, said military spokesman Maj. Webster M. Wright III.

The clan chiefs held another round on their own about a week later and appointed a joint council "to discuss the terms of reconciliation" around Youssifiyah, a Sunni-dominated area about 12 miles south of Baghdad, Wright said.

DOJ_NMG_0139773

At dawn, gunmen stormed the home of two families belonging to the influential Sunni Mashhada tribe, said police 1st Lt. Haider Satar. Two fathers and their four sons were separated from their wives and sisters. They were executed at point-blank range.

In the morgue in nearby Mahmoudiya, AP Television News footage showed at least two victims had their hands bound behind their backs.

Al-Maliki is under strong pressure from Washington to take a stronger hand against Sunni insurgents and the Shiite militia that forms part of his power base.

In an interview with the AP, he said he will reshuffle his 39-seat Cabinet "either this week or next" and pursue criminal charges against political figures - and even members of parliament - linked to extremists.

He said there has been coordination between Iraqi and multinational forces from the beginning of the year "to determine who should arrested and the reasons behind arresting them."

The prime minister did not say how many Cabinet members would be replaced. But some officials said about nine would lose their jobs, including all six Cabinet members loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who leads the powerful Mahdi Army militia.

U.S. officials had been urging al-Maliki to cut his ties to al-Sadr and form a new alliance of mainstream Shiites, moderate Sunnis and Kurds.

Al-Maliki has won some breathing room in recent days with a notable - but perhaps temporary - drop in bloodshed in Baghdad. It comes as a U.S.-led security crackdown concentrates on areas considered staging grounds for Sunni insurgent car bombs and mortar attacks.

The Mahdi Army also was strong-armed by al-Maliki to pull back. Its suspected death squads once left dozens of Sunni victims around the city - a figure that has fallen off significantly.

For the second consecutive day, just one major explosion rocked the capital. The latest - a roadside bomb - killed three U.S. soldiers on patrol in central Baghdad, the military said.

In western Baghdad, meanwhile, a top adviser to Iraq's Defense Ministry was kidnapped in western Baghdad, said an aide to Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the largest Sunni bloc in parliament.

Lt. Gen. Thamir Sultan hails from Saddam Hussein's tribe and had been mentioned as a possible defense minister when the current government was organized last year. The aide spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

In U.S. raids north of Baghdad, nine suspected insurgents were captured, including two believed to be responsible for recruiting and helping foreign militants in Baghdad, the U.S. military said. The suspects were also accused of harboring al-Qaida in Iraq leaders, it said, but gave no further details.

U.S. warplanes also struck a suspected car bomb factory in Arab Jabour, south of Baghdad, the military said. Seven suspected insurgents were killed when two precision-guided bombs destroyed the structure where they were hiding, the military said.

In Baghdad, Sectarian Lines Too Deadly To Cross (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 3 — After centuries full of vibrant interaction, of marrying, sharing and selling across sects and classes, Baghdad has become a capital of corrosive and violent borderlines. Streets never crossed. Conversations never started. Doors never entered.

Sunnis and Shiites in many professions now interact almost exclusively with colleagues of the same sect. Sunnis say they are afraid to visit hospitals because Shiites loyal to the cleric Moktada al-Sadr run the Health Ministry, while Shiite laborers who used to climb into the back of pickup trucks for work across the Tigris River in Sunni western Baghdad now take jobs only near home.

DOJ_NMG_0139774

The goal of the new Baghdad security plan is to fix all of this — to fashion a peace that stitches the city's cleaved neighborhoods back together. After three weeks, there are a few signs of progress. The number of bodies found daily has decreased to 20 or fewer from 35 to 50. In some areas closely patrolled by American troops, a few of the families that fled the violence are said to be returning.

But even in neighborhoods that are improving or are relatively calm, borders loom. Streets once crossed without a thought are now bullet-riddled and abandoned, the front lines of a block-by-block war among Shiite militias, Sunni insurgents, competing criminal gangs and Iraqi and American troops.

Some Americans who have seen both Bosnia and Iraq say Baghdad has come to resemble Sarajevo as it began to unravel in the 1990s, latticed with boundaries that are never openly indicated but are passed on in fearful whispers among neighbors who have suffered horrific losses.

Like jagged wounds, the boundaries mark histories of brutal violence. And for Iraqis, they underscore a vital question at the heart of the new plan: can scarred neighborhoods ever heal?

Fadhil/Sadriya

Sybaa Street used to be wall-to-wall people: sidewalks were crammed with shoppers, and roads were snarled with cars. In the heart of central Baghdad, Sybaa was known as the road to get from the automotive shops on one side of the market district to the hardware stores on the other.

Back then — as recently as two years ago, residents said — no one seemed to care that it was the border between the mostly Sunni neighborhood of Fadhil and the largely Shiite areas to the south, Sadriya and Sheik Omar.

But that has all changed. After six months of fighting between Sunnis and Shiites, Sybaa Street is now deserted and forsaken. On a recent afternoon, the only sign of life was a lone mechanic working inside a dark garage, his efforts lighted by a single bulb. Bullets from earlier battles punctured nearly everything — buildings, utility poles, even rusted mufflers hanging outside shuttered shops.

Um Shaima, 48, a garrulous Sunni widow who used to sell yogurt in the Sadriya market, lives just north of Sybaa Street in Fadhil. She said she used to visit the stores there for clothes. Her cousin Samir worked for years on the Sadriya side of Sybaa Street as a mechanic without any trouble.

Then a few months ago, Ms. Shaima said, he received a threat. "They told him, 'You are a Sunni, and all Sunnis are infidels and their women are prostitutes, so stop coming to Sadriya or you will be killed,' " she said.

"He didn't listen," she added.

The next day, he was kidnapped. Witnesses said Shiite militants yanked him off his motorcycle and threw him in the trunk of a sedan.

"They called his wife at 9 a.m. the next day," Ms. Shaima said, "telling her that they will kill all the Sunnis, and your husband is dead."

A Shiite nephew of Samir's later recovered his uncle's mutilated body from a trash pile east of Baghdad.

Ms. Shaima said her two sons now carried guns at night to protect her and her neighbors. The Shiite-led Iraqi government will not protect them because the Shiites "want to finish us," she said. "They will start breaking into our houses, raping us in front of our children, then killing us with our kids," she added. "They will let Iraq reach a point where Palestinian misery will seem like a picnic."

Across the border, in Sadriya, lies a mirror image of anger and fear. The response is similar, too: young men with guns who view themselves as protectors, who justify violence as the reasonable response to violence.

Nazar Sharif Abd Hussein, 35, a carpenter and a member of the Mahdi Army militia, said he did not hate all Sunnis; one of his sisters who lives outside of Baghdad just married one.

Mr. Hussein hardly looked fierce, at 5 feet 7 inches tall, wearing jeans and a gray sweater, with a short beard and sunken dark eyes. But he said he could be vicious when called upon because Sunni gangsters and insurgents in Fadhil had shown no respect for life.

DOJ_NMG_0139775

Last May, he said, his 17-year-old best friend, Salar, was shot dead while they both guarded an area near the edge of Fadhil. He said Salar was wearing a flak jacket but a stream of .50-caliber bullets perforated his side and ripped through his chest.

"I still remember that night," Mr. Hussein said, adding, "He was standing in the middle of the street."

The sectarian border now seems to define him. He said he lived alone, worked near his apartment by day and was a guard for the Mahdi Army at night. Because the militia has shut down bars and other places where people socialize (he offered no opinion of the policy), he said his life remained stalled. He said he expected it to stay that way.

"I don't want to get married because maybe I'll be killed or tortured," he said. "I'm afraid to bring a wife into this."

Saydia/Dora

Baghdad's relentless violence has also created a deeper divide that may prove equally hard to eliminate: the line between the known and the stranger.

As the unfamiliar has become the dangerous, Iraqis have developed elaborate disguises to help them pass as members of the other sect: ruses like adopting identification cards with false family names or developing elaborate fictional histories.

Even then, being a member of the same sect or a relative is no guarantee of safety in a city, Iraqis say, where Shiites have killed Shiites and Sunnis have killed Sunnis out of uncertainty over whom to trust.

Ali Abu Zainab, 50, a mechanic and a journalist, said the border between his neighborhood, Saydia, and Dora had left him and his three young daughters cut off from his extended family. Both neighborhoods have historically been populated by a mixture of Sunnis, Shiites and Christians. But because Dora has been a battleground for various militant groups for at least a year, he said, crossing over is impossible.

The Hilla highway, a wide road heading south that separates the two areas, and the Dora highway — the main road into the neighborhood of the same name — are nearly empty except for gunmen. A relative who was forced to drive down the Dora highway three months ago because of a surprise checkpoint saw bodies littering the streets, Mr. Zainab said.

So even though his favorite aunts and cousins in Dora live less than two miles away, he has been unable to visit for more than a year. In the fall, he said, he missed a cousin's wedding. After another cousin was killed by Shiite militants, he missed the funeral.

"I used to go frequently to Dora just like everyone else in Saydia," he said.

Now, he shops near home. When he leaves, he exits from the opposite side of the neighborhood. Still, the border's dangers seep in. Because Saydia has remained less violent than Dora, fewer residents have fled and security is not as tight. Fighters pushed out of Dora consider Saydia a good place to hide because they can blend in with civilians.

Three weeks ago, Mr. Zainab said, after American and Iraqi troops started an operation against insurgents in Dora, a battle broke out near his home. When the gunfire stopped, 10 people were dead. He said no one in the neighborhood seemed to know who had been fighting or what had set it off.

"Sectarian extremism is the reason for all of this," he said. "Iraqis are sentimental and their emotions lead them to follow those who pretend to be religious."

Noting that his neighborhood still contained both Sunnis and Shiites, he said that Iraqi politicians, with the help of the American-led invasion in 2003, seemed intent on stirring up hatred. "The problems are between them," he said. "Not between the people."

Kadhimiya/Huriya/Shuala

Some Iraqis draw the border at their own doorsteps.

Saadi Khazaal Jawad, 60, a Shiite former government worker and restaurateur, said his neighborhood was so dangerous, he was a virtual shut-in. He lives in Chikuk, a mixed area squeezed among the Sunni neighborhood of Huriya to the south and the Shiite Kadhimiya to the east and Shuala to the west.

As Shiites from the north and east have begun expanding their turf into Chikuk, Sunnis from Huriya have been fighting back, making every corner here a potential danger zone.

Mr. Jawad has a dusty blue Chevrolet Caprice that he almost never drives. He has two daughters and four sons whom he tries to keep home lest he lose them. He has forbidden his 16-year-old daughter to go to school.

DOJ_NMG_0139776

On most days, Mr. Jawad said, he prays, eats, naps, reads newspapers and watches television. Oprah Winfrey and Rachael Ray are among his favorites.

He also escapes with his birds, a gaggle of passenger pigeons in cages on his roof. The birds come from places he used to visit on vacations, like Mosul and Basra. They offer a way, he said, to flee.

"I spend about two or three hours here," he said as he fed the birds. "I forget everything when I'm here. And besides, I can't go anywhere. It's dangerous to go out."

Even Mr. Jawad has not entirely lost hope; he said he was rooting for the Iraqi government's efforts to shore up security, which he considered sincere. Some residents in Fadhil and Sadriya also said the recent Iraqi-American operation there had given a few of their friends enough confidence to leave their apartments and return to work.

But Iraqis all across Baghdad said it could take years for men like Mr. Hussein, the Mahdi militant in Sadriya, to give up their weapons, and for residents to let go of their fears. With American helicopters overhead every day and gunfire and explosions as regular as morning alarm clocks, Iraqis' sense of being trapped has yet to recede.

"I try to kill time," Mr. Jawad said. "We try to busy ourselves because when I have nothing to do, it makes time last longer."

Marriages Between Sects Come Under Siege In Iraq (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Once a Sign of Tolerance, Unions Now Seen as Perilous Betrayals

BAGHDAD -- The note was slipped under the door of May Mahmoud's shop. Neatly typed on a computer, it read: "You must leave your home. We give you three days. Or we will kill you." It was addressed to her husband.

He was a Shiite Muslim. But she was a Sunni. Where would they go?

They fled from their mostly Sunni neighborhood to his mother's house in a nearby Shiite enclave. Within months, as Sunni insurgents pushed into that area, another death threat arrived at the shop. It was time to leave again. As she told the story, Mahmoud's voice shook, not out of anger, but despair.

"From that point on, our life became like hell," she said.

As U.S. and Iraqi forces attempt to pacify the capital, mixed couples who symbolize Iraq's once famous tolerance are increasingly entangled by hate. Forced by militias or insurgents to leave their homes because one partner is from the wrong sect, they find few havens because of the other partner's affiliation. These strains, fueled by displacement, separation and fear, are beginning to tear apart such families, weakening bonds that for many Iraqis hold the hope of sectarian reconciliation.

"In the absence of security, Iraqis are protecting themselves by turning to their sects and their tribes," said Zina Abdul Rasul, a U.N. human rights worker who herself is a product of a mixed marriage. "It is becoming normal to hear about mixed families breaking down."

Today, Mahmoud, a small woman with thin eyebrows curving over her almond-shaped eyes, lives with her relatives. Her husband lives in Cairo with his family. Her Sunni family is pressing her to divorce him because of his sect. His Shiite family is convinced all Sunnis are criminals. The couple have met twice since April.

"We love each other a lot," said Mahmoud, 37, a faint smile appearing on her oval face, framed by a lime green head scarf. "That's what makes it worse. We're suffering because we cannot live together."

She requested that her husband's name not be used because he is well known in her neighborhood. Seated inside a hotel, her voice dropped to a whisper whenever someone passed nearby.'It's Better If You Go'

The question came long before the death threats, long before the separation. Mahmoud remembers the day clearly. It was 2002, a few days before her marriage.

"Don't you understand that he is a Shia?" her brother asked.

She was surprised he crossed that line. "Yes, I know. I am a Muslim. He is a Muslim. That is all that matters," she replied.

While there are no official statistics, sociologists estimate that nearly a third of Iraqi marriages are unions between members of different sectarian or ethnic communities. In the aftermath of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, many Iraqis argued that the prevalence of such unions showed that Iraqis cared more about their Arab or national identity than their sect, which would spare the country a civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0139777

But Iraq's sectarian strife has risen sharply since the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra by Sunni militants a year ago. Since then, more than 500,000 Iraqis have fled their homes, a number that is growing by 50,000 every month, according to the United Nations. The vast majority have left mixed areas, the main battlefields of the sectarian war.

For the past 23 years, Ahmad Shammari, 55, a Sunni, lived with his family in Baghdad's Hurriyah neighborhood. A few months ago, Shiite militias began to drive Sunnis from their homes. Still, he felt protected. The family of his Shiite wife had been in Hurriyah for 40 years. Then workers at a local Sunni mosque were killed, and more Sunnis fled.

One evening, Shammari and his wife had a conversation, he recalled.

"It's better if you go," she said.

Shammari refused. But a few days later, after more Sunni families left, he reconsidered. He worried that his wife might be seen as a collaborator for marrying a Sunni. He worried about Omar, his eldest son, who bears the most common of Sunni names. There was pressure from his wife's family, too.

"They felt a little scared that one of their women was married to a Sunni," Shammari said. "They were also scared that I would be killed. So they encouraged her to make me leave."

In late November, he told his three boys and two girls that he would be "gone for a short time." Later, Omar, 15, walked up to him and said: "I can't stay here. I feel scared." Shammari understood.

Early the next morning, they packed lightly. They didn't want to attract attention from the neighbors. At the door, Shammari cried. So did his wife.

Omar watched quietly. Father and son took a taxi to Shammari's parents' house in a majority-Sunni neighborhood. It is only seven miles away, but the violence, curfews and checkpoints have shackled his wife and children. They visit only occasionally. Always, his youngest children ask when he is returning home.

"I will be back soon, inshallah," he tells them, using the common Arabic expression for "God willing."Sorrow and Bitterness

Nowadays, even in a climate of deep suspicions, Iraqis of different sects mix when they can. But anecdotal evidence from interviews with social workers, U.N. officials and everyday Iraqis suggests that the strife is breeding mistrust within mixed families. Iraqis tell stories about family members being betrayed by relatives of a different sect.

Khaleel Ibrahim Fahad al-Janabi, 54, a former Iraqi army colonel, said his Sunni nephew, Ahmed, was shot dead by two brothers-in-law who were Shiite militiamen. Janabi now wishes one of his daughters, who is married to a Shiite, would divorce. He still has one unwed daughter.

"I would never ever give her in marriage to a Shia," Janabi said bitterly.

Samar Ahmed, a 25-year-old Iraqi government employee, remembered how her Sunni father turned against their family.

Ahmed's mother is Shiite. By 2005, her father had grown closer to his previous wife, a Sunni, and their children. When a son from that marriage was killed by Shiite militiamen, her father grew bitter, said Ahmed, who identifies herself as Shiite.

That's when he began pressuring Ahmed's mother to sign over to him the deed to a house in Baqubah, northeast of Baghdad, that her mother had inherited.

Ahmed, her sad voice quivering at times, said she still recalls her father's words when her maternal uncle went missing one day.

"He's just like the other Shia dogs, disappeared and killed like them," he said.

One day in October, her father came by the house. He carried a can of kerosene. As Ahmed and her younger brother watched helplessly, he poured it on his wife and threatened to set her on fire.

"He was beating her," Ahmed said. "He even pulled out a knife and said, 'I'll kill you.' " Her mother signed over the deed. Ahmed filed a complaint with the police, but they dismissed it as an internal family problem. A few weeks later, they learned that the house had been sold. She has not seen her father since that day.

"In neighborhoods, the Sunni are displacing the Shia or the Shia are displacing the Sunnis," said Ahmed with disgust. "In my family, it is my father who displaced us."Loyalties Divided

DOJ_NMG_0139778

After the second death threat, Mahmoud would lock her husband inside the house. They contemplated moving to the southern Shiite city of Najaf, but that made her uneasy.

"They may question why he married a Sunni," Mahmoud said.

So Mahmoud urged her husband to move to Cairo. "I gave him an ultimatum: 'You go to Egypt, or I will leave you. I cannot see you get killed,' " Mahmoud said. She would stay and work.

The day he left, she didn't tell anyone, not even her family. She was worried that someone might kidnap him on the way to the airport.

In May, a month after her husband moved to Egypt, his brother was kidnapped and has not been seen again. When Mahmoud visited her husband in October, she felt a change in his family.

"They began to refuse me because I am Sunni," Mahmoud said. "The person who kidnapped his brother was Sunni. It was not the same family as before. They talked about Sunnis as being criminals. They said Sunnis kill people."

Her husband, who is unemployed, wanted her to move to Cairo and live with his family. Mahmoud refused.

"I didn't feel comfortable," Mahmoud said.

She also had a good job in Baghdad. "If I go to Egypt, I will have to start from zero again," she said.

In Iraq, her family, too, had changed.

"They tell me not to go and live with his family. They say the situation is different now," Mahmoud said. "Now, I have become a problem to my family because they agreed to my marriage to a Shiite man. Some in my family are asking me to think about leaving my husband. They say: 'May, think of your life. Are you going to spend the rest of your life working and working and then traveling to see him?' "

Last month, Mahmoud tried to visit her husband. In a region growing weary of Iraq's refugees, the Egyptian government, she said, turned down her request for a visa.

In Iraq, 'Dating' Happens Online (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Civil war leaves young people largely cut off from one another. Normal life is tantalizingly out of reach.

BAGHDAD — For Ali and Noura, love blossomed in an Internet chat room.

Both were young, educated, devout Sunni Muslims who shared a passion for Jim Carrey movies and Arabic love tunes. For months, they chatted online obsessively. As the friendship deepened, she shyly agreed to a webcam meeting.

But their relationship was doomed from the start: He lives in a quiet, middle-class neighborhood of east Baghdad; she is across the Tigris River in the city's war-torn west. It was out of the question that they should ever meet.

"It seemed like a pointless relationship," says Ali, who now refers to Noura as "my ex-Internet girlfriend." He stopped responding to her messages and she eventually stopped sending them.

"She must be angry," he says, looking slightly embarrassed as he leans forward to stub out a cigarette. "Maybe if we could have been alone together, it would have been different."

Young Iraqis, trapped in their homes in the mean streets of this bloodstained capital, are increasingly turning to the Internet to chat with relatives, hang out with friends and search for love.

Such virtual relationships offer a refuge of sorts from numbing isolation and fear during a time of staggering violence. But all too often they are mirages — a seductive reminder of a life now tantalizingly out of reach for most.

"They are like birds in a cage," says Anas Attar, 22, one of a growing number of businessmen cashing in on the demand by selling access to their satellite-based Internet connections.

In Iraq, like many other Muslim countries, it has always been difficult for young men and women to spend time together. Introductions were frequently arranged by families and closely chaperoned. Many couples from more privileged backgrounds met at university, which was often the first time they attended a coed school. But they were rarely allowed to be alone together unless they were engaged.

As Iraq's civil war has deepened, even close relatives and friends have found it hard to get together.

DOJ_NMG_0139779

Reem, a striking 28-year-old with long dark hair, heavy makeup and lots of gold jewelry, used to meet regularly with a tight-knit group of college girlfriends. They would picnic in the park, go shopping and gossip at one another's homes.

She hasn't seen some of them for two years now. Many have fled the country. Those who remain venture outdoors only when they must.

Depressed and with too much time on her hands, Reem started posting love poems on an Internet forum for young Iraqis. Soon she was getting inquiries from lonely young men, with whom she chats about current events and vacations outside Iraq.

A civil servant who was afraid to give her last name, Reem isn't interested in meeting any of them, but she enjoys the unfettered conversations that are possible only online.

"It's very interesting to get to know a man away from the constraints of culture and tradition," she says. "They console me and tell me there will be a day when this mess will end."

Across the Middle East, more and more young people are doing the same thing. In Iraq, there are few other ways for them to interact.

Universities are becoming increasingly conservative, frowning on too much contact between male and female students. Many of the old hangouts — restaurants, cafes, parks, social clubs — are closed. At the end of the workday, Baghdad residents hurry home to beat the curfews and the approaching darkness with its terrors.

Ali Azawi, a tall, polished medical student from a well-to-do Baghdad family, was beginning to despair of ever having a girlfriend when he started trawling Arabic-language chat rooms and found Noura.

He composed a brief introduction, which he copied and pasted over and over for hours before getting a response: "My name is Ali, age 23. I live in Baghdad. I am looking for a young, beautiful woman."

Noura first approached him under a pseudonym — "Abbas" — which he says conjured up images of a large, oafish man.

She wanted to know what he did for a living and to which Muslim sect he belonged. Reassured by his answers, she revealed that she was a 24-year-old woman who taught English at a primary school a few blocks from her home.

They chatted for months, swapping jokes and music downloads and sharing the details of their lives on opposite sides of Baghdad.

As a man living in a relatively safe, religiously mixed neighborhood, Azawi could still get out and go to college. But life was very different for Noura, a woman in a Sunni-dominated area that has seen repeated clashes with Shiite militiamen.

"She was trapped between her four walls and in front of her PC 24/7," says Azawi, who declined to provide Noura's last name because he says her parents would not approve of her chatting with men on the Internet. "Every time I logged on, she was there."

The first time he saw her on a webcam, he says, he found her a little "puffy." But "I felt very special, because it is not an easy thing for a woman to do that."

Six months later, they still hadn't met. And he had lost hope of ever bridging the few miles of real estate that divided them.

Azawi envies the ease of relationships in the United States.

"You have the bar, the streets, the freedom and no religion to judge you," he says. In Iraq, "it is a fight for the heart."

The Internet became available to Iraqis during the last years of Saddam Hussein's oppressive rule. Few knew how to use it, and access was tightly controlled.

After Hussein's fall, Internet cafes spread, bringing the Web to hundreds of thousands of Iraqis. Subscribers to the state-owned Internet provider, which has the monopoly on dial-up connections, jumped from about 75,000 in June 2004 to nearly 210,000 in May 2006, according to U.S. military figures.

Dozens of private providers also offer wireless connections to satellite-based hubs, bypassing Iraq's notorious phone lines.

In troubled parts of the capital, some cafes have received threats and closed. Militants accuse them of spreading pornography and providing a means to contact the U.S. military.

In Karada, a relatively safe neighborhood of east Baghdad, university students in jeans and baseball caps tap busily at dozens of computers in a converted house tiled in blue and white faux marble. Framed Koranic verses hang on the wall, and there are sodas in a fridge and a television set playing in the corner. But most of the overwhelmingly male customers stare intently at their screens.

DOJ_NMG_0139780

"All they do is chat, chat, chat," says owner Yousef Abdulla, 25, a computer sciences major who opened the Shirifi Internet Cafe three years ago. "They have the opportunity to expand their horizons with this portal and get whatever information they want about anything, but all they are interested in is chatting — especially with girls."

Many hope to find a wife in another country who will help them flee Iraq.

Evan Bazi, 21, also a computer sciences major, comes to the cafe almost every day and chats for hours with friends in the United States, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Iraq, none of whom he has met. He describes these sessions as an "escape from a sad reality."

"I would like to find my mate," he says. But he has been disappointed by the girls he has met online.

"Most girls that I approached, or who have approached me, they're too materialistic and ask me what car I drive or how much money I have," he says glumly. "I want to find a girl who likes me and wants me for the person I am, not for the money that I have."

A few women also come to the cafe, but most are accompanied by a male relative and stay only a short while, Abdulla says. Those who can afford the monthly fee of $30 to $50 prefer to subscribe to the Internet at home.

They include Dahlia Muayed, a gregarious 29-year-old who flashes a cheery smile in the photograph she sends by e-mail after declining to risk a meeting with a Western reporter.

The petite brunet, who refuses to cover her trendy bob with a scarf, used to divide her time between a mental health charity and a radio station. But the charity closed because it couldn't get funding, and she quit the station after two close colleagues were killed in a car bombing outside their house.

Now she mostly keeps to the family home in west Baghdad, reading, watching DVDs and helping a sister-in law tend to her child. Very occasionally, she risks a furtive visit to a friend.

But she says her main connection to family, friends and the life she once knew is the Internet. Through e-mail and instant messaging, she is able "to spend time, to make relationships with others, to feel that I am important."

"I thank God I have that," she says. "I am not alone."

Times staff writers Zeena Kareem, Said Rifai, Saif Hameed and Saif Rasheed contributed to this report.

Choosing A Sect (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times Magazine, March 4, 2007

As the Sunni-Shiite conflict in Iraq polarizes Muslims across the globe, the United States finds itself in the odd position of seeming to favor a Shiite government in Iraq and Sunni leaders everywhere else. As a result, there has been a lot of loose talk in policy circles recently about how the United States should finally choose sides. After all, the rift between the two denominations is almost as old as Islam itself — and so is unlikely to close soon. What began more than 1,300 years ago as an argument over whether the Prophet Muhammad should be succeeded by his cousin Ali or by an unrelated companion became a bloody civil war, then hardened over time into a theological split. As another civil war worsens in Iraq, the argument goes, America should pick a winner and back it to the hilt.

But who, exactly, is our natural ally in this historic conflict? Pro-Sunni analysts, sometimes reflecting the traditional realist (and Arabist) perspective of the foreign-policy establishment, tend to see a radical Shiite Iran and its subsidiary, Lebanese Hezbollah, as the most pressing threat to America's global interests. In their view, America's traditional policy — backing friendly Sunni powers like Saudi Arabia and Egypt — is the best way to contain Iran. Sunnis make up as much as 90 percent of the world's 1.3 billion Muslims. Our support for the Iranian-backed Shiite parties who run the government in Iraq hasn't exactly worked out so far. If we support Iraq's Shiites even when some are engaging in retaliatory massacres of Iraqi Sunnis, we risk alienating our traditional oil-producing Sunni allies while naïvely spilling American blood to serve the Iranians.

Those who support the party of Ali (as the Shiites were once known) tend to emphasize ideas and culture rather than geostrategy. Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini may have led Shiism down the garden path of anti-Americanism, they allow, but at its core, Shiite thought is extremely fertile and creative, open to synthesis with the ideals of liberal democracy. The mullahs in Qom study Western philosophy from Plato to Habermas, and important reformist intellectuals within Iran have been challenging

DOJ_NMG_0139781

Khomeinist orthodoxy using the cosmopolitan tools of modern and postmodern thought. Contemporary Iran, the most important Shiite base today, is still shaped by an ancient Persian civilization that predates Islam. Meanwhile, Sunni Islam is in a sorry state, dominated by a purist and anti-intellectual fundamentalism that has been bankrolled by Wahhabi Saudi Arabia. Lest it be forgotten, Osama bin Laden is a Sunni who condemns Shiite and American infidels in the same breath.

Yet both of these all-or-nothing approaches miss the reality of the Sunni-Shiite relationship — over the centuries and today. For most of Islamic history, the denominations have lived side by side in relative peace and harmony. Whole states have moved back and forth from one column to the other. Egypt's ruling dynasty belonged to the Ismaili branch of Shiism for a couple of centuries in the Middle Ages, and modern Egyptians still celebrate Ashura and other vestigially Shiite holidays. According to scholarly consensus, the southern tribes of Iraq became Shiite only in the 19th century, the better to strengthen economic ties with the predominantly Shiite pilgrimage sites of Najaf and Karbala. Some large Iraqi tribes still include both Shiite and Sunni clans, a continuing legacy of that nonviolent shift.

Even Sunni and Shiite belief structures have influenced each other more than is often recognized. In the Middle Ages, the great Islamic philosophers were mostly Sunnis, and the Shiites learned from them. More recently, the aspirations of Sunni Islamists have been shaped by Khomeini's novel version of Shiite political ideology.

This is not to say that the relationship has been trouble-free. In many Sunni-ruled states, Shiites have long been treated as an underclass. Violence has periodically flared up, as in Pakistan, where low-level sectarian attacks have been taking place for two decades. Nevertheless the last major ideological fighting between Sunnis and Shiites took place more than two centuries ago, even before the American Revolution, during the formation of the first Saudi state. Real theological disagreements mean that radicals on both sides can always find reasons to call their opponents heretics; but historically speaking, such a tactic has been rare.

That means it is a mistake to find that we must support one side in the latest iteration of the Sunni-Shiite conflict. The tendencies that make each denomination distinct are not unequivocally good or bad for the United States. Take the outsize influence of the Shiite clerics: Ayatollah Khomeini gave the world the theory of the Supreme Leader and a distinctive Islamic anti-Americanism; but in Iraq, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani has given us a theory of clerical restraint and a policy of building democracy. The same flexibility is characteristic of Sunni salafis, whose emphasis on the Protestant-style individual reading of the Koran may favor either democratic reform or bin Ladenism. It all depends on who is doing the interpreting.

For the United States to defuse anti-American Islamism, it must be willing to embrace moderates and democrats of all stripes, Sunni or Shiite. From a strategic standpoint, it would also be an error to communicate to Muslims worldwide that the United States supports either Sunnis or Shiites as such. This would undercut the core realist principle that a country's allies are those who act in its interests, not those whom it prefers on the basis of race or creed. In this sense, realism is essentially anti-discriminatory — if not indiscriminate.

So choosing our friends on a case-by-case basis is both morally better and practically wiser. No matter what happens in Iraq, neither Shi'ism nor Sunnism is going to disappear. Just because some Muslims are willing to fight on the basis of who is Sunni and who Shiite doesn't mean we have to.

Military Faces Growing Ranks Of Bereaved (AP)

By David Crary,

AP, March 4, 2007

One of the first sights greeting visitors to Fort Hood is a day-care center's playground, brightly colored evidence of the Army's commitment to be family friendly.

A few blocks away is a more poignant symbol: an office building recently converted into a first-of-its-kind support center for women and children whose husbands and fathers have died in Iraq and Afghanistan. From Fort Hood alone, the toll has passed 365.

"It's our sanctuary," said Ursula Pirtle, whose daughter frequents a playroom at the center. Three-year-old Katie never met her father, Heath. He was killed in Iraq in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0139782

Over the past 15 years, America's armed forces have taken huge strides to retain married service members — improving schools, health programs and child care. But now, as never before in this family-embracing era, the military is struggling with the toughest home-front problem of all: Doing right by the often outspoken and ever-growing ranks of the bereaved.

Of the 3,350 Americans who died in Iraq and Afghanistan through early January, 1,586 of them — 47.3 percent — were married. Those fallen warriors left behind 1,954 children, according to the Pentagon's Manpower Data Center. More recent deaths have pushed that figure past 2,000.

Compared to the heavily draftee combat troops of the Vietnam war, today's volunteer fighting force is older, more reliant on National Guard and Reserve citizen-soldiers, and more likely to be married.

And more so than their Vietnam counterparts, the new generation of bereaved spouses has been vocal — on their bases, at congressional hearings — in pressing for more compassionate, effective support.

It's a constituency that politicians and generals do not want to alienate. The result has been numerous policy changes, ranging from improved benefits to better training for the officers who break the grim news of war-zone deaths. Even the Fort Hood support center materialized due to pressure from widows and their allies.

But the learning process is ongoing and the results are mixed.

"The war on terror has presented us with new challenges we haven't seen before, in terms of number of casualties," said an Army spokesman, Lt. Col. Kevin Arata. "We know we're not perfect — there are things families have said we can do better, and we've listened to that."

Interviews with a dozen widows at Fort Hood and across the country reveal varied experiences, but also some common bonds.

Across the board, the widows are proud of their husbands — even if they disagree on the wisdom of the Iraq war. Each woman is still grieving, and those with children have extra worries — financial and psychological — that extend far into the future.

Some are deeply grateful for the support provided by the military after their husbands' deaths; others are critical. Among the common complaints — that notification and assistance officers were sometimes ill-informed or aloof, and that they were bounced through different parts of the military bureaucracy when seeking help.

"We have to have someone who knows what they're talking about," Pirtle said. "The blind-leading-the-blind system isn't working out."

Pirtle's daughter, Katie — born 26 days after her father's death in October 2003 — seems to be thriving. But many of the now-fatherless older children struggle emotionally — to the point where school can be anguishing and therapy is needed. The military pays for some such counseling, but there are limits, and families say the logistics can be difficult.

In Evans, Ga., Irene Prather is looking for a small Christian school for her 11-year-old son, Aaron, who has floundered at public school since his father, Army Chief Warrant Officer Clint Prather, was killed in Afghanistan two years ago.

"It seems like every day is a struggle for him," Prather said. "When we talk to the counselors, nobody understands what's really going on. They weren't prepared to deal with people who've lost somebody in the war."

Clint Prather served 11 years in the Army. His widow, who valued the tight-knit community on base, has found the shift to the civilian world difficult.

"It's kind of like you're pushed to the side," she said. "You're not part of that military family any more."

Other widows still feel those bonds, and reunite — often with children in tow — at "grief camps" or expenses-paid holidays arranged by charities.

Some stay in touch with buddies of their late husbands. A Palmer, Mass., widow, Melissa Storey, was still getting calls from soldiers in Iraq eight months after her husband, Staff Sgt. Clint Storey, was killed there.

"We're just as much a part of the Army as before he died," she said.

Storey, 29, has a 4-year-old daughter, Adela, who's had therapy sessions since her father's death. During the couple's final days together, she also became with pregnant with a son, to be named Clint. She considers her benefits package generous and praised the Army's outreach to families.

"But part of being a good military spouse is accepting that you don't come first — the mission comes first," she added. "It's a hard life. I don't want to sugarcoat it. You suck it up and deal with it."

DOJ_NMG_0139783

While many widows have kept a low public profile, some have testified before Congress to urge better benefits or have gained prominence by speaking out elsewhere.

Laura Youngblood of South Hempstead, N.Y., wife of a Navy corpsman killed in Iraq, made national TV appearances assailing anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan, whose son also died in Iraq. Hildi Halley of Falmouth, Maine, met with President Bush last year and blamed his policies for the death of her husband, National Guard Capt. Patrick Damon, from an apparent heart attack in Afghanistan.

"To have him die in a war you didn't agree with is that much worse," she said.

The resentment has been deepened by her experience with the military after her husband's death. She still fumes that his personal belongings reeked of insecticide when they belatedly arrived, and that she spent weeks wrestling with Army bureaucracy before finally reclaiming her own love letters to him that had been confiscated.

Her husband had urged her to seek support among other spouses, but Halley — a mother of two adolescents — feels estranged from other military wives who support the war.

"I couldn't have them as my support group," she said. "They're going through enough pain, and if they want to believe their fairy tale, who am I to wake them up?"

Even at Fort Hood, the Army's largest armored base with 43,900 military personnel and 17,800 family members, anti-war sentiment sometimes surfaces.

"I don't support this war," said Ursula Pirtle. "What did my husband die for? I don't believe what we're doing over there helps our country."

Yet she views her fallen husband as a hero. "When he was killed, I would love to have been there holding him," Pirtle said.

The campaign to establish Fort Hood's Gold Star Family Support Center was led by Debbie Busch, whose own Army husband is alive and well, but who grew dismayed by the lack of organized backing for widows she knew. Initially, there were weekly support meetings at a chapel; last September her group got its own building, complete with lounge, kitchenette and playrooms.

Calls have come from other bases, seeking advice on launching similar programs, and Busch's efforts have been noticed by senior Army officials.

"The fact that these families spoke out and said it could be done better, it gave the Army the opportunity to change things," Busch said.

A recent report by the Government Accountability Office examined some of the issues troubling bereaved families. It said support services were inconsistent and advised the Defense Department to improve its oversight.

"Most survivors don't know what they're entitled to, and that's a big deal," said the GAO's Derek Stewart. "There should be one place that survivors could go and, in one sitting, have an individual spell out all the services and entitlements coming your way."

Addressing some of the concerns, the Defense Department updated its guide to survivors' benefits, which have increased substantially since the Iraq war began. The so-called "death gratuity" for next of kin has climbed from $6,000 to $100,000; military life insurance payments have risen from $250,000 to $400,000.

Brad Snyder, a benefits expert with the Armed Forces Services Corp., said the package compares well to private-sector plans and can exceed $60,000 a year for a sergeant's widow with three children.

Children of fallen service members now get military medical coverage until adulthood, rather than losing it three years after the death. A bereaved family can now stay in military housing for a year, not six months.

Among the Fort Hood families benefiting from such changes are the widow and four children of Maj. William F. Hecker III, who was killed in January 2006 just six weeks after reaching Iraq. His prior duties included teaching a course on comparative war poetry at the U.S. Military Academy.

Richelle Hecker, his widow, said the children — the youngest 3, the oldest 11 — were helped by grief counseling.

"The counselors play games with them, let them talk about all those things that after a while other people don't want to hear anymore," Hecker said.

DOJ_NMG_0139784

She also noted the stream of casualties has prompted many military families to think more seriously about future risks and attend financial-planning sessions that once seemed morbid or unnecessary.

"It's making or breaking people," Hecker said. "I see some marriages growing stronger and others that aren't."

The Army, which accounts for more than two-thirds of the Iraq and Afghanistan deaths, has been striving to address the most prevalent complaints from widows.

In January, it completed an overhaul of the training for casualty notification and assistance officers — the ones who deal directly with grieving families. The goal is for these officers to exhibit "professional compassion."

Col. Patrick Gawkins, director of the Army's Casualty and Mortuary Affairs Operations Center, said the new curriculum includes video footage with actors portraying officers and family members.

The Army also launched a 'round-the-clock call center to assist survivor families with questions about benefits.

"The benefits issue comes across as very bureaucratic and hard to understand," Gawkins said. "We want to clarify and simplify the instruction to the greatest extent possible, given it's in a time of great emotional stress."

Joanne Steen, whose Navy aviator husband died in a helicopter crash in 1992, felt she was filling a gaping void last year by co-authoring "Military Widow: A Survival Guide" — offering advice about coping with the loss of a military husband.

"As a young widow, you may feel like a sideshow in a circus," she wrote. "Because you aren't supposed to be a widow at such a young age, you don't fit in anywhere."

Some widows, though, are well into middle age. Nancy Kelly, of Richmond, Maine, is 52 and has three grandchildren as well as three grown children.

She and her husband, Staff Sgt. Dale James Kelly Jr., had been married 25 years when he was killed in Iraq last May while deployed with the Maine Army National Guard. One tough task was explaining the absence of "Grandpa Kelly" to his grandchildren.

Herself an Air National Guard veteran, Kelly said her husband and his Guard colleagues were well-trained and aware of dangers they faced. But she suggested part of the problem for the Guard-dependent military is that troops' families are less steeled for the traumas of war than active-duty families.

"From a family standpoint, no, we're not prepared for this," Kelly said. "The men go off once a month and two weeks a year (for training), and for many of us wives, it's, 'Oh, that's the time we have dinner with the girls while they're off playing soldier.'"

She paused, reflecting on her husband.

"He was and is my soul mate," Kelly said. "My life as I knew it will never be the same."

___

On the Net:

Fort Hood support center: http://www.goldstarfamilysupport.org/

Army families: http://www.armyfamiliesonline.org/skins/WBLO/home.aspx

A Teenage Soldier's Goodbyes On The Road To Over There (NYT)

By Dan Barry

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

It is time. The fresh young soldier has a plane to catch.

People file out of the dimness of V.F.W. Post 404 and into the morning light. They chat and smoke and mill about on the parking lot gravel, then come together to form a ragged circle of support.

The dozen motorcyclists among them finalize plans to escort the soldier for most of the two-hour ride to the airport in Las Vegas. Just before raising voices and fists to a recording of the country-western anthem "God Bless the U.S.A.," the crowd bows its collective head and asks God for another favor: to keep safe this soldier, just 10 months removed from her senior prom.

That night she wore a gown the color of valentines; this morning she wears fatigues the color of mud. The uniform has a name patch, KANE, for Pvt. Resha Kane. Eighteen years old and five feet tall. Of Needles High School, Class of 2006, and, lately, of the United States Army, Fourth Infantry Division.

DOJ_NMG_0139785

Earlier this morning, Private Kane walked out of her family home in Needles, a small railroad city in California just across the Colorado River. Before her, the family van, packed with two Army duffel bags. Behind her, a living room decorated with family portraits and a large mock check from her current employer.

"Reserved in the name of Resha Kane," the check reads, $37,200 from the Army College Fund and the Montgomery G.I. Bill. It represents her partial compensation for enlisting for three years and 22 weeks. She plans to study biochemistry some day.

At the moment, though, she stands outside this club for veterans of foreign wars, where a bar sign advertises Sunday bloody marys, a buck apiece, 10 to noon. Former soldiers tell her to keep her nose clean over there. Her father, Wesley Kane, has to leave soon for his job as a car dealership's lot manager, but he holds her tight and asks, again and again, do you know how to clean your weapon?

"Yes, Daddy," she says.

The motorcyclists, including some from a group called the Patriot Guard Riders, mount their bikes. Among them is Rich Poliska, a gray-bearded Air Force veteran who lives nearby, in Bullhead City. A Route 66 earring dangles from his left earlobe.

Several months ago Mr. Poliska and his daughter, Heather Ching, heard about a local soldier who had returned from Iraq to no welcome home. They decided to form the Bullhead Patriots, dedicated to honoring soldiers going off to war, or returning from it. This is the group's first deployment effort, he says. "But I've done six funerals and two homecomings."

The Bullhead Patriots had heard of Private Kane's imminent deployment from a veteran who knows a woman who works at the Family Dollar store with the soldier's mother, Patricia Kane. First a surprise potluck supper — the soldier left church on Sunday to find a limousine waiting to whisk her away to the V.F.W. — and now this: an escort to the airport.

Bike engines growl, signaling that it is time. Private Kane climbs into the family van, which features rear-window decals for Jesus and for the Army ("My Daughter Is Serving"). She sits in the back, surrounded by her three younger siblings and a sister's boyfriend. Her quiet mother takes the driver's seat.

Soon the caravan is crossing the Colorado River. It passes a man sitting on the back of a parked pickup, his fist raised in the air: the soldier's father.

This mobile honor guard continues on, heading north on Highway 95, into a desolate, arid stretch of southern Nevada. Motorcycles in front, motorcycles behind, and in the middle, a white van containing a young soldier with just-polished fingernails.

She took care of her siblings while her parents worked, and learned to make a mean baked chicken. She graduated in the upper ranks in a class of about 60. She was honored for her grades and for her abstract artwork of flowers and butterflies. She has yet to learn to drive.

She enlisted in April, the same month as her prom, because she saw the military as a way to further her education. Right after graduation she went through boot camp and some extra training, before coming home a couple of weeks ago to talk up the Army at her alma mater. "Hometown recruiting," the Army calls it.

"Everyone knows me there," Private Kane says of Needles High School, home of the Mustangs.

Now, riding in the midst of this caravan of protection and respect, she is bound for Fort Hood in Texas to await deployment — probably to Iraq, she says.

"Nobody wants to go, but it's our job," she said the other day, her tone all business. "That's what we're trained for. We'll go over, do our job and come back."

The motorcade stops briefly in the old gold-mining town of Searchlight, and a few bikers say goodbye. Then it continues on, across the nothingness, through spits of rain, before stopping again in Railroad Pass, about 20 miles south of the airport. The Bullhead Patriots say farewell to Private Kane.

"Best of luck to you," Mr. Poliska says.

A lone biker continues to lead the Kanes toward Las Vegas, a large American flag flapping from the rear of his motorcycle. He rumbles into the city of gamblers, past drivers oblivious to the now-common moment of a wartime soldier leaving home.

At the last moment the biker peels off. And the white family van follows the signs that say Departures.

A Hero Who Didn't Save Himself (WP)

By Peter Carlson

DOJ_NMG_0139786

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

For Jeremiah Workman, Decorated for Bravery in Iraq, the Battle's Not Over Yet

Despite heavy resistance from enemy automatic weapon fire and a barrage of grenades, Corporal Workman fearlessly. . .

Jeremiah Workman stood at attention and tried to listen as the narrator read the citation that detailed what he'd done to earn the Navy Cross, an award for valor that is second only to the Medal of Honor.

. . . Corporal Workman again exposed himself to enemy fire while providing cover fire for the team when an enemy grenade exploded directly in front of him, causing shrapnel wounds to his arms and legs . . .

He was standing on the parade ground, facing a grandstand packed with hundreds of people, including his wife and his mother. Behind him were several hundred Marine recruits who were about to graduate from boot camp at Parris Island, S.C., where Workman had recently lost his job as a drill instructor after he suffered what he calls a "mental meltdown."

. . . Although injured, he led a third assault into the building, rallying his team one last time to extract isolated Marines . . .

When the narrator finished reading the story of Workman's "extraordinary heroism" in Iraq, Brig. Gen. Richard T. Tryon pinned the Navy Cross to Workman's chest and the crowd in the grandstand stood and cheered. It was a moment of well-deserved triumph, but it didn't make Workman feel any better.

"When they put that medal on me, from that point on, I sunk deeper into depression," he recalls. "Everybody says it must be awesome to win the Navy Cross. Well, as a matter of fact, it's not. I lost three guys that day, so for the longest time, I didn't even want to wear it. I'd look down at it and see three dead Marines."

Workman, 23, is sitting in a restaurant at the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, where he now works, his Navy Cross ribbon pinned to his uniform, just above his heart.

"If we lost three people, why did I get an award?" he says softly. "The last thing I think is that I'm a hero."

"I enlisted two days after my 17th birthday," Workman says. "I was a junior in high school. A year later, when I graduated, they shipped me to Parris Island."

He grew up in Marion, Ohio, son of a factory worker and a housewife. A jock in high school, he wanted to be an Ohio state trooper, but you have to be 21, so he figured he'd join the Marine Corps first.

"In my eyes, the Marine Corps was the elite, the tip of the spear," Workman says. "I walked into the recruiter's office and said, 'I want to be a Marine.' I was probably the easiest person they ever talked to."

After boot camp he spent two boring years guarding nuclear submarines at a base in Georgia. In August 2003, he married his high school sweetheart, Jessica Jordan.

In September 2004, he was sent to Iraq and stationed at a base outside Fallujah, the insurgent-controlled city where four American contractors had been killed in the spring, their corpses burned, dragged through the streets and hung from a bridge.

"Fallujah -- that was no man's land," he recalls. "When we drove past, you didn't even look because you knew it was a bad place."

In November 2004, Workman's platoon, part of 3rd Battalion, 5th Marines, got its orders: It would join the thousands of soldiers and Marines attacking Fallujah -- Operation Phantom Fury, the largest American military action since the invasion of Iraq. First, warplanes pounded the city with bombs. Then, in a driving rain, the Marines moved in.

Workman was a squad leader in a mortar platoon. For 17 days, they hunkered down in the mud in the northwest corner of Fallujah, firing at insurgent positions.

"We killed a lot of people with those mortar rounds," he says, "but it's not personal. You don't see the guys' eyes."

By mid-December, the Marines had conquered most of Fallujah and there wasn't much need for mortar fire anymore, so Workman's platoon was split in two and sent out to patrol the city, searching houses, looking for weapons. On Dec. 22, the other half of the platoon got into a nasty firefight.

"Some Marines were wounded pretty badly, and they're all charred. It looks like they've been in a fire," Workman recalls. "They come back and we're like, 'Holy cow!' So it's our turn to go out the next morning and we're kinda nervous. That night we're all still up at 2 o'clock in the morning, scrubbing our weapons, making sure they're perfect. We all had this gut feeling that the next day, we're gonna get in some sort of fight."Ambush in Fallujah

"It starts out like any other normal day," Workman says.

DOJ_NMG_0139787

Workman commanded one team of 10 Marines; his friend, Sgt. Jarrett Kraft, commanded another.

"I take my guys on the right side of the street. Kraft takes his guys on the left side of the street," he recalls. "We search the first two houses -- same old crap, we found some guns and ammo and carried it out to the street and threw it in the Humvee."

Searching the third house, Workman heard a blast of machine-gun fire from the house across the street, where Kraft and his men ran into a group of heavily armed insurgents.

"We were pretty much ambushed by a lot of insurgents on the second floor of the house," recalls Kraft, who is now a police officer in Fresno, Calif. He also was awarded a Navy Cross for his actions that day.

"I was scared," Workman says, laughing. "I really was. . . . When you get caught in a situation like that, it's a real man check. For two seconds, you have to look in that invisible mirror that's not there and look at yourself and question yourself as a man. And say, 'Okay, I'm a corporal in the Marine Corps and I have guys that are looking up to me for leadership. What am I going to do?' . . . So I grabbed everybody in the house and we come running."

Gun smoke rose from the windows of the house across the street. Workman ordered several men to guard the outside and then led the rest inside, where a lieutenant informed them that Marines were trapped on the second floor.

"The lieutenant looks at me and says, 'We gotta get in there.' I said, 'Okay, I'll follow you.' " He laughs. They then formed a line called a "stack" at the foot of the stairway.

"The lieutenant gets out of the way. Now, I'm the front man. I don't want to be." He laughs again. "In the citation, it says that Workman went in first every time. I'll be honest: It wasn't planned that way. . . . The lieutenant says, 'On three we're gonna go.' One, two, three. Bam! He kicks me and I go running up the stairs."

As he ran, machine-gun bullets buzzed past him, but he made it to the safety of the landing, protected from insurgent fire by a thick wall. But he was alone. Nobody had followed him.

"I remember him going up the staircase," says Kraft, who had managed to escape from the second floor after the ambush. There was a lot of confusion and the second guy in the stack sort of hesitated and that kept the rest of the stack back."

"So these guys are downstairs yelling at me, 'Get back down here.' And I'm like, 'You get up here.' I'm cussing at 'em," Workman says, smiling. "But it was a lieutenant, so I pretty much have to go down. I closed my eyes and did a Superman dive down the stairs."

The fall knocked the wind out of him. His buddies stood him back up.

They formed another stack with Workman again in front. He took off. This time, everybody followed and they reached the landing safely. They crept up another set of stairs toward the second floor. Workman had almost reached the top when a yellow grenade bounced into view.

"This thing went off and it felt like somebody hit me in the leg with a baseball bat," he says. "I look back and guys were laying down, knocked over. And I go, 'Is everybody good?' . . . Pretty much everybody got hit with shrapnel but we were all able to fight."

They climbed the stairs and fired at the insurgents, who were barricaded in a bedroom. After an intense firefight, the Marines ran low on ammunition and retreated outside to reload.

By then, two of the Marines they'd come to rescue were dead. Two other Marines dropped their bodies off a porch, then jumped down after them.

"One of the Marines comes stumbling out of this yard next to the house," Workman says. "He's covered with blood. He looked like a zombie. And he just falls over. I run up and grab him."

"Workman grabbed him and dragged him down the street while the insurgents were firing down at us from the rooftop," Kraft recalls. Workman carried the wounded Marine to a couple of Humvees, where a medical corpsman began working on him. Workman saw two other Marines sprawled in the back of a Humvee: Cpl. Raleigh Smith and Lance Cpl. Eric Hillenburg.

"Hey, doc!" he yelled. "Get up here!"

"They're all right," yelled the corpsman, who was treating the Marine that Workman had dragged to safety.

"I'm yelling, 'Doc, get your ass up here!' And he's yelling, 'They're all right, dammit, leave 'em be.' And I'm like, 'Get up here!' And he says, 'They're dead, man, they're dead.' "

DOJ_NMG_0139788

Workman jumped out of the Humvee. "This was the first time I'd ever seen a dead Marine, ever," he says. "It was like somebody flipped a switch, like it wasn't even me anymore. . . . I grabbed whoever's standing around and we ran back into the house. Now it's like vengeance. I want to take as many insurgents out as possible."

The house was dark, the air heavy with smoke. Workman led another charge up the stairs and ran into another grenade.

"It knocked most of us down," he says. "At this point, none of us wants to get up. We're like, 'We're gonna die here.' My buddy, he gets up and fights and I hear this horrendous scream. They hit him with an AK47 and it literally tore the whole triceps off his arm."

Workman pulled the pin on a grenade and tossed it into the bedroom where the insurgents were barricaded, and then the Marines tumbled back downstairs.

"I collapse at the bottom of the stairs," he says. "I'm, like, done. And Major [Todd] Desgrosseilliers grabbed me by the helmet and dragged me out of the house."

All the Marines were out of the building and an M1A1 tank had arrived. It blasted the house to rubble.

At least 24 insurgents were killed in the battle. The Marines lost three men -- Smith, Hillenburg and Lance Cpl. James R. Phillips.

"We went back to the makeshift morgue at Camp Fallujah," Workman says, "and we unloaded the bodies."A Recurring Nightmare

He's been talking for over a hour, sitting in the museum at a table in Tun's Tavern -- named for the place the Marine Corps was founded. He started out with laughs but now he's serious, his green eyes sad and tired.

"The next morning I felt like I'd been in a car accident," he says. Corpsmen had pulled some shrapnel out of him, some still remains. "Everybody was pretty much wounded. And three guys were dead. . . . Eric and James lived in the same bedroom. I went into that room and there are two empty racks. Seeing the empty cots, that's when it sank in. . . . When somebody dies, you gotta get all their belongings and take it back to base camp. You're going through the pockets in their cammies, finding pictures of their girlfriend, their mom and dad."

After a few days of rest, Workman's platoon was back out, patrolling roads and manning checkpoints outside Fallujah. They remained there until April 2005. Workman didn't see much action, but he kept busy enough that he didn't think too much about the day his buddies died.

He was promoted to sergeant and he reenlisted, requesting to become a drill instructor after his return. That spring, his platoon was back at Camp Pendleton in California.

"That's when the world came crashing down," he says. "That's when you have time to think about what really happened, that they're really gone."

Jessica, his wife, was back in Ohio, attending Nationwide Beauty Academy, studying to become a hairstylist. He was in California, partying every night.

"It's easy to self-medicate with alcohol," he says. "With Marines, you're not gonna get off the plane and say, 'I need help from a psychiatrist.' We adapt by getting drunk every night."

When he arrived at drill instructor school at Parris Island that September, he stopped drinking, he says. That's when the nightmares began:

"I would dream this: a staircase, never ending. And I'm running back and forth, being chased by insurgents, and they're throwing grenades at me. And I run and I run and I run until I finally get tired and I can't go on and they catch me and they kill me. Then I'd wake up and I'd be crying and I'd have mental pictures of my guys laying in the back of that truck."

He avoided the nightmare by avoiding sleep. All day he worked as a drill instructor, all night he paced and brooded about Iraq.

"Physically, I was a drill instructor," he says. "Mentally, I was somewhere else."

One day in the spring of 2006, he marched his recruits into the mess hall and then froze, staring into space.

"I didn't see the recruits, I didn't see anything," he recalls. "People are saying, 'Hey, what's going on?' I said, 'I don't give a [bleep] about you, I don't give a [bleep] about the recruits.' . . . I went downhill from there and they sent me to mental health."Suddenly a Hero

DOJ_NMG_0139789

The doctors concluded that Workman was suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. They prescribed some pills and sent him home for 10 days.

"They wanted to get me home to be with my family to mellow out," he says.

Back in Ohio, he stayed with Jessica at her parents' house. Late one night, he got out of bed and wandered into the garage.

"He was out there for a while and I thought, 'What's he doing out there?' " Jessica remembers. "I went out there and he had my dad's rifle, and I asked him what he was doing and he said, 'I don't know why I'm here.' "

She took him inside and later that night saw him swallowing a handful of pills. "I had to literally stick my hands in his mouth and make him vomit," she recalls.

"Obviously, I probably wanted to hurt myself," Workman says. "But I don't remember much about it."

When he returned to Parris Island, he was no longer a drill instructor. Instead, he was assigned to do odd jobs, "basically like a janitor," he says.

And then he won the Navy Cross.

Suddenly, he was a hero. Reporters interviewed him. Generals posed for pictures with him. He met Donald Rumsfeld, Robert Gates, Ross Perot, Hillary Clinton and various other bigwigs. His home town declared Jeremiah Workman Day. Strangers begged to buy him a drink.

"Everybody else was more excited than I was," he says. "I was just slipping further into depression because I was reliving everything now. Everybody wants you to tell the story: How did you do it? How many people did you kill? I'm like, why don't you ask me to tell stories about my guys?"

His guys, Smith, Phillips and Hillenburg, haunted him. He saw them in his dreams. He saw them when he looked at his Navy Cross. They got killed and he got a medal. Did that make any sense? That summer, he had their names tattooed on his back.

"This," he says, "is what I have to put in my mind to be able to wear this medal and not be ashamed: I accepted this medal for three guys who didn't make it back. So it's really theirs."

In the fall, Workman was transferred to Quantico and stationed at the new National Museum of the Marine Corps. He walks around in his uniform, talking to tourists, sometimes posing for pictures with the ones who recognize the importance of the Navy Cross ribbon on his chest.

"I'm an ambassador for the Marine Corps, I guess," he says with a laugh.

Jessica found work as a hairstylist at a nearby spa. On February 21, she gave birth to their first child, a son, Devon.

Months ago, Workman stopped taking his medicines. "I don't want to be a pill popper," he says. "But I pay for it. I have more bad days than I probably would if I was on the medication."

"I'd rather that he was still on the medications," says Jessica. "His mood swings are so much worse. He'll be fine one minute and then he's freaking out. With PTSD, you never know. It's a roller coaster every day."'You Don't Have a Choice'

When people call you a hero, what do you think?

He thinks for a moment. "Hero?" he says. "I almost laugh."

And then he does laugh. But he quickly gets serious. "Almost any infantry Marine would have done what I did. You don't have a choice. What are you gonna do? Not do it? And live for the rest of your life knowing that you hesitated and didn't act and more people may have died because you didn't do anything?"

He risked his life for his fellow Marines and that pleases him. "I did learn a lot about myself that day," he says. "In front of family and friends, you're the big tough Marine but . . . you always question yourself about whether you have what it takes in a situation like that. Not everybody does. I answered my own question that day. I was scared and I didn't want to do it, but I did it. That gives me some pride, I guess."

But that was then, he points out, and this is now. "I couldn't tell you if I could do it again," he says. "I would love to believe that every time something like that happened, I would do the same thing, but I don't know."

He does know one thing: He wants to go back to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0139790

"I've volunteered. I've told everybody I can. Right now, they want to keep me here. . . . A lot of these high-ranking people think they know what's best for you. And in their minds, what's best for me is staying here and having a normal family life and going home every night. Whereas in my mind and in my heart, I want to get back into the fight."

He says: "A lot of my friends have been there three or four times. I think if I got one more tour over there, I'd feel better in the heart. I don't want to go down as a one-hit wonder."

Soldier Convicted Of Negligent Homicide In Iraq Shooting (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

LITTLE ROCK (AP) — An Arkansas soldier has been convicted of negligent homicide for the shooting death of a fellow guardsman in Iraq.

Spc. Daniel E. Turner was convicted Monday in Baghdad and sentenced to 15 years in a military prison, the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette reported Saturday.

He is being held at Camp Arifjan, Kuwait until his conviction is formalized, the newspaper said.

Turner was convicted for the death of Spc. Derek Plowman, 20, of Everton, Ark.

The circumstances surrounding Plowman's death have not been released by the military. The Defense Department did not immediately return a message seeking comment Saturday.

As part of a pretrial agreement, Turner also received a bad conduct discharge, forfeited pay and was reduced in rank to private.

"The forfeitures are suspended right now," said Maj. Steve Zega, 142nd judge advocate. "In other words, they're still paying him right now. I understand the reason they worked that out is he has a very young child at home."

The Charlie Battery returned home last week from its year-long deployment in Iraq.

The Warden Of Fallouja (LAT)

By Mike Carlson

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Taking charge of a detention center in Iraq? Here's what you need to remember.

Mike Carlson served as the officer in charge of the Camp Fallouja Regional Detention Facility from March 2006 to October.[

1]

They're not prisoners, they're "detainees."

It sounds better, as if they're merely inconvenienced rather than shoehorned into cinderblock cells, thumbing their military-issued Korans and waiting to be interrogated. One-third are innocents caught up in sweeps; one-third are jihadists who will slit your throat, and one-third are opportunists who will rat out their neighbors. You will hold them for 14 days, no more, while the interrogators try to figure out who is what. Each gets a CF, for Camp Fallouja, and a four-digit number. No names will be used, mainly because numbers fit more easily onto spreadsheets. They will be forever known as entas. "Enta" means "you" in Arabic, and that's what you call them day after day, meal after meal, port-a-potty call after port-a-potty call. "Enta, ishra mai," you say, and the enta drinks his water, and if you say, "Enta, ishra mai kulak," he drinks all of his water, every drop, and holds the bottle upside down to prove it.

[2]

It's not personal.

The enta who screams "meesta!" every 10 seconds for 48 hours straight isn't doing it to infuriate you, his captor. What it boils down to is that he can't pronounce "mister," and he was carrying that 155-millimeter round in the back of his pickup, and he was going to try to blow you up, and the reason he was picked by the insurgent leaders to haul the shell is that he's soft in the head, which is why he cannot stop screaming "meesta!"

The major who watches NASCAR races on satellite TV in his air-conditioned office at the battalion headquarters while you and your Marines march entas to and from the latrines in 120-degree heat isn't doing it to antagonize you, his subordinate. Frankly, he's just over here for the retirement money, and he didn't want to be in charge of four regional detention facilities in Al

DOJ_NMG_0139791

Anbar province any more than you wanted to end up as the warden in Fallouja. He wants to keep his head down and forget about the fact that if one, just one, of your Marines snaps and goes Abu Ghraib on a detainee, his pension is out the window.

[3]

You won't fire your weapon in anger.

You'll fire plenty of training rounds. You'll be awakened nightly by outgoing artillery shells being blasted into the ether a mere 400 meters from your tin-can hooch, where you fall asleep to the drone of your air-conditioning unit and the faint yelps from the sergeant-next-door's porn videos.

Your fingers will ache from absently squeezing the grip of your M16A4 during endless nighttime convoys, transporting detainees from Fallouja to Abu Ghraib or Camp Cropper. The only illumination in the back of the truck will come from the red-lens flashlight you pan across the entas to make sure none of them have wormed loose from their flex cuffs and hatched a plot to kill you.

Your truck will stop one night outside Abu Ghraib. You will wait for explosive ordnance techs to clear a suspicious burlap bag. Because there are so many bombs, you never know how long you'll sit exposed on the road. During the second hour, CF-4562 will ask you in perfect English if he can pee. You will escort him to the edge of the road. When he thinks you aren't looking, 4562 will slink away from you and your rifle. You will immediately see through such a feeble escape attempt, and here, outside the site of America's shame, this enta will be one sandal step away from giving you an absolutely justifiable reason to finally click your weapon's selector off of "safe."

You will raise the muzzle slowly with muscles that ache from humping 60 pounds of body armor and ammo and water and Quick-Clot coagulant, but before your thumb moves over the safety, you will automatically say "kiff," Arabic for "stop," because it's been drilled into you as part of the rules of engagement. You will want to shoot, and 4562 will hear that in your voice. He will stop. He will manage a feeble stream of urine before you shoo him back aboard the truck.

[4]

You will be a constant target outside the wire.

A green beam of light will dazzle you through the Cyclops lens of your night-vision goggles as it streaks toward the armored sides of your truck. You will grit your teeth, and the rocket-propelled grenade will hit, and then, by the grace of some malfunction, it will only gouge out a divot from the big green plates, an errant golf swing's worth of metal. You will pan your rifle barrel across the garbage-strewn fields and pockmarked buildings, but you will see nothing, just a stray dog scurrying away from the tiny blast. A feeling of anticlimax will wash over you, of one beer short of the perfect buzz and a throw just wide of the catcher's mitt. You are a Marine and trained to kill, but you can never find any insurgents to shoot.

[5]

You will tell yourself lies about how being shot at will change you.

You won't be able to tell your wife about the near-miss when you call home because you know she'll be worried, and when she worries, she cries, and you cannot, absolutely cannot, have her cry, mainly because it will make you cry, and you're a captain in a crowded phone center surrounded by junior Marines. Your neck will cramp up for two weeks, as if all your fears have been concentrated into a small kernel of misery somewhere north of your shoulder blade. Then, one day, the pain will be gone, and you will walk up to the side of the truck and place your fist inside the divot to remind yourself that it really happened.

[6]

You will screw up.

A sergeant will push one of your female Marines too hard during physical training, and she will turn on the waterworks and accuse him of sexual harassment. You will chew out the sergeant, but later discover that she is simply angry with him for forbidding her to visit her boyfriend in another unit.

You will apologize to the sergeant, but the incident will have cost you some of the platoon's trust, and you will find yourself hating her. She will hate you too, until she goes home early, knocked up by the very same boyfriend she was forbidden to see. You will feel a quick self-righteous high, followed by a prolonged low; your neglect of your own rule — don't take it personally — means you failed her as a leader.

[7]

DOJ_NMG_0139792

You will drink water until your urine is clear.

You will drink and drink and keep drinking until you've drained more than 800 bottles of water during your stay in the Iraqi desert.

[8]

Your interpreter will be your greatest hidden ally.

Ali is rotund, aged and bearded, a prototypical Islamic authority figure. He reads the facility rules to all new detainees, his face hidden behind dark glasses and a ball cap. Your understanding of Arabic progresses to the point where you know he's adding regulations. You take him aside, and he explains that he tells the new arrivals that there are snipers in every tower, that trapdoors lurk beyond the borders of each gravel path and that attacking a Marine in the facility would result in a coward's death, voiding the promise of 72 virgins. You allow him to continue.

[9]

You won't abuse any detainees.

Your property room will hold a sniper rifle that killed a Marine and bears the fingerprints of the man inside Cell 4A. Evidence photos will show a bomb crater and bloody boots with shinbones still laced inside, and wires that lead from the crater to the home of CF-7634. As you perform your daily cell checks, you will occasionally want to smash and kick and eye gouge and palm-heel strike. But you won't. You will need to look in the mirror tomorrow when you shave.

[10]

You will get by with 20 words of Arabic.

When your prisoner-release convoy is waved into a field strewn with basketball-sized boulders by an Army lieutenant too new to speak Arabic, that will be just enough to get the entas to stop washing their feet and shouting blessings to Allah and to herd them into the civil affairs compound. Later, an 18-year-old lance corporal will fall asleep at the wheel and swerve off the Fallouja cloverleaf. As the 7-ton rumbles down the embankment, the entas will fling themselves off the truck. One enta will break his arm, and, again, your 20 words will coax him into medical treatment. Through it all — the bungled release, the accident, the medevac — you will not be attacked. Two days later, a similar convoy traveling the exact same route will be blown up by an IED, and the ache in your neck will return for another two weeks.

[11]

After seven months, you will fly home.

On the way back to the U.S., your Marines will be told by Maj. NASCAR that they can drink, and they will — to excess. You will resign yourself to breaking up the inevitable fights, and as you step between two Marines about to swing, you will realize that this has been your purpose. You set limits.

[12]

You will return to civilian life.

You will be jumpy and vaguely unsatisfied, disconnected from the civilians around you who care only about text messages and gas prices and catty e-mails. Navy doctors will find Iraqi sand trapped in the innermost pathways of your ear canals. Your wife now snores, and all her unfamiliar noises combine to drive you from your bed.

On one such night, you will turn on the television news and see that Anna Nicole Smith's death has trumped the coverage of America's 3,118th fatality, 31-year-old Petty Officer 1st Class Gilbert Minjares Jr. You will note that, at 39, Smith was younger than most of the helicopters flying in Iraq. You will turn off the TV and sit in the dark and feel your eyes water as you think about how you took 55 Marines and sailors into a combat zone and brought all 55 back home, and that no one in America besides you and those 55 really cares or understands what you went through.

You processed 1,230 detainees, without a single incident of abuse, while America sat on the couch and watched girls go wild. As far as you know, you killed no one. This used to bother you, because killing is what Marines are trained to do. But now, after viewing documentaries and reports that paint American forces as Redcoat invaders, you take some comfort in the fact that you never pulled the trigger.

DOJ_NMG_0139793

Those numbers — 55, 1,230 and 0 — will allow you to sleep tonight, and the next night, and the next. But each night you will insert a mouth guard made of silicone before you go to sleep, because your dentist informs you that you are always, always, always unconsciously grinding your teeth.

In Wartime, Who Has The Power? (NYT)

By Jeffrey Rosen

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

THE Constitution seems relatively clear. The president is the commander in chief, and he has the power to deploy troops and to direct military strategy. Congress has the power to declare war and can use its control over the purse to end a war. But it has no say over how the war is actually prosecuted.

That poses a problem for Congress, as it debates the course of the Iraq war. Democratic proposals to check President Bush's increasing unpopular war range from Senator Barack Obama's "phased redeployment" of all combat troops out of Iraq by March 3, 2008, to Representative John Murtha's attempts to impose specific standards for the training and equipping of troops.

Regardless of how these proposals fare politically, they raise serious constitutional questions that could affect not only the conduct of the Iraq war, but also the balance of power between Congress and the president in wartime.

Legal scholars — both critics and supporters of the Iraq war — say that if Congress tries to manage the deployment and withdrawal of troops without cutting funds, the president's powers as commander in chief would be encroached, perhaps leading to a constitutional confrontation of historic proportions.

"If there were to be a binding resolution that said troops had to go from 120,000 to 80,000 by April 15, Congress would be, in my view, transgressing on the conduct of a military campaign," says Samuel Issacharoff, a law professor at New York University. "Congress can't tell the president to charge up the east side of the hill rather than the west, which is the definition of the president's military authority."

So how, exactly, can Congress assert power over the war, beyond its ability simply to pull the plug on its financing? History suggests that Congress has found ways of checking the president in the past without encroaching on his power as commander in chief. And, history suggests, as well, that neither side is that eager for a constitutional showdown.

There is little dispute that Congress could, if it had the political will, end the war in Iraq tomorrow by using its power over appropriations to cut off funds to the troops. "Congress could easily check the president," says W. Taylor Reveley III, the dean of William and Mary School of Law and author of "War Powers of the President and Congress."

"If Iraq continues to go badly or if it looks like the president might actually use force in Iran, I can easily see Congress passing something like the Cambodian or Vietnam spending cutoffs, which would force the setting of a timetable for withdrawal that was pretty brisk," he said.

If Congress used its appropriations power in this way, even the most vigorous defenders of executive power agree, President Bush would have to acquiesce. "He would have to comply, and he would comply," says John Yoo, the University of California at Berkeley law professor who, as a Bush administration official, defended the president's authority to act unilaterally. According to Professor Yoo, Congress could immediately cut funds, or could order a phased withdrawal by authorizing a fixed amount of money each month for specified numbers of troops.

"The idea that the funding tool is too blunt is a view held by people who have never worked in Congress," he says. "It can be a scalpel as well as a baseball bat."

The problem is not that Congress lacks the constitutional power to cut off funds, but that it may lack the political will to do so.

"I think it's inconceivable that Congress will cut off appropriations, because no one wants to leave people on the field without support," says Michael Gerhardt of the University of North Carolina Law School.

Congress, however, has other cudgels. During the War of 1812, Federalist critics of President James Madison forced the resignation of his secretary of war, and, decades later, the House passed a resolution censuring President James Polk for unconstitutionally beginning a war with Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0139794

During the Civil War, Congressional Republicans wanted Lincoln to fire Gen. George B. McClellan and prosecute the war more aggressively. But they never tried to control actual troop movements. Instead, Congress tried to shame the Union generals into fighting by hauling them repeatedly before Congressional committees.

"It bordered on harassment, and Lincoln resisted some of the excesses, but even then, Congress never tried to issue orders about the deployment of troops," says Professor Issacharoff.

Congress, of course, could assert itself in similar ways today, according to Professor Gerhardt. "Congress is entitled to have oversight hearings to see how well things are going, and to figure out where we should go from here," he says.

Changes in technology also make it easier for Congress to micromanage military decisions if it chooses to do so. "In the 19th century, simply to send a command and find out what happened in the battle took weeks," says Professor Issacharoff. "So neither Congress nor the president could micromanage. Now you can have battlefield commanders in a speakerphone in the well of Congress — you could have 535 generals shouting instructions."

Congress would also be perfectly competent to examine civil liberties questions, like the restoration of habeas corpus for detainees held at Guantánamo Bay. It could pass resolutions opposing the war effort over Republican opposition, as Democrats have proposed to do. It could demand compliance with international norms about how the war is conducted.

But let's say Congress passed a binding resolution that reduced troop levels without actually cutting off funds. What then?

"What's likely to happen is that Congress will assert its power, and the executive will resist through delay, redeployment of troops elsewhere or simply disregarding Congress," Professor Issacharoff says. "It will never be presented to a court, because when both branches are involved in disputes about war and claim overlapping powers, the courts tend to back down."

Dean Reveley agrees. "These disputes about the powers of the president and Congress in wartime are waged with almost theological passion and conviction and the Supreme Court rarely intervenes, which is why war powers are still so murky," he says. "Every time we've gotten involved in an unpopular war, which has been all our wars except the two World Wars, there has been an enormous amount of bickering between the president and Congress when it didn't come out the way we wanted. Sometimes presidents have acted, Congress said 'Don't do that,' and the president acceded, as in Vietnam. But mostly Congress has stood on the sidelines and complained."

In other words, a constitutional crisis may not be the inevitable outcome.

"I think this will be resolved politically, as it has been in the past, and either the president or Congress will back down," Professor Issacharoff says. "My sense is that it's more likely to be Congress, because nobody wants to assume responsibility for managing a disaster."

Even if President Bush wins a constitutional confrontation, Congress may react by asserting its powers against future presidents. "Congress will be much more careful in the future about authorizing force without restrictions on presidential power," says Jack Goldsmith of Harvard Law School. "Every action on each side tends to provoke a counterreaction, which is probably what James Madison wanted."

Antiwar Caucus Wants To Be Heard Now (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — About a dozen members of the Out of Iraq Congressional Caucus gathered on a sunny day last summer on the terrace outside the Capitol for a news conference. The only problem: no reporters showed up.

The members of the group, made up entirely of House Democrats, cracked jokes among themselves before heading back inside, chalking it up as another failed attempt to get noticed.

"I had 30 press conferences where no one showed up," said Representative Maxine Waters, a California Democrat who leads the 75-member caucus in the House.

Now, with a change in power in Congress and a new military strategy to increase the number of American troops in Iraq, the members of the group — most of them liberals — are suddenly much in demand, finding themselves at the center of the debate over the war.

DOJ_NMG_0139795

Yet even with a majority of Americans opposing the war, the caucus is struggling to overcome its fringe image and is becoming increasingly frustrated by what its members say is the Democratic leadership's unwillingness to heed their calls for decisive action to the end the war.

At the same time, though the members are united in their desire to bring American military involvement in Iraq to a speedy end, they are still debating the best way to do so. In that sense, they reflect the broader struggle among Democrats in Congress, who have been unable to coalesce around a single position on how strongly to confront President Bush over the war.

House Democratic leaders this week seemed to back away slightly from a proposal by Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, to limit Mr. Bush's latest supplemental spending request for the war. Mr. Murtha's proposal would have required strict readiness for troops sent to Iraq, essentially limiting the president's ability to follow through on his plan to deploy an additional 21,500.

Mr. Murtha's conditions were favored by caucus members, though it has come under fire from Republicans who labeled it a "slow bleed" strategy. The proposed strategy has also run into opposition from conservative House Democrats, who argue that their concerns need to be taken seriously because they helped deliver the Democratic majority in the midterm elections. The Murtha proposal, they said, would leave the party vulnerable to charges of abandoning troops.

"My concern, representing the state where we've got the highest percentage call-up of guard and reserve in the country, I want to make sure Congress does not do anything that hamstrings troops on the ground," said Representative Jim Matheson, a Utah Democrat who is a member of the Blue Dogs, a coalition of party moderates and conservatives.

Democratic leaders have responded to critics by floating a new plan that would allow Mr. Bush to waive the readiness standards, a possibility that has left many of the party's vocal left wing unhappy. About 30 members of the Out of Iraq Caucus met Thursday to plot strategy. They warned that they might vote against any supplemental bill that did not more strictly limit the president's options, a vote that could prove embarrassing for a Democratic leadership trying to preserve a fragile majority.

"Nothing is going to happen unless we use the power of the purse," said Representative Jerrold Nadler of New York. "It's time to draw a line in the sand."

The House minority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio, said Republicans would oppose any measure that "restricts the president's ability to win the war in Iraq."

Representative Barbara Lee, Democrat of California, a co-chairwoman of the Congressional Progressive Caucus and a founder of the Out of Iraq Caucus, is drafting an amendment that would allow financing only to protect American troops in Iraq pending a full withdrawal under a set timetable.

Assuming the supplemental bill is unsatisfactory to the caucus, war opponents are discussing whether to threaten to vote against it when it comes to a vote in the House floor in mid-March, unless the House leadership also permits a vote on the amendment from Ms. Lee.

Ms. Lee said her goal was to shift the discussion to a "fully funded withdrawal" from "cutting off funding."

"There's a distinction between cutting off funding and using the funding to begin a speedy and secure withdrawal within a specific timeframe," she said.

Created as an offshoot of the Progressive Caucus in the summer of 2005, the Out of Iraq group began with about 50 members. Its slow climb began when Mr. Murtha, an influential lawmaker and Vietnam veteran, unveiled his first plan calling for redeployment of troops in late 2005.

"The Out of Iraq Caucus grabbed onto Murtha," Ms. Waters said. "Don't forget, we were considered liberals and/or progressives that did not present a real threat to the administration, or even to the leadership."

Suddenly, though, they had Mr. Murtha's backing. The group's numbers have since swelled, and now include a third of the Democratic majority.

The roster includes nine House committee leaders. Also among its membership are Representative George Miller of California, a trusted confidant of Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, and Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, the vice-chair of the Democratic Caucus and the only member of the leadership in the group.

But many members rarely attend meetings. Some of its active members are lawmakers who play easily into Republican characterizations of some Democrats as peaceniks far from the mainstream. Ms. Lee was the lone dissenting vote in Congress against the resolution authorizing the president to use force to respond to the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001. In 2005, she co-sponsored a bill with Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio (also a caucus member), and others to create a cabinet-level office called the Department of Peace.

DOJ_NMG_0139796

With such a large tent, caucus members are hardly uniform in their views. Some are pondering whether they should simply continue to be patient. Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, who heads the influential Ways and Means Committee, said he was not sure how he would vote on the supplemental measure.

He called the war "morally wrong" and said "it goes even beyond the brutality of slavery and the lynchings." At the same time, he said, Democratic leaders must be careful to carve out a consensus path.

Governing as a majority requires compromise, said Representative James P. Moran of Virginia, a caucus member who also sits on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. "Hopefully we don't have to compromise too much."

Pakistan Denies U.S. Claim Of Having Authority To Target Militants Inside Pakistan (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Pakistan vehemently denied Saturday the U.S. military's claim that coalition forces in Afghanistan have the authority to pursue Taliban fleeing across the border into Pakistani territory.

"There is no authorization for hot pursuit of terrorists into our territory," Maj. Gen. Waheed Arshad, spokesman for the Pakistan Army, told The Associated Press on Saturday. "Whatever actions are needed to fight terrorism, we are taking them."

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry rejected an assertion by Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute, chief operations officer for the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, that his forces routinely fire on and pursue Taliban into Pakistan.

"No foreign forces are allowed to cross into our territorial border," said Ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam. "Pakistan and United States are partners in the war on terror — not adversaries."

Aslam's and Arshad's comments came two days after Lute told the Senate Armed Services Committee in Washington that "we have all the authorities we need to pursue, either with (artillery) fire or on the ground, across the border."

Lute provided a detailed description of when U.S. forces can fire on and pursue insurgents across the border into the Islamic nation of Pakistan, an important ally of the U.S. in its campaign against terrorism.

However, Lute did not elaborate on whether there were restrictions on how deep into Pakistan his soldiers could go. He said the decision is based not on distance, but on the immediacy of the threat involved.

Pakistan used to be a main supporter of Afghanistan's former Taliban regime, but it switched sides after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Its forces have since arrested at least 700 al-Qaida and Taliban.

But there is growing international pressure on Pakistan to crackdown further on Taliban militants on its side of the border, a message delivered on Monday by Vice President Dick Cheney during a visit to Islamabad.

In Kabul on Saturday, Afghan Foreign Minister Rangeen Dadfar Spanta told members of Parliament that Pakistan uses terror as its foreign policy and that the international community should not reward Pakistan with aid.

"Pakistan shouldn't use terror as its foreign policy," he said. "I wish that the international community wouldn't give rewards to countries that are supporting the Taliban."

Afghan officials frequently accuse Pakistani leaders of harboring Taliban fighters and commanders, though Pakistan insists it does all it can to fight terrorism. Pakistan has deployed about 80,000 troops near Afghanistan, where al-Qaida and Taliban remnants are believed to be hiding.

Nisar A. Memon, chairman of the Pakistani Senate's Standing Committee on Defense, said his country alone would take action against militants on its side of the border, but that Afghanistan should do more from its territory.

"Pakistan has contributed more than any other country to the successes in the fight against terrorism and extremism," he said. "On the Afghanistan side, there is equal responsibility of the coalition and Afghan forces to stop undesirable elements from crossing into our territory."

During his trip, Cheney had expressed concern to President Gen. Pervez Musharraf over al-Qaida regrouping inside Pakistan's tribal regions and an expected Taliban spring offensive in neighboring Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0139797

Shortly after Cheney's visit, Pakistani intelligence officials said that Pakistani agents — during a raid in the southwestern city of Quetta — captured the Taliban's former defense minister Mullah Obaidullah Akhund.

Pakistan so far has not officially confirmed Akhund's arrest, although individuals with knowledge of Pakistani intelligence workings say the man was being questioned near the capital, Islamabad. Akhund is said to be a key associate of fugitive Taliban leader Mullah Omar.

Returning, Safe, After A Year's Service In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Kareem Fahim

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

FORT DIX, N.J., March 2 — In person, Specialist Lourdes Siverio looked remarkably like the picture her mother painted of her while she was away.

Her mother, Gloria Muniz, held the painting above her head on Friday as Specialist Siverio's National Guard unit marched crisply toward a reunion with loved ones. Then slowly, the painting dropped to the ground, and mother and daughter stood quietly, amid the whirl of tearful, laughing, shouting soldiers who had returned to New Jersey after more than a year in Afghanistan.

Specialist Siverio, 23, held on to Ms. Muniz with one hand. With the other, she dabbed tears from the cheek of her 13-year-old sister, Ruth Ruiz. The separation had been hard on the teenager. "It's like I've been an only child," Ruth said.

Specialist Siverio was among 80 soldiers from the 50th Personnel Services Battalion, based in Lawrenceville, who arrived at Fort Dix on Friday. Many of the returning soldiers were leaving the Guard. Others remained on active duty, and some re-enlisted.

In Afghanistan, they had mostly engaged the enemy of paperwork, functioning as a human resources and postal division for a United States contingent of more than 21,000: they delivered the mail, tracked the promotions and kept records of time spent on leave. None were killed, and none were seriously injured.

The danger they faced was mostly on the roads, although many of them were at Bagram Air Base on Tuesday when a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the base during a visit by Vice President Dick Cheney, killing at least 23 people.

They returned on the day the Army secretary, Francis J. Harvey, resigned because of revelations about inadequate treatment of wounded soldiers at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center; and a day after a panel found that members of the National Guard and Reserve did not receive enough money or equipment, though at times they have accounted for half the soldiers in Iraq.

There was little talk of those matters outside a recreation center at Fort Dix where relatives and friends held flags and balloons, and wore T-shirts that welcomed Daddy, or A. J., or someone else. The relatives smiled nervously and hid from the wind behind posters when the bus carrying the soldiers was delayed.

"I didn't think of getting balloons," an older woman said, until she was directed inside, where there were plenty.

Specialist Rosalie Martinsen's mother, Tammy, had baked two apple pies, which sat waiting in a homey wicker basket. "It's the best, flakiest crust," said her father, Rob.

Then, with a chapel framing the background, the unit marched along a narrow road toward the whoops and hollers, and a woman screaming over and over, "That's my baby!"

Inside the recreation center, alongside the video games and pool tables, a feast of sandwiches and pasta and mashed potatoes waited on long tables.

Sgt. Erick Rodriguez, 31, with one of his four children sitting in his lap, ate slowly from a plate piled high, as more than a dozen of his relatives watched every bite as if it were the first time they had seen him eat.

"What did you miss the most?" a woman in the group asked him. He rolled his eyes, and she changed the question. "O.K. What did you miss second?"

Unlike Sergeant Rodriguez, Sgt. Dawan Ginn, 24, had no one waiting for him; his family lives in Virginia. Returning home to uncertainty about his future, he decided to re-enlist. "I basically built my life around the military," Sergeant Ginn said. Of Afghanistan, he said, "It's a kind of messed up, poor country." For half of his deployment, he had been stationed in Qatar.

DOJ_NMG_0139798

Specialist Maladrique Wilson's father was working Friday night, and Specialist Wilson, standing with other soldiers near the entrance to the recreation room, understood. He had made friends in the unit, but he had also observed the strains and the fights. He saw the letters of support from schoolchildren, and he wondered why there was not more support from adults.

"Afghanistan is a process in life you have to go through with strength," Specialist Wilson said.

Specialist Samantha Nigro gave her family an equally grim assessment of Afghanistan, said her father, Joe. Specialist Nigro worked in the personnel department of the unit, where she processed identity cards. Others she knew handled death certificates.

Through Feb. 24, the number of United States military personnel killed in or around Afghanistan was 307, according to the Defense Department.

But Samantha was home. "Right now, we're ecstatic," her father said.

DOJ:

A New Mystery To Prosecutors: Their Lost Jobs (NYT)

By David Johnston, Eric Lipton, William Yardley

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 3 — After Daniel G. Bogden got the call in December telling him that he was being dismissed as the United States attorney in Nevada, he pressed for an explanation.

Mr. Bogden, who was named the top federal prosecutor in Nevada in 2001 after 11 years of working his way up at the Justice Department, asked an official at the agency's headquarters if the firing was related to his performance or to that of his office. "That didn't enter into the equation," he said he was told.

After several more calls, Mr. Bogden reached a senior official who offered an answer. "There is a window of opportunity to put candidates into an office like mine," Mr. Bogden said, recalling the conversation. "They were attempting to open a slot and bring someone else in."

The ouster of Mr. Bogden and seven other United States attorneys has set off a furor in Washington that took the Bush administration by surprise.

Summoning five of the dismissed prosecutors for hearings on Tuesday, the newly empowered Congressional Democrats have charged that the mass firing is a political purge, intended to squelch corruption investigations or install less independent-minded successors.

Interviews with several of the prosecutors, Justice Department officials, lawmakers and others provide new details and a fuller picture of the events behind the dismissals. Like Mr. Bogden, some prosecutors believe they were forced out for replacements who could gild résumés; several heard that favored candidates had been identified.

Other prosecutors may have been vulnerable because they had had run-ins with the Justice Department, not over corruption cases against Republicans, but on less visible issues.

Paul Charlton in Arizona, for example, annoyed Federal Bureau of Investigation officials by pushing for confessions to be tape-recorded, while John McKay in Seattle had championed a computerized law enforcement information-sharing system that Justice Department officials did not want. Carol C. Lam of San Diego, who successfully prosecuted former Representative Randy Cunningham, had drawn complaints that she was not sufficiently aggressive on immigration cases.

Justice Department officials deny that the dismissals were politically motivated or that the action resulted from White House pressure.

Brian Roehrkasse, an agency spokesman, said, "These decisions were based on the individual concerns about each U.S. attorney's overall performance. This included performance concerns about ineffectively prosecuting departmental priority areas, failure to follow departmental guidelines, or just overall concerns about an ability to lead and effectively manage a U.S. attorney's office."

United States attorneys have four-year terms but can be removed at any time, and for almost any reason.

DOJ_NMG_0139799

But across the country, legal and public officials have expressed dismay over the firings. In Western Michigan, for example, lawyers and a federal judge came to the defense of Margaret M. Chiara, the United States attorney there, saying she was well regarded.

"It just doesn't look right," said James S. Brady, who was United States attorney in Western Michigan during the Carter administration. "It compromises the credibility that justice is being dealt with fairly and impartially. There is a fear that politics have entered in life and death situations."

Discussions began in October at the Justice Department about removing prosecutors who were considered flawed or deficient in carrying out administration policy by law enforcement officials, lawmakers and others, several officials said. The White House eventually approved the list and helped notify Republican lawmakers before the Dec. 7 dismissals, officials said.

While Justice Department officials expected that top assistant prosecutors in each office would probably fill the jobs initially, the officials said they had not chosen permanent successors. However, officials knew that if the replacements were to have a substantial tenure before Mr. Bush left office, they needed to be named quickly.

The list of prosecutors who were targets was approved by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and the deputy attorney general, Paul J. McNulty, the day-to-day manager of the Justice Department since he was appointed in the fall of 2005.

Under Mr. Gonzales, Mr. McNulty has become a powerful deputy with a wide-ranging portfolio. He was a United States attorney in Virginia, but he worked in Congress for more than a decade and was once legal counsel to the House majority leader. He is regarded in legal circles as more attuned to policy and politics than his predecessor, James B. Comey, a former career prosecutor in New York.

That leadership change may explain the removal of prosecutors who had mostly been in place since the start of the Bush administration.

"I and my colleagues are the same people in December of 2006 that we were in 2001," said one former prosecutor who would speak only on the condition of anonymity. "The only thing that has changed is the administration of the Department of Justice. We were making the same arguments and the same points before."

Justice Department officials, who would speak about the department's decision making only anonymously because they were not authorized to discuss personnel matters publicly, now acknowledge that the dismissals were mishandled. They failed to anticipate how much attention the highly unusual group firing would draw, and the agency's contradictory accounts about whether the dismissals were performance-related helped spur suspicions.

In one case, they said that they were unaware of concerns by United States Attorney David C. Iglesias of New Mexico, which he has expressed publicly in recent days, about being pressured by two Republican lawmakers to rush indictments before last November's elections in a contract kickback investigation involving a former state Democratic official. New Mexico has three Republicans in Congress; Representative Steve Pearce has said he did not call Mr. Iglesias, while aides to Senator Pete V. Domenici and Representative Heather A. Wilson have said they would not comment.

The Justice Department still appears to have an uphill battle in convincing lawmakers that its actions were justified. Several Congressional officials who have been briefed on the decision making said they were not persuaded that the firings were a well intended if botched effort to oust a few problem prosecutors among the country's 93 United States attorneys.

Some said they suspected that the administration hoped to install its favorites in the jobs, as they did when J. Timothy Griffin, a prosecutor who had worked for Karl Rove, the White House political adviser, was chosen as the temporary replacement for H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas. Mr. Cummins was told last summer to step down after Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel, met with Mr. Gonzales's staff on Mr. Griffin's behalf.

Even Republicans who are generally supportive of the administration expressed skepticism about the Justice Department's explanations.

Former Senator Slade Gorton of Washington said, "The administration has a perfect right to ask people to leave and appoint other ones just because they want turnover."

But he said he was unhappy that Mr. McKay, the Seattle prosecutor, was dismissed. He was very effective, Mr. Gorton said, and it was a mistake for the Justice Department to characterize the firing as performance related.

DOJ_NMG_0139800

Mr. McKay, who is among the ousted prosecutors who have been summoned to testify before Congress, has said little about his dismissal. In interviews this week, officials in Seattle said he was a strong advocate for the expansion of law enforcement powers under the USA Patriot Act and a determined prosecutor who reorganized the office and allowed senior assistants to focus on complex cases.

"Institutions need to go through a period of renewal to be energized," said Norm Maleng, the King County prosecuting attorney. "That's what John did. He took it to a higher level."

Jeffrey C. Sullivan, who served as chief of criminal investigations under Mr. McKay and hopes to succeed him, said he was asked by the Justice Department to describe how the office had enacted "the attorney general's priorities." He said he responded that Mr. McKay created drug and gang task forces and pursued antiterrorism initiatives.

Mr. McKay had led efforts to start a computer system allowing law enforcement officials in the Seattle region to collect and analyze crime data. The program helped make him popular in local law enforcement circles, but his associates believed that Justice Department and F.B.I. officials in Washington objected, believing that such efforts should be undertaken on the national level.

Many Republicans and law enforcement officials in Washington say they are puzzled about the dismissal of Mr. McKay, whose brother is a former United States attorney in Seattle who was the state vice chairman of Mr. Bush's 2004 campaign.

Chris Vance, a former chairman of the state Republican Party, said some conservative activists were upset when Mr. McKay did not pursue a voter fraud investigation after a close election for governor was won by a Democrat in 2004, but that none of them had influence with the White House. Mr. Vance said in consulting with national party leaders at the time, Mr. McKay was not mentioned.

"They never said to me, 'Why isn't John McKay doing something?' " he said. "That never came up."

Justice Department officials said they regarded Mr. Bogden as competent but insufficiently aggressive, although they acknowledge that his removal was a tough call.

Mr. Bogden, whose last day was Wednesday, remains bitter about his dismissal. A Justice Department official said Mr. Bogden's conversation with the agency official who told him he was being moved out to make way for someone new was an effort to express sympathy for his situation, not an indication that his successor had already been chosen.

"You would think that you would be evaluated on your record, what your office has been able to achieve and what you have been able to accomplish as a United States attorney," Mr. Bogden said. "You hear something like that, there is a sense of disbelief."

JOHN L. SMITH: Patriot Act Lets Politics Trump Professionalism With U.S. Attorney's Firing (LVRJ)

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 4, 2007

How quickly they forget.

On a rainy Tuesday morning in August 2003, Attorney General John Ashcroft came to the Lloyd D. George U.S. Courthouse to address members of the U.S. attorney's office on the importance of teamwork in implementing the USA Patriot Act.

At Ashcroft's side that day was his loyal soldier in the war on terrorism, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden. A career federal prosecutor, Bogden was so square he squeaked. Despite the numerous constitutional concerns over the Patriot Act's use, in a post-9/11 world Ashcroft received rousing support from his troops in the Southern Nevada office.

"You are the doers," Ashcroft said. "You are the achievers. You are the soldiers ... on the ground and in the trenches ... who put your lives on the line to defend life and liberty. Your spirit is the heroic spirit we saw on September 11th, when New York's finest and New York's bravest ran up the stairs of the World Trade Center while others were running down the stairs."

Bogden appeared so devoted to the prevailing cause, in fact, that civil libertarians questioned his office's use of the Patriot Act to retrieve bank documents in the FBI's public corruption investigation of members of the Clark County Commission. It was believed then to be an unprecedented use of an act touted as essential to fighting the war on terrorism.

Ridiculed by some, Bogden took one for the team as his office moved methodically, if not always successfully, to prosecute corrupt politicians, warring bikers, drug traffickers, topless bar wiseguys and criminals of every stripe.

During his five-year tenure, which ended last week after his unceremonious sacking by the Department of Justice, some colleagues questioned his decisions, but no one questioned his competence. He was a professional, a public servant in the best sense of the words.

Now the 51-year-old Bogden is one of a half dozen terminated U.S. attorneys from around the West in what stacks up as a nakedly political and brazenly hypocritical move by the Bush administration and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. What some critics recently called a glorified attempt at GOP résumé-building by the administration has backfired into one of the most embarrassing moments in recent Department of Justice history.

Those looking for a good reason for Bogden's ouster won't find one. In fact, his office is credited with taking big risks by pursuing public corruption cases -- worthy work that in Southern Nevada's recent past often resulted in the vicious lambasting of federal prosecutors and FBI agents.

Ironically, a provision of the Patriot Act allows Gonzales to easily replace U.S. attorneys who are nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate.

Those loyal soldiers put their careers on the line. Now they have been reminded that, beyond all the impassioned rhetoric and all the talk about making the world a safer place, there's someone above them itching to play politics.

They are the doers, the achievers, the soldiers.

And they are expendable.

I caught up with Bogden last week as he packed his office. Although he chose his words carefully, there's no question he was stinging from the insult after spending more than five years piling up convictions despite substantial staffing shortages.

"I've had my hands full," Bogden said. "It has been a 24-7 job. You fight the good fight. We've been able to at least get Washington to recognize our need for more resources."

Even as he cleared off his desk, he was left wondering why he'd been targeted for termination.

"I've never been told a reason why, and I guess that's one of those things that's hardest to deal with," Bogden said. "It would be nice to get an answer. ... I'd be a liar if I tell you it hasn't been an emotional time."

Now Bogden's capable assistant, Steven Myhre, will fill in as the acting U.S. attorney in an office obviously in turmoil.

On that August morning in 2003, Ashcroft invoked dramatic images of Sept. 11 and said, "It has transformed the mission of the Justice Department."

Was this what he had in mind?

The terminations also make a liar out of Gonzales when he talks about how "our commitment to the rule of law allows ordinary citizens to rely on and expect ... honesty of government officials."

What could be less honest than playing politics with top federal prosecutors?

John L. Smith's column appears Sunday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday. E-mail him at Smith@reviewjournal.com or call 383-0295.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Doubts Rise As States Hold Sex Offenders After Prison Terms (NYT)

By Monica Davey, Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

The decision by New York to confine sex offenders beyond their prison terms places the state at the forefront of a growing national movement that is popular with politicians and voters. But such programs have almost never met a stated purpose of treating the worst criminals until they no longer pose a threat.

About 2,700 pedophiles, rapists and other sexual offenders are already being held indefinitely, mostly in special treatment centers, under so-called civil commitment programs in 19 states, which on average cost taxpayers four times more than keeping the offenders in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0139802

In announcing a deal with legislative leaders on Thursday, Gov. Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, suggested that New York's proposed civil commitment law would "become a national model" and go well beyond confining the most violent predators to also include mental health treatment and intensive supervised release for offenders.

"No one has a bill like this, nobody," said State Senator Dale M. Volker, a Republican from western New York and a leading proponent in the Legislature of civil confinement.

But in state after state, such expectations have fallen short. The United States Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of the laws in part because their aim is to furnish treatment if possible, not punish someone twice for the same crime. Yet only a small fraction of committed offenders have ever completed treatment to the point where they could be released free and clear.

Leroy Hendricks, a convicted child molester in Kansas, finished his prison term 13 years ago, but he remains locked up at a cost to taxpayers in that state of $185,000 a year — more than eight times the cost of keeping someone in prison there.

Mr. Hendricks, who is 72 and unsuccessfully challenged his confinement in the Supreme Court, spends most days in a wheelchair or leaning on a cane, because of diabetes, circulation ailments and the effects of a stroke. He may not live long enough to "graduate" from treatment.

Few ever make such progress: Nationwide, of the 250 offenders released unconditionally since the first law was passed in 1990, about half of them were let go on legal or technical grounds unrelated to treatment.

Still, political leaders, like those in New York, are vastly expanding such programs to keep large numbers of rapists and pedophiles off the streets after their prison terms in a response to public fury over grisly sex crimes.

In Coalinga, Calif., a $388 million facility will allow the state to greatly expand the offenders it holds to 1,500. Florida, Minnesota, Nebraska, Virginia and Wisconsin are also adding beds.

At the federal level, President Bush has signed a law offering money to states that commit sex offenders beyond their prison terms, and the Justice Department is creating a civil commitment program for federal prisoners.

Even with the enthusiasm among politicians, an examination by The New York Times of the existing programs found they have failed in a number of areas:

¶Sex offenders selected for commitment are not always the most violent; some exhibitionists are chosen, for example, while rapists are passed over. And some are past the age at which some scientists consider them most dangerous. In Wisconsin, a 102-year-old who wears a sport coat to dinner cannot participate in treatment because of memory lapses and poor hearing.

¶The treatment regimens are expensive and largely unproven, and there is no way to compel patients to participate. Many simply do not show up for sessions on their lawyers' advice — treatment often requires them to recount crimes, even those not known to law enforcement — and spend their time instead gardening, watching television or playing video games.

¶The cost of the programs is virtually unchecked and growing, with states spending nearly $450 million on them this year. The annual price of housing a committed sex offender averages more than $100,000, compared with about $26,000 a year for keeping someone in prison, because of the higher costs for programs, treatment and supervised freedoms.

¶Unlike prisons and other institutions, civil commitment centers receive little standard, independent oversight or monitoring; sex among offenders is sometimes rampant, and, in at least one facility, sex has been reported between offenders and staff members.

¶Successful treatment is often not a factor in determining the relatively few offenders who are released; in Iowa, of the nine men let go unconditionally, none had completed treatment or earned the center's recommendation for release.

¶Few states have figured out what to do when they do have graduates ready for supervised release. In California, the state made 269 attempts to find a home for one released pedophile. In Milwaukee, the authorities started searching in 2003 for a neighborhood for a 77-year-old offender, but have yet to find one.

Supporters of the laws offer no apologies for their shortcomings, insisting that the money is well spent. Born out of the anguish that followed a handful of high-profile sex crimes in the 1980s, the laws are proven and potent vote-getters that have withstood constitutional challenges.

"There has to be a process in place that prevents someone from rejoining society if they're still dangerous," said Jeffrey Klein, a Democratic member of the New York State Senate who has pushed for civil confinement there.

DOJ_NMG_0139803

Martin Andrews, 47, of Woodbridge, Va., who was abducted, buried in a box and repeatedly sexually assaulted for a week when he was 13, also supports the laws.

"If they can't control themselves," Mr. Andrews said, "we need to do it for them."

But the myriad problems have concerned some advocates for victims of sexual abuse, who suggest the money is being wasted and that other options for dealing with dangerous sex offenders — such as giving them longer prison terms, preventing sentencing deals with prosecutors and mandating treatment during incarceration — would be more effective.

"Civil commitment is a huge, huge assignment of resources," said Anne Liske, the former executive director of the New York State Coalition Against Sexual Assault, a victims' advocacy group. "This wholesale warehousing — without using the proper assessment tools and with throwing treatment in when they are not people who can be treated — has already proven not to be working, so why would we do it more?"

A Series of Convictions

Leroy Hendricks was a likely candidate for commitment as he prepared to leave a Kansas prison in 1994.

Mr. Hendricks's most recent crime, for which he had been convicted a decade earlier, had been "indecent liberties" with two 13-year-old boys in an electronics shop where he worked. All told, his convictions left a painful trail reaching back to 1955: exposing himself to young girls; molesting 7- and 8-year-old boys at a carnival where he was the ride foreman; molesting a 7-year-old girl; playing strip poker with a 14-year-old girl; preying on his own family members, including a boy with cerebral palsy.

Like Mr. Hendricks was, thousands of soon-to-be-released prisoners are screened for commitment each year by state corrections departments, prosecutors and panels. The process varies widely from state to state, as do standards for the evaluators, but in most states, those recommended for commitment have trials before judges or juries.

Mr. Hendricks may have sealed his own fate when he testified in 1994 that he could not "control the urge" to molest when he got "stressed out." He said his mother, Violet, had wanted a girl when he was born and had dressed him as one when he was growing up.

"I sure don't want to hurt anybody again," he told the court, but then conceded that he could not ensure the safety of children in his presence. "The only way to guarantee that is to die," he said.

More often, these cases come down to contentious duels between psychologists over how best to analyze an offender's history and likelihood of repeating crimes. In most states, commitment is for an indefinite period, but offenders are allowed to have their cases reviewed by a court periodically.

The results of the screening process are inconsistent. Some offenders are passed up for civil confinement, only to commit vicious crimes again; others' physical ailments alone make them unlikely repeat predators.

Even though Minnesota prison officials had classified Alfonso Rodriguez Jr., a convicted rapist, in a category of sex offenders most at risk to commit more crimes, Mr. Rodriguez went home when his term ended in May 2003. That November, he kidnapped and killed Dru Sjodin, a North Dakota college student who was beaten and raped.

Likewise, Jerry Buck Inman was charged with raping and strangling a college student in South Carolina last June, nine months after his release from a Florida prison after serving 17 years for rape and other crimes. The authorities in Florida looked at his records but decided not to seek commitment.

Meanwhile, some prosecutors seek commitment for others convicted of noncontact crimes like public exposure. In Florida, prosecutors tried unsuccessfully to civilly commit a man who was imprisoned for driving drunk even though his last sex arrest was decades earlier.

"The population that is being detained is a very, very mixed group," said Richard Wollert, a psychologist in Portland, Ore., who evaluates civilly committed offenders. "There are cases that are appalling in terms of being kept in custody at the taxpayers' expense when there are probably alternative placements for them."

Predicting who is likely to commit future sex crimes has become more of a science over the last decade, but many still find the methods questionable.

Actuarial formulas — akin to the tables used for life insurance — play a central role in deciding who is dangerous enough to be committed. They calculate someone's risk of offending again by looking at factors such as the number of prior sex offenses and the sex of the victims. Men with male victims are graded as higher risk, for example, because statistics show they are more often repeat offenders.

DOJ_NMG_0139804

"The danger is that these numbers will blind people," said Eric Janus, a professor at William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul who has challenged Minnesota's civil commitment law in court.

Politics and emotion also factor heavily into who gets committed, with decisions made by elected judges or juries who may be more affected by the raw facts of someone's offense history or the public spectacle over their crimes than the dry science of risk prediction.

"It's so emotional for them," said Stephen Watson, an assistant public defender who represented an offender in Florida. "They don't even want to hear the research."

New Laws Follow Publicized Cases

Earlier in the 20th century, many states had sexual psychopath laws that allowed them to hospitalize offenders deemed too sick for prison. But by the 1980s most such laws had been repealed or fallen into disuse.

But a handful of horrific and highly publicized cases in the 1980s and '90s spurred lawmakers to act again. Washington State adopted the first civil commitment law in 1990 after men with predatory histories killed a young woman in Seattle and sexually mutilated a boy in Tacoma.

After state courts upheld Washington's law, Kansas, Minnesota and Wisconsin passed versions in 1994, followed by California in 1996.

Then, in a 5-to-4 decision in 1997, the United States Supreme Court found civil commitment to be constitutional in Kansas v. Hendricks, the same Mr. Hendricks still confined in Kansas.

In the ruling, the justices found that a "mental abnormality" like pedophilia was enough to meet a standard to qualify someone for commitment, not the different standard of "mental illness" that had been traditionally used. The court also rejected the notion that civil commitment amounted to double jeopardy (a second criminal punishment for a single crime) or an ex post facto law (a new punishment for a past crime), noting that Kansas's statute was not meant to punish committed men but, like other acceptable civil commitment statutes, intended "both to incapacitate and to treat" them therapeutically.

"We have never held that the Constitution prevents a state from civilly detaining those for whom no treatment is available, but who nevertheless pose a danger to others," Justice Clarence Thomas wrote for the majority, later adding, "By furnishing such treatment, the Kansas Legislature has indicated that treatment, if possible, is at least an ancillary goal of the act, which easily satisfies any test for determining that the act is not punitive."

Since then, state officials, civil liberties advocates and lawyers have wrestled with exactly what that treatment requirement means.

"There's no question about it," Professor Janus of William Mitchell College said, "it's a very murky area of the law."

Since the Hendricks ruling, the courts have indicated that states have "wide latitude" when it comes to treatment for the civilly confined, meaning that unsuccessful treatment alone or an untreatable patient would not be enough to undo the laws.

In 2001, the Supreme Court, in Seling v. Young, decided the case of Andre Brigham Young, a committed man in Washington State who argued that the conditions he was being held under were so punitive and the treatment so inadequate as to amount to a second criminal sentence. The court ruled against Mr. Young.

A year later, in 2002, the Supreme Court made clear the limits of who may be committed by states, saying the authorities must prove not just that an offender is still dangerous and likely to commit more crimes but also that he or she has a "serious difficulty in controlling behavior."

Some civil libertarians and prisoner advocates, who still object to the laws, have not given up on finding a challenge that the Supreme Court might view favorably. Despite the court rulings, these groups insist civil commitment amounts to a second sentence for a crime.

Even the look of commitment centers reflects the dichotomy at the core of their stated reason for being — to lock away dangerous men (only three women are civilly committed) but also to treat them.

Most of the centers tend to look and feel like prisons, with clanking double doors, guard stations, fluorescent lighting, cinder-block walls, overcrowded conditions and tall fences with razor wire around the perimeters.

DOJ_NMG_0139805

Bedroom doors are often locked at night, and mail is searched by the staff for pornography or retail catalogs with pictures of women or children. Most states put their centers in isolated areas. Washington State's is on an island three miles offshore in Puget Sound.

Yet soothing artwork hangs at some centers, and cheerful fliers announce movie nights and other activities. The residents can wander the grounds and often spend their time as they please in an effort to encourage their cooperation, including sunbathing in courtyards and sometimes even ordering pizza for delivery. The new center in California will have a 20,000-book library, badminton courts and room for music and art therapy.

Diseases like hepatitis and diabetes are common among the committed, and severe mental illness — beyond the mental "abnormalities" described by the Supreme Court — a scourge. A survey in 2002 found that 12 percent of committed sex offenders suffered from serious psychiatric problems like schizophrenia and bipolar disorder.

Most severely mentally ill men cannot participate in sex offender treatment and receive few services besides medication. Verwayne Alexander, a self-described paranoid schizophrenic who has been detained at the Florida Civil Commitment Center since 2003, has sliced himself so many times with razor blades that a guard often watches him around the clock, lawyers said. Mr. Alexander has sought unsuccessfully to be moved to a psychiatric hospital.

Those who choose to participate in sex offender treatment spend an average of less than 10 hours a week doing so, but the hours differ vastly from state to state. The structure of therapy, too, varies widely, a reflection, perhaps, of the central question still looming in the field: Can treatment ever really work for these offenders?

Admitting to previous crimes is a crucial piece of a broad band of treatment, known as relapse prevention, that is used in at least 15 states and has been the most widely accepted model for about 20 years.

Some of the institutions, too, devote time to other therapies and activities that seem to have little bearing on sexual offending. In Pennsylvania, young residents take classes to improve their health and social habits called "Athlete's Foot," "Lactose Intolerance," "Male Pattern Baldness," "Flatulence" and "Proper Table Manners."

In California, they can join a Brazilian drum ensemble or classes like "Anger Management Through Art Therapy" and "Interpersonal Skills Through Mural Making."

But many of those committed get no treatment at all for sex offending, mainly by their own choice. In California, three-quarters of civilly committed sex offenders do not attend therapy. Many say their lawyers tell them to avoid it because admission of past misdeeds during therapy could make getting out impossible, or worse, lead to new criminal charges.

For those who decline treatment — sometimes including hundreds of "detainees" awaiting commitment trials — boredom, resentment and hostility to those in treatment lead to trouble. Some sneak in drugs, alcohol and cellphones, sometimes with the help of staff members, or beat up other residents, sometimes coercing them into having sex.

"There's rampant sexuality going on in there," said Natalie Novick Brown, a psychologist who has evaluated 250 men at Florida's center.

The people who run civil commitment centers say that a constant, nagging question hangs over them: How to keep order while not treating argumentative, sometimes violent offenders like prisoners? The low-level staff members are not prison guards and tend to be poorly educated, trained and paid. Their job titles — in Illinois, security therapy aide — reflect the awkward balance they must achieve between security and therapy.

Because civil commitment centers are neither prisons nor traditional mental health programs, no specialized oversight body exists. None has been created, in part because its base of financial support, the 19 civil commitment programs around the country, would be too small, several experts who study the programs said. But the need, they said, is urgent.

"They ought to be reviewed by an independent entity with the highest possible standards," said Dr. Fred Berlin, founder of the Johns Hopkins Sexual Disorders Clinic in Baltimore.

Few Signs of Progress

Around the country, relatively few committed sex offenders finish treatment and are released.

"Every year I go to his hearing, and every year there's no progress in his case," said Armand R. Cingolani III, a lawyer with a client in Pennsylvania who was committed in 2004 after being adjudicated as a juvenile for sexual assault on two different minors. "It doesn't seem that anyone gets better."

DOJ_NMG_0139806

Nearly 3,000 sex offenders have been committed since the first law passed in 1990. In 18 of the 19 states, about 50 have been released completely from commitment because clinicians or state-appointed evaluators deemed them ready. Some 115 other people have been sent home because of legal technicalities, court rulings, terminal illness or old age.

In discharging offenders, Arizona, the remaining state, has been the exception. That state has fully discharged 81 people; there, the facility's director said records were not available to indicate the reason for those discharges.

An additional 189 people have been released with supervision or conditions (excluding Texas, where there is no commitment center and those committed are treated only as outpatients). And an additional 68 (including 58 in Arizona) are in a higher, "transitional" phase of the program, but still technically committed and often living on state land.

The backlogs have led to an aging population. Inside many facilities, wheelchairs, walkers, high blood pressure and senility are increasingly expensive concerns. Florida's center filled 229 prescriptions for arthritis medication one recent month, and 300 for blood pressure and other heart problems.

More than 400 of the men in civil commitment are 60 or older, and a number of studies indicate a significant drop in the recidivism rate for this group, many of whom have health problems after years in prison. David Thornton, treatment director of Wisconsin's center and an expert on recidivism rates, said the decline was increasingly well-documented.

The growth of the committed population has become a political quagmire. No legislator wants to insist on the release of sex offenders, but few are able to swallow the mounting costs of civil commitment. The costs of aging and sick offenders, such as Mr. Hendricks in Kansas, are especially high in part because of their special needs and physical ailments.

From 2001 to 2005, the price of civil commitment in Kansas leapt to nearly $6.9 million from $1.2 million, a state audit there found. "Unless Kansas is willing to accept a higher level of risk and release more sexual predators from the program," the audit said, "few options exist to curb the growth of the program."

But as more states consider granting some offenders supervised release, the cost is turning out to be nearly as prohibitive.

For $1.7 million, Washington converted a warehouse in Seattle into a home for men on conditional release. It has 26 cameras monitoring residents, a dozen workers, a surveillance booth overseeing the living area and a 1,700-pound magnetic door.

Two men live there so far.

With the logjams and frustrations mounting, many states have lengthened prison sentences for sex offenders. Virginia last year increased the minimum sentence for certain sexual acts against children to 25 years, from 10, though it also sharply expanded the number of crimes that qualify an offender for civil commitment.

Ida Ballasiotes, whose daughter's rape and murder in 1988 helped spur the first civil commitment law, in Washington State, said that no sexual predator should walk free and that longer prison sentences should "absolutely" be considered.

"I don't believe they can be treated, period," Ms. Ballasiotes said.

After Release, Objections

Even for those sex offenders considered safe enough to be released, going home is no simple process. Kansas authorities decided two years ago that Mr. Hendricks, who was the first person that state committed under its law and who after a decade had progressed to one of the highest phases of treatment, should be moved from Larned State Hospital to a group home in a community where he would be watched around the clock.

Mr. Hendricks would not be allowed onto the home's porch or patio without an escort, according to court documents. Besides, his medical problems, including poor hearing and eyesight, meant he could not walk down the 40-yard gravel driveway outside the house without falling, the documents said.

But as with many men with his history, the community balked. In California, so many towns object to men leaving civil commitment that some of those released have to live in trailers outside prisons.

"You can't just sneak them in," said John Rodriguez, a recently retired deputy director in the California Department of Mental Health. "You've got hearings, the court announces it, it's all over the press."

In Mr. Hendricks's case, residents of Lawrence, where he was initially to be moved, collected petitions. "You can tell me that he's old, but as long as he can move his hands and his arms, he can hurt another child," said Missi Pfeifer, 37, a mother of three who led the petition drive with her two sisters and mother.

DOJ_NMG_0139807

Then officials in Leavenworth County, picked as an alternative, said the choice violated county zoning laws. Mr. Hendricks lasted two days there, in a house off a road not far from a pasture of horses, before a judge ordered him removed.

State officials said they had no choice but to move Mr. Hendricks back to a facility on the grounds of a different state hospital, where he still is.

Through a spokeswoman for the state Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, Mr. Hendricks declined to speak to The New York Times.

Two years ago, he told The Lawrence Journal-World that he would be living in a group home "if somebody hadn't opened their damn mouth," adding, "I'm stuck here till something happens, and I don't know when that will be."

Crime's 'Mr. Untouchable' Emerges From Shadows (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

The 74-year-old man who used to be Leroy Nicholas Barnes, owner of 60 pairs of custom-made shoes, 27 full-length leather coats and more than one Mercedes-Benz, wears baggy Lee dungarees these days and drives to work in a used car he bought five years ago.

With his slight limp and mostly bald pate, he seems the antithesis of his former persona as Mr. Untouchable, the dashing Harlem heroin dealer who posed 30 years ago on a magazine cover in a blue denim suit and a red, white and blue tie.

Mr. Barnes's posture of smug invulnerability so affronted President Jimmy Carter that he ordered his attorney general to, as they say, prosecute Mr. Barnes to the fullest extent of the law.

The Justice Department did just that. And in 1977, Mr. Barnes — a former addict with a junior high education who made a fortune flooding black neighborhoods with heroin and swaggered around as an invincible outlaw — was sentenced to life in prison without parole.

"He was the No. 1; he had charisma," said Sterling Johnson Jr., a federal judge and former special narcotics prosecutor in New York City. "Have you been in the presence of Bill Clinton when he walks down the street? That was Nicky Barnes."

While Mr. Barnes, widely known as Nicky, languished behind bars, though, his former cronies, his wife and his girlfriends began cavorting, he said, squandering the criminal enterprise that had made them all millionaires. So much for honor among thieves. Mr. Barnes felt betrayed.

"They had a sleeping lion, a caged lion," he recalled, "and they woke him up." And so Mr. Barnes roared, so ferocious a government witness that scores of drug dealers were convicted. He was released into the federal witness protection program in 1998.

And then he disappeared.

Years ago, a former associate predicted how difficult it would be for Mr. Barnes to adjust to a life of anonymity if he ever turned informer and was granted a fresh identity.

"If he runs a Laundromat in Dubuque or a grocery store in Slippery Rock, that's one thing," the associate said. "But the man has a tremendous amount of charisma and intelligence. I don't think he's going to be innocuous anywhere."

For nearly a decade, though, Mr. Barnes says, he has managed to seamlessly insinuate himself into mainstream America, this time untouchable by those he incriminated and the friends and families of foes he murdered.

"A lot of people think I'm dead," he says. "The anonymity that cloaks middle America is the life I'm comfortable with, and what I want to be."

Last weekend, though, Mr. Barnes surfaced briefly, and pseudonymously, to promote a new book about his old life in the feral 1970s, "Mr. Untouchable," written with Tom Folsom. This summer, he will appear in a documentary with the same name and later this year a movie, "American Gangster," is to be released. It stars Cuba Gooding Jr. as Mr. Barnes, but, to his exasperation, focuses on his chief rival in Harlem's heroin trade, Frank Lucas.

The dapper Nicky Barnes that audiences will see bears little resemblance to the man he says he has become, a grandfather who puts in solid 40-hour weeks at an undisclosed job, who lives in a white neighborhood in an undisclosed state, and who matter-of-factly takes home doggie bags from restaurants.

DOJ_NMG_0139808

"Nicky Barnes is not around anymore," he said. "Nicky Barnes's lifestyle and his value system is extinct. I left Nicky Barnes behind."

Money is a common denominator between his lives past and present. Once he made so much that he worried about how to dispose of it. Now, he says he needs more to survive.

"I live within my paycheck," he said. "I want to get up every day and get in the car and go to work and be a respected member of my community. And I am respected. I know I am. I'm not looking in the rear view mirror to see if anyone is tailing me anymore. I don't turn on the blender when I'm at home so I can talk. That is not a part of my life. Sure, I'd love to have more money, but I am not willing to do anything but go to my job to get it."

Except sell some of the secrets of his old life.

He agreed to be interviewed, but not photographed, by The New York Times, as he was for its earlier magazine cover, somewhere in middle America. He would not divulge much about his new identity.

His mission, he insisted, was not some late-life effort to stroke his ego, seek vindication or arrange redemption. He just wants to make a buck off his autobiography.

"Ego? That's not what I need, not with gas at $3," he said. "I need bank, and this is my only way to get it."

The millions he made and squandered, he said, are gone.

"I miss it," he said. "There was glamour, money, influence, attractive women. I didn't have any financial concerns, and I do have them now. I'm concerned about being able to retire at some point comfortably. That's my principal concern."

He said he received no subsidy from the government for his cooperation. (His profits from the book might yet be diverted to his victims under the Son of Sam law in New York.)

Mr. Barnes is still on probation, which means he has to submit to a monthly urine test for drugs. He must regularly show his pay stubs to federal marshals and account for any expense over $500.

A former altar boy, he converted to Islam in prison. There he earned a bachelor's degree and taught fellow inmates math in a language they could understand: "Suppose you stick up someone and get away with X..." Nowadays, he doesn't believe in much, he says, but neither drinks nor smokes and plays by the government's rules.

"I look over my shoulder," he said. "I worry. I want to fly under the radar."

He lives in a middle-class neighborhood. So many of his neighbors are white that Mr. Barnes, who has not undergone plastic surgery, did not worry they would be watching when his criminal career was profiled recently on Black Entertainment Television.

"Everybody gets up, gets in their cars and goes to work," he said of his neighbors. "There's nobody with 20 pounds of heroin in their car."

He watches basketball on television and loved "Little Miss Sunshine." He has started writing rap lyrics and looks forward to spending time with his grandchildren. He can coolly recount drug deals with the Mafia and what he says were police payoffs.

But raise the right subject and, in a flash, Mr. Barnes can rip off the mask of frumpy respectability and transmogrify into a spitting, expletive-spewing image of the old days. Ask him, for example, whether he was ever framed by law enforcement.

"This case right here! This case right here!" he explodes. "The Constitution doesn't allow prosecutors to convict people because they're doing something morally wrong. Yeah, I was a drug dealer and I was doing everything they said I was doing. But they didn't catch me at it. I'm not saying I was innocent. I'm saying with all I was doing they could not get a conviction without a contrivance."

Mr. Barnes said federal agents eavesdropping on his associates had mistakenly transcribed "payroll" as "kilo."

He remains furious that while he was imprisoned some of his former confederates consorted with his wife and girlfriends. But hadn't he been a womanizer himself?

"The issue was the bond that we had among us," he replied. "Don't evaluate my moral character and start splitting eyelashes."

His autobiography is dedicated to Guy Fisher, a former associate serving a life sentence in federal prison, with this unambiguous message: "When you finish the last page, I want you to look up, see where I put you and ask yourself, was it worth it? Ask yourself that every day until you die."

DOJ_NMG_0139809

Mr. Barnes's story, indeed, is much more about revenge than redemption. He is a captivating conversationalist, but not a particularly sympathetic character. He unabashedly, though not necessarily proudly, admits to destroying lives, peddling heroin, committing murder, contributing to police corruption and informing on his confederates.

He was doomed to die in prison until he agreed to cooperate. After that, Rudolph W. Giuliani, a former United States attorney, was among those who intervened to get him out of prison and into witness protection.

Is there anything worse than being an informer?

"Being in prison for the rest of your life," Mr. Barnes said sharply. "I'd rather be out as a witness than be in there and what they characterize as a stand-up guy."

"I'm out," he said. "They're in."

In the new documentary, one former associate, Frank James, urges Mr. Barnes to deliver a positive message to black youth and to admit that what he did was wrong. "Frank is right," Mr. Barnes said. "I knew it was wrong then. I did it for money."

He said he opposed the legalization of drugs, not because that would be bad for business, but rather because making them readily available would kill more blacks. "It would increase the number of addicts in the inner-city community," he said.

He was matter of fact, though, in discussing how he would react if someone sold his family drugs. "It's not that person's fault," Mr. Barnes said. "Let's say I launched a crusade and killed 10 drug dealers. The user would find an 11th."

Mr. Barnes said his two daughters, who were raised in foster care after he was imprisoned, knew about his former life. His grandchildren do not.

A female friend doesn't know about his past either. "I don't think I could tell her, she wouldn't understand," he said. "That's how I know it won't be a long-term thing. For it to be a long-term thing, I think I would have to be able to tell her the truth about my past, and I can't."

After dinner in a crowded restaurant, it was time for Mr. Barnes to return to his life of mundane routines and aging secrets. He politely asked the waitress to pack up his leftover grilled salmon. She handed him a foam container.

"In the old days," he acknowledged, "I would've been embarrassed."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI To Look At Deaths From Jim Crow Era (RNO)

By Mandy Locke, Staff Writer

Raleigh News & Observer, March 4, 2007

Agents will peer into past for clues in possible 'racially motivated' killings

Federal Bureau of Investigation agents received a tall order last week when they were asked to take a close look at the deaths of three North Carolina men a half century ago.

The names of three men who died during the height of the civil rights era landed on the desks of field agents in Charlotte last week as federal Justice Department officials promised to crack open a batch of cold cases flagged by the Southern Poverty Law Center in Alabama.

The center has collected information since the late 1980s on what it feared were "racially motivated" homicides that were never resolved, said Andrew Blejwas, the center's communications coordinator.

Ken Lucas, spokesman for the FBI in Charlotte, said agents will scratch at the three cases, hoping to turn up evidence that allows them to prosecute after these many years. It's not clear how much the cases were investigated at the time, if at all.

In Shelby, many older black residents still remember Dr. George Singleton, who was killed in an explosion and fire in his office in 1957.

Details are skimpy for the other two cases. Both men -- William Dallas Owens of New Bern and Clarence Cloninger of Gaston, outside Roanoke Rapids -- died while in jail.

Owens died of a skull fracture in 1957; Cloninger didn't get medical treatment after suffering a heart attack in 1960, his wife complained at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0139810

Lucas knows little more about the men. He said despite the media attention the cases received last week, it would take a solid piece of evidence for agents to launch a full-blown investigation of a 50-year-old death.

"The hype and hopes, we've got to stifle that a bit," Lucas said.

Owens, a disabled World War II veteran, died in jail after being arrested by New Bern police for being drunk. Details in his published obituary suggest Owens was white. His Army unit had not been integrated during World War II. The church and funeral home that handled his burial is traditionally white.

The Southern Poverty Law Center and FBI officials were not aware of Owens' race when he was added to the list.

They will take a look at his case anyway, Lucas said. Federal civil rights laws protect against abuses in local jails and prisons. Plus, it's possible Owens sympathized with blacks during the civil rights movement.

"Civil rights violations can extend beyond race lines," Lucas said.

Staff writer Mandy Locke can be reached at 829-8927 or mandy.locke@newsobserver.com.

Prosecutor Sees Virtue In Failure To Try Emmett Till Case (AP)

AP, March 4, 2007

Killing of boy promoted fight against segregation

Even as the U.S. Department of Justice was announcing a fresh look at unsolved civil-rights-era killings around the South, a Mississippi Delta prosecutor was closing the books on perhaps the most notorious of those cold cases - the brutal 1955 murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till.

To some, the Leflore County grand jury's decision not to return an indictment in the case after an exhaustive three-year federal investigation was a sign that not much has changed in Mississippi in the past 52 years.

But others, including the prosecutor herself, felt that it showed the opposite - a maturing of racial justice in this part of the South.

"It would have been very easy for that grand jury to have returned a true bill based solely on emotion and the rage they felt, and I commend them for not doing that," says Joyce Chiles, the black district attorney who directed the case in which the grand jury declined to charge Carolyn Bryant Donham, 73, the object of Till's infamous wolf whistle.

If the grand jurors had acted on the basis of hate, not evidence, Chiles says, that would have been like the Jim Crow justice of 1955.

When federal officials reopened the case in 2004, many had hopes that someone would at last be made to pay for killing the boy whose defiled, river-savaged face helped drive mass opposition to segregation.

The FBI determined that the statutes of limitations had run out on all possible federal crimes. The agency turned the file over to Chiles, with a recommendation that she take a close look at Donham. At the time, Roy Bryant had denied that his wife came along on Till's abduction.

Since 1989, officials in Mississippi and six other states had won convictions in nearly 25 civil-rights-era cases that most had considered stone cold.

Editorial: A Welcome Partnership To Right Old Injustices (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, March 4, 2007

Who holds the secrets to the killings?

Decades have passed, but the ghosts of Mississippi and the South demand justice. It is no small thing when federal officials stand up and vow to stay on the trail of murderers. Such a public commitment occurred Tuesday when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller linked forces with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Urban League and Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala.

They announced their commitment to solve racially motivated murders of the civil rights era, when some considered it open season on black people in the South. A year ago, the FBI began identifying hate-crime murders that occurred before 1969. The slayings weren't investigated or reported, or were misclassified as accidental deaths or disappearances.

DOJ_NMG_0139811

Civil rights groups have long wanted Washington's power circle to focus on the lynchings. At long last it has happened. Federal authorities will make about a dozen of 100 cold cases their priority for investigation and prosecution. They didn't disclose which ones.

Mueller noted that successful prosecutions of such cases since 2001 "have restored our hope and renewed our resolve." Those cases included the 1963 church bombing in Birmingham, Ala., that killed four young girls and the 1964 murders of Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney in Neshoba County, Miss.

With new forensic tools available and civil rights groups providing information, authorities should be equipped to right injustices. The passage of time has not erased the need for this country to stand up for its ideals and for the forgotten ones.

Primary On Mardi Gras Day Illegal? (MR)

By Dan Murtaugh, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), March 4, 2007

A presidential primary election on Fat Tuesday next year would most directly impact majority-black voting districts, possibly violating federal voting rights laws, according to local officials and lawyers.

"I really would be extremely surprised if the Justice Department would approve of a Feb. 5 presidential primary," said Beth Marietta Lyons, an attorney and a lobbyist for the city of Mobile and the Mobile County Probate Court.

The federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 stipulates that several states, including Alabama, cannot change voting procedures unless the U.S. Department of Justice determines that the change had no discriminatory purpose and no discriminatory effect.

Last year, Alabama's Legislature voted to move the state's presidential primary from early June to the first Tuesday in February in order to make the state a more enticing campaign stop for national politicians.

That created a conflict for 2008, as both the primary and Fat Tuesday are scheduled for Feb. 5.

Fat Tuesday parades run through three Mobile voting precincts, all of which are majority black, according to U.S. Census Bureau data for 2000:

Precinct 14, which votes at Bishop State Community College and includes land north of Beauregard Street and Martin Luther King Boulevard, has 5,360 residents, 5,266 of whom are black.

Precinct 16, which votes at the Springhill Avenue Recreation Center and includes the downtown loop and parts of Midtown, has 3,832 residents, 2,086 of whom are black.

Precinct 18, which votes at the Mobile Civic Center and includes the Down the Bay community, has 2,752 residents, 2,169 of whom were black.

While a Mardi Gras primary would affect all of Mobile County, voters in those three precincts would have the hardest time getting to their polling places, according to Probate Judge Don Davis.

He agreed with Lyons that the Justice Department might object if state lawmakers don't change the date. "That's a factor I would look at if I were in their position," Davis said.

More than 100,000 people crowd along the parade routes in downtown Mobile on Mardi Gras Day. Barricades line many streets, and parking spots -- especially free parking -- are practically nonexistent.

Local attorney Cecil Gardner, who recently won a voting rights lawsuit against Gov. Bob Riley over his appointment of Juan Chastang to the Mobile County Commission, said he is researching whether this change in the primaries would violate the law.

"If a citizen were prohibited from getting to the polls, it would certainly raise my interest," Gardner said.

But Brian Fair, a law professor at the University of Alabama, said the Justice Department has narrowed its interpretation of what falls under the auspices of the Voting Rights Act and probably would not buy the argument that a Mardi Gras primary would violate it.

"I don't think a failure to do anything will necessarily implicate the Voting Rights Act," he said.

No one contacted by the Press-Register said he or she would file a lawsuit based on the Voting Rights Act if legislators don't move the date of the primaries.

A number of legislators from Mobile County have said they're working to change the primary date.

DOJ_NMG_0139812

Davis said he's concerned that lawmakers from elsewhere might hesitate to reschedule the whole state's primary just to accommodate one county. "The feedback I'm getting from Montgomery is that there seems to be the attitude that Mobile needs to cancel Mardi Gras so we can have the election that day, that Mobile just needs to suck it up and cancel the parades," Davis said.

For that reason, lawmakers may be stuck between a rock and a MoonPie: If they move the primaries to an even earlier date, the national parties have said they will penalize Alabama by decreasing the state's number of nominating delegates. If lawmakers move the vote to a later date, they risk losing the national relevance they sought in the first place.

Twenty-one other states, including California and Florida, have primaries set on or before Feb. 5, according to the National Association of Secretaries of State.

Davis is pushing for a Jan. 30 primary date -- the Wednesday before Mardi Gras -- when usually there are no parades scheduled. The date might lose Alabama some delegates, but it would give the state greater visibility, Davis said.

Another option would be to let Mobile County vote on Jan. 30, along with any other county that wants to, then seal the ballots and count them on Feb. 5, when the rest of the state votes, Lyons said.

Fair said there are other options, such as keeping polls open in Mobile County for several days or encouraging voters in affected areas to fill out absentee ballots.

"There are a lot of things you can do, short of not participating," he said.

Whatever happens, it will be the last time Alabama will have to worry about such a conflict for the near future. Fat Tuesday won't fall on the first Tuesday of February again until 2046.

Investigations Multiplying In Juvenile Abuse Scandal (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

HOUSTON, March 3 — A sexual abuse scandal in the Texas juvenile justice system has state politics in an uproar, with accusations that damning reports were doctored and shelved and sexual predators in high positions were allowed to resign without facing charges.

Late Friday, Ronnie Earle, the district attorney of Travis County who has jurisdiction over Austin, the state capital, announced a criminal investigation into possible records tampering at the Texas Youth Commission.

And Gov. Rick Perry, pressed by angry legislators to put the commission into conservatorship, appointed a special master, Jay Kimbrough, a former deputy state attorney general and state director of homeland security, to lead an investigation into the agency and “reports of failures and wrongdoings.”

According to officials, at least 13 boys and girls were molested by staff members at two state schools run by the commission. Even before Mr. Earle and Mr. Perry took action on Friday, there were already inquiries under a previously appointed special prosecutor and legislative committees.

At a State Senate hearing in the capital Tuesday, parents complained of sexual abuse and other mistreatment of their children in state facilities.

“My son is home, but he is not the same since he was raped in the T.Y.C.,” said Mary Jane Martinez of San Antonio, who told the Senate Criminal Justice Committee that her 17-year-old son “is so ashamed of himself he built a wall.”

Ms. Martinez said her son refused to detail what happened to him at the Victory Field Correctional Academy in Vernon.

With the state’s Republican leadership under strong challenge, a high-level legislative audit committee called on Governor Perry on Friday to appoint a conservator to take over the commission, or, failing that, to send in state auditors to investigate how it was handling nearly 8,000 youthful felons, misdemeanants and parolees in 36 facilities.

One top Democratic lawmaker with bipartisan support said he would seek to introduce a bill on Monday ordering a takeover of the agency.

“The allegations of sick sexual abuse of troubled youths are so severe, the Legislature needs to bypass the bureaucracy and protect the victims and prevent more children from becoming victims,” said the lawmaker, Representative Jim Dunnam of Waco, leader of the House Democratic caucus.

DOJ_NMG_0139813

In recent days, top officials of the youth commission have resigned or been ousted. Many lawmakers — already furious with the governor for bypassing them last month on an order that sixth-grade girls be vaccinated against a sexually transmitted virus causing cancer — have criticized the commission as dysfunctional.

Officials who testified at the State Senate hearing said that the commission staff members trained for only 80 hours compared with 300 for adult criminal justice employees, and that last year the commission's staff turnover rate was 52 percent. There is only one staff member for each 18 juveniles ages 10-21.

"What scares me the most is what I don't know," Senator John H. Whitmire, the Houston Democrat heading the Criminal Justice Committee, told Neil Nichols, then the acting executive director, at the hearing this week.

Mr. Nichols, the longtime general counsel who took over last Friday upon the sudden retirement of the previous executive director, Dwight Harris, acknowledged that "T.Y.C. is in hard times," saying that some of the events "would be impossible to explain to a parent or family."

Mr. Nichols was among the officials replaced this week over the scandal.

The State Senate hearing drew anguished mothers like Katrina Cannon of Troy, near Waco, whose 17-year-old son is now at the McLennan County State Juvenile Correction Facility and who, she said, had once suffered an unexplained incident of rectal bleeding.

"I have asked him and he will not admit anything," Ms. Cannon said.

The revelations, disclosed in recent weeks by news organizations that had obtained long-secret reports by the youth commission and the Texas Rangers, have reverberated around the state.

Will Harrell, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas, which has investigated juvenile mistreatment allegations for years, said the juvenile justice system was overwhelmed and needed alternatives to incarceration, like probation programs.

The furor is centered on the commission's handling of allegations of sexual abuse by two former high-ranking administrators.

One, Ray Brookins, a security director at the San Saba State School in central Texas, was allowed to transfer to the West Texas State School in Pyote on Oct. 1, 2003, although a commission report compiled in 2005 said he had been disciplined for having adult pornography on his work computer and had been admonished for regularly taking students into his office alone at night with the blinds drawn.

The report was not made public until last month.

The superintendent at Pyote, Lemuel Harrison, said he not been told of Mr. Brookins's history. But the report criticized Mr. Harrison as having ignored repeated complaints from staff members that within days of arriving, Mr. Brookins began taking boys out of the dormitory at night for sexual encounters.

A caseworker later reported overhearing a boy telling his mother that Mr. Brookins had molested him in the dormitory.

When Mr. Harrison went on medical leave in October 2004, Mr. Brookins became acting superintendent and, the report said, "used his authority and powers of persuasion to keep his victims and West Texas State School staff from reporting his conduct."

Mr. Brookins, 41, who was said at the Senate hearing to be working now at a bar in Austin, could not be reached for comment. Two Austin phone listings in his name were out of service and the youth commission has no way to reach him, said a spokesman, Tim Savoy.

Two weeks after Mr. Brookins's arrival at Pyote, the West Texas State School hired a new principal, John Paul Hernandez. Mr. Hernandez, too, began taking boys out of the dormitory to private late night encounters, the report said.

The Texas Rangers later found that both men "engaged in sexual contact with several students." Federal prosecutors declined jurisdiction in the matter and the findings were referred to the Ward County district attorney, Randall W. Reynolds, who said this week that the case was still active, if delayed.

"Frankly I wish it had moved quicker," Mr. Reynolds said. Now it has been turned over to a special prosecutor.

DOJ_NMG_0139814

Mr. Savoy of the commission said Mr. Hernandez had “staff sexual contact” with two 17-year-olds and a 20-year-old, and that Mr. Brookins had sexual contact with an 18-year-old and committed “unprofessional conduct” involving other sex-related offenses with six youths 15 to 19.

Both men resigned without criminal charges in 2005. The commission’s executive director at the time, Mr. Harris, ordered his own report, which remained secret until last month when The Texas Observer and The Dallas Morning News obtained it and other records and revealed the abuse allegations.

Mr. Hernandez was later named principal of a charter school, the Richard Milburn Academy in Midland. The superintendent, Norman Hall, said that he had not been told of Mr. Hernandez’s history at his hiring and that he had now suspended him.

Mr. Hernandez, 41, reached by phone on Wednesday, denied the charges but said he was declining to comment further on the advice of his lawyer.

Mr. Harrison was later named the commission’s director of juvenile corrections in charge of several state schools but has now also been suspended, Mr. Savoy, the commission spokesman, said.

Pete C. Alfaro, the chairman of the youth commission board from 2004 until he was demoted by Mr. Perry and announced he would resign this week, said the first he knew of Mr. Harris’s 2005 report was from the recent news accounts.

Mr. Earle, the district attorney, said he was investigating an account in The Austin American-Statesman that even when the 2005 commission report was released last month, a section showing that high agency officials had been alerted to the abuse, but ignored it, had been deleted.

N.Y. Suburb Scraps Election After Suit (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, March 4, 2007

PORT CHESTER, N.Y. -- Officials in a suburban New York village will not appeal a federal judge's decision to temporarily block its upcoming election after federal officials said the voting method discriminates against Hispanics and violates the Voting Rights Act.

An appeal was "not an effective use of taxpayer dollars," Port Chester Mayor Gerald Logan said after a meeting Saturday with the village trustees.

Officials haven't yet decided whether to continue trying to preserve an at-large method of electing trustees that Justice Department lawyers say has kept Hispanics from gaining elected office.

The village is about 25 miles from New York City and is governed by a mayor and six trustees. It has used at-large elections since 1868. The village, with a population of about 28,000, is 43 percent Hispanic, according to the 2000 Census. The citizen voting-age population was 22 percent Hispanic, but no Hispanic has ever been elected as a trustee.

The village's planned March 20 election for two of the six seats on its Board of Trustees is canceled. The two trustees whose seats were up for election will continue on in the posts, village attorney Anthony Piscionere said.

U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson granted a preliminary injunction Friday stopping the trustees vote from taking place, saying the Justice Department was likely to prevail in its case against the village. The Justice Department wants to divide the village into six districts, including one in which a Hispanic-favored candidate would be more likely to win.

ANTITRUST:

Report: Private Equity Firm Blackstone Considering Chrysler Bid (AP)

AP, March 4, 2007

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. (AP) — Private equity firm Blackstone Group has emerged as a leading contender to buy DaimlerChrysler's (DCX) struggling Chrysler unit, according to a report published Saturday.

The Detroit News, citing people familiar with the Chrysler sale process that it didn't name, reported that Blackstone is moving forward with a detailed analysis of Chrysler's finances and operations with an eye toward making a formal bid.

DOJ_NMG_0139815

A message seeking comment was left Saturday with a spokesman for Chrysler, which has declined to comment about speculation about a possible sale.

John Ford, a spokesman for New York-based Blackstone, said Saturday that he was aware of the report but couldn't comment.

The development is the latest in a series of reports that have surfaced since DaimlerChrysler Chairman Dieter Zetsche said Feb. 14 that all options are on the table for the money-losing Chrysler business and he would not rule out a possible sale.

Among those that analysts say are exploring a purchase of the struggling company are General Motors plus four private equity firms, including Blackstone, Apollo Management, the Carlyle Group and Cerberus Capital Management.

Feds, State Probe TUSD Tech Mess (AZDS)

By George B. Sánchez, Arizona Daily Star

The Arizona Daily Star, March 4, 2007

District has lost out on millions for computer, phone upgrades

The Tucson Unified School District is being investigated by federal and state officials for wide-ranging problems in its technology department — and has lost multiple opportunities at tens of millions of dollars in federal aid as a result.

Authorities declined to discuss the investigations, but TUSD's problems are evident: Students have slow Web access on school computers, and the technology department is without a director or a coherent technology plan for the future. And — as long as the shadow of the investigations hangs over TUSD — there's little chance the district can obtain federal money to solve the problems.

"I don't think any of the turmoil is affecting students," TUSD Superintendent Roger Pfeuffer said. But he admitted TUSD's infrastructure and computer network need improvement, and the current problems could have big effects in the future. "The longer we put it off, the more it will affect students."

The turmoil began in 2004, when TUSD officials applied for federal funds to upgrade the district's computer network and phone system.

Not long afterward, employees in the technology department secretly alerted authorities, concerned that the millions of dollars in contracts would go to a small, local company instead of the major national corporations with which the district previously had contracted.

The employees also were concerned the company may have received special treatment because of a friendship between its president and TUSD's technology director.

Two years later, TUSD's Governing Board asked the Arizona Attorney General's Office to investigate the department, citing concerns of possible bid-rigging by a paid consultant.

Hundreds of pages of records obtained by the Arizona Daily Star, many through public records requests, along with dozens of interviews and months of investigation, paint a picture of a department in distress and under deep scrutiny.

Since federal funds for technology improvement — E-Rate funds — became available in 1998, TUSD has had problems obtaining them, and hasn't received any since 2002. In that time, more than $6.2 billion has been disbursed nationwide.

Despite the investigations, TUSD continues to apply for the federal funds — because there's no other single source with that much money to give.

State education officials say the investigations hurt TUSD's chances but that it's still possible the district could receive funds, as long as all application rules are followed.

"The 2007-2008 application from TUSD would get reviewed just like all the other applications submitted this year," wrote Cathy J. Poplin, director of educational technology for the Arizona Department of Education. "However, final approval will depend on where the investigation is at."

E-Rate protocol

In March 2004, two TUSD Technology and Telecommunication Services (TTS) employees independently called the federal whistle-blower hotline, concerned with how district officials planned to use the federal funds they were seeking.

The E-Rate funds are administered by the SEARCH

DOJ_NMG_0139816

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Federal Communications Commission and are designed to give discounts to schools and libraries for telecommunications and Internet access. Those that apply for funds must already have picked vendors to perform the services detailed in the application.

TUSD requested nearly $16 million in 2004 for 41 services, FCC records show.

Thirty-five of those service contracts — totaling more than $10 million — were awarded to NVision Networking Inc., an eight-person technology company in Tucson that also was TUSD's E-Rate consultant that year. Some TTS employees said the contracts are inappropriate given NVision's consulting role.

NVision had worked with TUSD in the past, employees and TUSD records said. In 2003, TUSD awarded NVision $2.5 million for E-Rate services, though the money was never received because the government denied TUSD funding that year.

However, TTS employees were concerned about possible preferential treatment of NVision because of the relationship between its president, Dan Meyer, and TUSD's TTS director, Guyton Campbell. Campbell quietly resigned from his $93,000-a-year job in January.

"NVision (was) allowed access to director, manager, and schools during E-Rate proceeding not provided to other vendors," states a TTS memo obtained by the Star. The unsigned memo contains a list of concerns submitted in May 2004 to Superintendent Pfeuffer and TUSD's governing board. "Password to restricted district data on the Schools and Library E-Rate proceeding was provided to one contractor, NVision."

An e-mail obtained by the Star shows then-TTS manager Mary Veres shared an internal password with Meyer and an NVision co-worker. In it, she invites them to "look at what I've done so far" and concludes: "Any and all advice would be appreciated."

Sharing the code with a potential vendor violates E-Rate protocol. The e-mail also indicates the contract was arranged before the federally imposed bidding period ended, which the FCC noted in its explanation of why TUSD was denied funding.

Fractured department

Most alarming to TTS employees was the relationship between Campbell and Meyer.

"I have been friends with Guyton for many years," Meyer said when contacted by the Star in late February.

Meyer said the two worked together, as vendor and school technology director, when Campbell worked at the Arizona State Schools for the Deaf and the Blind as well as the Sunnyside Unified School District. Before that, Meyer recalled, the two set up a computer lab for a University of Arizona satellite campus.

On Jan. 19, Campbell submitted a two-page resignation letter, obtained by the Star via a public-records request. He wrote he'd been "the subject of various investigations for alleged issues arising out of the performance of my defined job and performing tasks that were assigned to me by my superiors."

The Star made more than a dozen attempts to contact Campbell, at his home, through all listed phone numbers, via TUSD officials and neighbors, and even the real-estate agency where he now hangs his license. A certified letter with written questions was sent to his home as well. He didn't respond.

Campbell's resignation letter reads: "My employer is attempting to eliminate me as an employee" because Campbell had "apparently offended an 'outside force' that enjoys a particularly cozy and profitable financial relationship with the district."

He concluded: "It would appear justifiable that TUSD consider fair compensation for what has transpired. I will await your reply."

The letter never identifies the "outside force."

When Campbell arrived at TUSD in late 2003, he'd been lauded for his work. But suspicions also followed him.

While at Sunnyside, he received the Computerworld Smithsonian Award and was honored alongside Stanford University and Harvard University Medical Center.

He'd gone on to spend four years at the Schools for the Deaf and the Blind. But the same month he left ASDB, the school received a $3,000 check, described in records as a donation, from a Florida software company for furniture for ASDB's Information Technologies Department. Thirteen months later, on the advice of the state Attorney General's Office, ASDB returned the check, an ASDB board member says. It isn't clear, though, if Campbell knew about the money.

Visions of a wireless network

DOJ_NMG_0139817

Internal memos and a federal mediation report obtained by the Star show TUSD's TTS department became fractured under his leadership. Employees said Campbell didn't detail to them his vision for the network's future and they were concerned that his plan was financially irresponsible.

Campbell's vision was to scrap TUSD's current network and create a wireless network spanning the district's 250 square miles. The ambitious project would have cost more than $50 million, current and former TTS employees say.

Officials say the idea for a wireless computer network was approved by voters, as part of 2004's $250 million bond issue. About $8 million of that would have gone to the wireless computer network.

But Campbell needed more support, and administrators accuse him of staging a campaign to discredit the existing system. Last year, TUSD's governing board applied for E-Rate money because members were told public safety hinged on it.

Pfeuffer and board members were told by Campbell and an outside consultant that TUSD's 911 system was defective, and that if someone at a school called 911, emergency responders would arrive at TUSD's headquarters at 1010 E. 10th St.

"That isn't accurate," Pfeuffer said in January.

Though there were problems with the system that caused some emergency responders to head to TUSD headquarters, the problems were nowhere near the systemic breakdown Campbell and TUSD's 2006 E-Rate consultant described. That consultant's recommendations are being investigated by the Attorney General's Office, too.

Pfeuffer admits that along with TUSD's alleged 911 problem, administrators and TUSD's Governing Board were never apprised of the various options to upgrade TUSD computer network and phone system.

"There were people who thought it was probably advantageous to simply, and I say simply and relatively cheaply, upgrade our current phone system," he said. "There were others that said the future is not in that kind of phone system. The future is in Voice over Internet Protocol."

Voice over Internet Protocol means replacing phone lines with a Web-based service, and, in this case, according to TUSD records, a wireless network.

That's what Campbell recommended, Pfeuffer said.

Audit pushes policy changes

At least a dozen TUSD employees have been interviewed by federal and state investigators. TUSD has conducted three internal investigations. And an outside audit found problems with TTS procurement policies, including the fact that TUSD's purchasing department was out of the loop.

In December 2004, investigators for the U.S. SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Department of Justice's San Francisco office interviewed two TTS staffers.

"Some staff has spoken to federal officials," Pfeuffer said, but not for some time. "We know nothing about what's going on there."

Owen Clements, chief of special litigation for the city of San Francisco Attorney's Office, said that could be by design.

Though he's not connected to this case, his office was involved in a massive, nationwide E-Rate investigation that began in 2000. He said a federal statute called the False Claims Act lets anyone who discovers fraud involving federal funds file a civil complaint. The complaint is sealed during the investigation so the government can build its case and consider civil penalties or criminal charges.

Luke Macaulay, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's San Francisco office, declined to comment, and referred questions to Department of Justice's antitrust division in Washington, D.C. A spokeswoman there declined to comment as well.

Rudy Flores, TUSD's executive director of engineering and facilities, was interviewed under oath by the state Attorney General's Office in October. Flores was assistant director of TTS under Campbell from July 2005 to July 2006.

Though he said he'd twice been interviewed by investigators, he wouldn't disclose whether they were federal or state. "I'm not supposed to mention anything about any of that," he said.

Mary Veres, currently TUSD's interim-TTS director, also was interviewed. She also would not talk about the case.

When shown the e-mail in which she gave NVision internal passwords, she said: "I would love to discuss this with you because I think there's a lot of misinformation. But I don't feel like I should be doing it because the investigation is still going on."

DOJ_NMG_0139818

A 2005 audit of TUSD, by Heinfeld, Meech & Co., TUSD's auditors, found that the 2004 E-Rate application was handled by TTS, not TUSD's purchasing department, and, therefore, wasn't subject to proper oversight. The report also stated that TTS had few records of its 2004 E-Rate application.

The audit said the problems didn't merit notifying federal officials, but it recommended a significant policy change:

"All future request for proposals for E-rate services should be made through the Purchasing Department, where internal controls, purchasing procedures, and knowledge of applicable compliance requirements will help ensure all of the district's procurements are in compliance with the Arizona school district rules."

It could be months, if not years, before the federal and state investigations conclude.

The San Francisco City Attorney's Office took until 2004 to conclude its E-Rate investigation. In 2005, a federal grand jury returned a 22-count indictment against six companies and five people on charges of fraud, collusion, aiding and abetting and conspiracy. Two companies paid more than $20 million to settle the civil claims brought by the U.S. government.

"We've missed the boat"

Until contacted for this story, TUSD Governing Board member Judy Burns said she'd only heard rumors of a federal investigation. "The district is going to suffer and the students in class will suffer for not doing this in a legitimate, businesslike way," she said.

On Jan. 30, TUSD's governing board voted to apply for E-Rate funds for 2007. Absent from the meeting was Campbell, whose resignation had become official one week earlier. There was no public mention of his departure.

A new committee has been charged with writing a new technology plan for the district that likely will include various options to improve TUSD's network and phone system.

A plan that details technological improvements for teaching and classroom education does exist, but there's no plan for how TUSD will increase its bandwidth and provide classroom computers with the Web access expected of such a large district in the digital age.

In 2006, TUSD's governing board voted to apply for E-Rate funds with the caveat that the Attorney General's Office investigate whether procurement policies were followed. There were concerns about the consultant used that year, Jon Slaughter, and possible links to a vendor he'd recommended for a contract. At the time, Slaughter said his recommendations weren't influenced by any vendors, even though an ad for the company he recommended was on his Web site at the time.

Pfeuffer and the Governing Board expected a quick investigation. It's lasted more than a year.

In June, with no word from state investigators, TUSD withdrew its 2006 E-Rate application. Pfeuffer said district officials don't expect any 2006 funds.

"We've missed the boat here," Burns said. "We've missed many opportunities."

The Karmazin Way: Build It, Sell It, Run It, Repeat (NYT)

By Richard Siklos

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

MEL KARMAZIN could sell microwavable ice to Eskimos. He started his career in ad sales at WCBS radio in New York four decades ago, quickly proved himself to be a master closer, and has been peddling his wares ever since.

“Mel is the singular best salesman I have ever met in my life,” said Joel Hollander, the chief executive of CBS Radio, who spent much of his career working for Mr. Karmazin. “He’s very aggressive, to say the least.”

The capping moment of Mr. Karmazin’s radio career came in 1997, when he sold Infinity Broadcasting (now CBS Radio), a vast collection of stations he and partners had built, to what was then the broadcast company CBS Inc.

Though he had little experience in television, Mr. Karmazin’s hero status on Wall Street and his zeal for growth catapulted him into the chief executive’s chair at CBS after only a couple of years. A mere nine months later, he pulled off another coup and sold CBS to Viacom, on the condition that he would run the combined media conglomerate as its president.

The Karmazin rocket finally ran out of fuel in 2001, when Viacom’s chief executive and controlling shareholder, Sumner M. Redstone, lost confidence in Mr. Karmazin’s relentless focus on costs and quarter-to-quarter results, coupled with an unpardonable failure to invite the billionaire to lunch. (Mr. Redstone went a step further last year by sort of undoing the deal and splitting off a new CBS Corporation, which he also controls.)

Anyway, gazing at Mr. Karmazin's career, you start to get the picture behind what happens when you put him in the big chair: he is forever building and selling, even when it looks like he's buying. And so, two years after he became the chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, it should come as no shock that he has struck a deal to merge the company with its only direct rival, XM Satellite Radio.

Not coincidentally, if the deal goes through, he will again end up running the combined entity.

Last week, Mr. Karmazin took his campaign to win over lawmakers and regulators to Washington with his pitch that a single satellite radio company would mean more choice and lower prices for consumers — rather than create a foreboding monopoly, as his former chums in the terrestrial radio business contend.

Speaking before an antitrust task force of the House Judiciary Committee, Mr. Karmazin said he was shocked by the very idea that anyone would see a monopoly as the logical result of merging the only two satellite radio broadcasters. "There is no monopoly or duopoly," he told the hearing. "That's the most bizarre thing I have ever heard."

Mr. Karmazin's essential message is that satellite radio is competing with all forms of audio entertainment and information — from commercial radio to iPod jacks in cars to Internet radio and maybe even people humming as they walk down the street.

On Feb. 19, the day the merger was announced, Mr. Karmazin had a similar message for me: that it was wrong to compare his proposed deal with the merger of the direct broadcast satellite companies DirecTV and EchoStar, which regulators turned down in 2004. "The only thing that you could even think of as similar between those companies and us is that they both use satellites," he said. By Mr. Karmazin's reasoning, the television business has an entirely different structure.

Whether this is conviction or sophistry, it is very hard to throw Mr. Karmazin off his message, even when he seems to be contradicting himself.

Early in his tenure at CBS, for example, he was dismissive of the Internet as a business. But he quickly changed tack and did some clever deals in which the company traded ad space on its TV network to Web start-up companies for equity, which it cashed in on shrewdly during the stock market bubble a few years ago.

Similarly, the pre-Sirius Mel was a satellite-radio skeptic. He later argued that what changed his mind was the defection of Howard Stern, whose career he had nurtured, from CBS/Infinity to Sirius for an estimated $500 million pay package. Mr. Karmazin said the potential of having the controversial but popular Mr. Stern anchoring Sirius helped entice him out of a brief post-Viacom retirement to join the company.

Sirius has certainly blossomed since Mr. Karmazin came on board in November 2004: it had just under 800,000 subscribers then but has more than six million now.

After chalking up billions of dollars in losses since its inception in the early 1990s, the company will begin generating positive cash flow this year, Mr. Karmazin says, and he contends that Sirius does not need to merge with XM and its eight million customers to survive.

But the costs of acquiring and keeping customers remain daunting. And what tears him up inside, he said, is Sirius's stock price, which, at a closing price on Friday of $3.55, is 28 percent lower than the day before he joined the company. "It's been a great two years," he told me. "If there weren't a Quotron in my office, it would have been the perfect job for me." (A key to Mr. Karmazin's legendary salesmanship is that he can be quite funny.)

One of the messages that Mr. Karmazin brought to Washington is that a combined satellite broadcaster is better for choice — Mr. Stern and major sports leagues would ultimately be available to subscribers of both services rather than one or the other.

Among the biggest hurdles he and XM face is persuading the regulators that merging would be better for consumers than the satellite radio rivals' long-promised and long-delayed new receivers that would allow listeners to switch from one service to the other without having to pull one receiver out of their cars and install another.

As far as price is concerned, Mr. Karmazin made it plain to the House committee that he would be willing to agree to a price cap for the combined service to seal the deal. The pitch is that raising prices isn't really feasible anyway because most of what satellite radio is competing with out there is free — particularly on the radio.

DOJ_NMG_0139820

ONCE more, this seems slightly at odds with statements that Mr. Karmazin made only a few months ago, Jonathan A. Jacoby, a Banc of America Securities analyst, wrote last week in a report. At an investor conference in December, Mr. Jacoby said, Mr. Karmazin talked up the potential for raising prices beyond the $12.95 a month most people pay now.

Clearly, Mr. Karmazin and his counterparts at XM have their work cut out for them in getting their deal past regulators. But one thing you can take to the bank is that he will do whatever it takes to get the deal done. If he does pull it off, the question will be this: What company would the master pitchman want to sell the combined XM-Sirius to next?

INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Tracking Crime On Tribal Lands (AP)

By Amy Forliti, Associated Press writer

AP, March 4, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS -- Sgt. Bill Blake gave his anti-gang presentation to American Indian communities so many times, he says, that his daughter knew it by heart. Yet it wasn't enough: "Dad, you have to do more," he recalls her saying.

Nearly four years later, 20-year-old Erica Rae Blake was dead -- shot in the head at a party on a Wisconsin reservation. Her death was ruled an accident, but memory is driving Blake to work even harder to fight violence on reservations.

Blake set out to improve cooperation between tribal police, federal and local law enforcement, but quickly found a big obstacle: Nobody tracks hard data on crime occurring on tribal lands.

With the help of another Minneapolis police officer, Larry Loonsfoot, and an expected $600,000 grant from the Department of Justice, Blake hopes to create a database that would give tribes a tool to spot trends, share information and track offenders who seek sanctuary elsewhere.

"We're never going to be able to address these problems and make things better in tribal communities when it comes to crime and quality of life unless we get the data," said Blake, a member of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa.

The goal is to collect the data in a central location so law enforcement and tribes can identify problems and apply resources where needed.

"I think what's unique about the Indian community is there is always some connection to the reservation," said Loonsfoot, a member of Michigan's Keweenaw Bay Indian Community. "We need to bridge that communication gap where we can directly enforce both ends."

Blake said the I-CARE project -- it stands for Indian Crime Awareness Research and Evaluation -- will start small, with the ultimate goal of creating a national database.

Technology and money -- too little of both -- sometimes play a part in whether tribes collect and share crime data. A maze of overlapping jurisdictions hurts, too. For example, a crime on a Minnesota reservation may be handled by tribal police, a county sheriff, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the FBI or any combination of law enforcement.

That means data is absorbed by different agencies and a true picture of crime on a reservation can be harder to get. Without good numbers, a tribe may have a hard time getting grant money for a particular problem, or might not make the right choices for spending its crime-fighting dollars, Blake said.

"Nationally, crime statistics from Indian Country are not collected well," said Tom Heffelfinger, a former U.S. attorney in Minnesota. "It's one of the real impediments to improving public safety in Indian Country."

The FBI collects crime data each year, but many tribal communities don't participate. The Bureau of Indian Affairs doesn't collect crime statistics.

The Bureau of Justice Statistics publishes a report on American Indians and crime, but instead of tracking crime as it occurs, the data is collected by a variety of methods, including household survey.

Minneapolis Police Chief Tim Dolan said a database has "tremendous promise," and is trying to line up computers, clerical help and space for Blake's project, likely in one of the city's American Indian neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0139821

"The connections between the tribal lands and the city of Minneapolis are very strong," Dolan said. "You see the same people that are involved in crime here are involved in crime there. There is a very selfish reason to want to create this database and create this sharing of information."

Ted Quasula, police chief of the Las Vegas Paiute Tribe in Las Vegas was intrigued by Blake's project. He said his department tracks crime, but doesn't link its information with other jurisdictions.

"Most criminals could care less about jurisdiction boundaries, in fact they enjoy it when jurisdictions fight," said Quasula, a member of the Hualapai Tribe of Arizona. Sharing information is vital, he said.

"If you kind of hole up and you've got your own island, it's going to be detrimental in the long run," he said.

George Goggleye Jr., chairman of the Leech Lake Band of Ojibwe in Cass Lake, Minn., was enthusiastic about Blake's idea, too. He said his tribe has been keeping statistics in the seven years since it established its police department, and already shares data with surrounding communities.

"It's just been fantastic," said Goggleye.

With the words of his daughter still fresh in his memory, Blake is determined to help prevent more violence.

"What I've learned is doing nothing will get your family killed," he said. "So if I were to sit back and still do nothing and lose somebody else that was close to me, I couldn't live with myself."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge To Decide Validity Of Case On Marijuana (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, March 3 — A federal judge has asked the United States attorney here to submit all trial preparation memorandums in the case against a leading advocate of medical marijuana so that the court can determine if the government has been pursuing a "vindictive prosecution."

The judge, Charles R. Breyer, ordered the review at the request of lawyers for Ed Rosenthal, a spokesman in the effort to legalize marijuana who has been in a closely watched court battle with the government.

At a motion hearing in Federal District Court here on Friday, defense lawyers for Mr. Rosenthal urged Judge Breyer to dismiss an array of federal drug, money laundering and tax evasion charges against their client, saying an appellate court judge had overturned his conviction in a nearly identical case last year.

The new charges, outlined in a federal grand jury indictment issued in October, accuse Mr. Rosenthal of 14 felonies, including conspiracy to grow and sell marijuana for medical use, laundering $1,850 and failing to report income from the sale of crop plants on his tax returns.

The overall charges are nearly identical to a 2003 federal case against Mr. Rosenthal, which ended with a one-day prison sentence after members of the jury disavowed the verdict, having learned belatedly that Mr. Rosenthal was growing marijuana under Proposition 215, the state's medical marijuana law.

"We are outraged that the prosecutor continues to pursue this case," said Shari L. Greenberger, a lawyer for Mr. Rosenthal. "The vindictive nature of the prosecutor is clear-cut and utterly shocking."

Despite the short sentence in the 2003 case, Mr. Rosenthal challenged the fairness of his trial, and in April, a federal judge with the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the marijuana growing conviction, citing jury misconduct. The decision punctuated a contentious three-year volley of legal appeals and cross complaints that were given a second wind on Friday, with the start of the new case.

The United States attorney, George Beven, declined to answer questions about the case, citing an office policy. But at Friday's hearing he agreed to provide Judge Breyer with all interoffice memorandums pertaining to his office's decision to seek another trial and expanded charges.

ATF Computers Help Police Track Guns (WCFC)

DOJ_NMG_0139822

By Jeff Reinitz, Courier Staff Writer

The Waterloo-Cedar Falls (IA) Courier, March 4, 2007

WATERLOO --- A new computer program has sped up the first step Waterloo police take when tracing firearms they come across during criminal investigations

Last fall, three Waterloo officers were certified to use the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearm's eTrace system, which discloses the name of the person who first bought a certain weapon, the seller and the date of that sale.

In the past, police had to fill out paperwork which was then sent to ATF officials. Unless the trace was a high priority, it could take weeks or longer to get results.

"Now it's Web-based, so you just go in and run it yourself," said Sgt. Keith Smith, who works in the police department's crime lab.

Results aren't instant and can still take hours or weeks.

An officer with investigations and an agent with the Tri-County Drug Enforcement Task Force are also authorized to use eTrace.

Aside from make, model and serial number, eTrace users type in a long list of information about the gun --- the caliber, the type of crime it was used in, what part of the house it was found in and so on.

Smith said the ATF apparently crunches that information for future statistics.

"It relieved AT and F of some workload issues, and we may get our results quicker that way also," said Capt. Bruce Arends.

Smith's first trace with the system involved a fatal self-inflicted gunshot wound this fall. The handgun that was used was first purchased by a person with the same last name as the deceased --- likely a relative --- from a store that went out of business decades ago.

Another firearm being traced --- a pistol found with a juvenile --- was first sold to a Waterloo man. But this is just the starting point.

The sale was in 1990, so detectives now have to ferret out the information that isn't in any computer database, specifically how the weapon traded hands from the first buyer to the teenager.

"It's just a piece of the puzzle," Arends said.

Investigators will try to find the buyer and see if he remembers who he sold the gun to, and then try to find any subsequent owners.

Private owners aren't required to keep records of who they sell their guns to, so the chain can be easily broken.

Contact Jeff Reinitz at (319) 291-1578 or jeff.reinitz@wcfcourier.com.

Man With A Million Bullets In Home Charged (RPE)

By Kenny Klein, The Press-Enterprise

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, March 4, 2007

ARSENAL: Authorities accuse him of possessing illegal assault weapons, illegal ammunition and explosives.

NORCO - A man who authorities described as a survivalist after investigators found a cache of weapons and ammunitions at his burning home has been arrested and jailed, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said Saturday.

Thomas Lee McKiernan, 62, of Norco was arrested on suspicion of possession of assault weapons, possession of illegal ammunition, and possession of explosives, according to the sheriff's department.

McKiernan, who had been held since Thursday for a mental evaluation, remained at the Robert Presley Detention Center. His bail is currently set for $100,000 and he is scheduled to appear in Riverside Superior Court on Tuesday, according to his booking information.

The only illegal items investigators have identified so far are five assault rifles, several high-capacity magazines and the 60 pounds of gunpowder, they said. It is illegal to possess more than one pound of gunpowder, Gutierrez said.

The cause of the fire is still unknown. Authorities condemned the house because of the tunnel.

It will take days for deputies and federal agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to document all the weapons and ammunition, Sheriff's spokesman Dennis Gutierrez said.

On Saturday, a locked fence surrounded the damaged property in the neighborhood of neatly kept homes. A number of boxes and other property were stacked in the front yard with four pickups.

McKiernan is a retired machinist who was identified as the home's owner by neighbors and property records.

Sheriff's investigators also found stashes of food and water.

Authorities said they found more than 125 rifles and handguns, about a million rounds of ammunition and 60 pounds of gunpowder in McKiernan's home on the 1800 block of Pali Drive. They said they also discovered a tunnel beneath the garage on Friday.

Fire crews discovered an eight-foot deep tunnel 30 feet from the middle of the garage to a spot beneath the main house. Local and federal officers pulled three barrels out of the tunnel using hooks and poles, said Norco Fire Department Battalion Chief Frank deBoer. They contained rice, water and cooking oil.

On Friday, investigators removed weapons from the kitchen, living room and bedrooms. They also found to safes with reinforcing chain that they have yet to open.

Two-thirds of the driveway leading to McKiernan's modest, shingle-roofed home was filled with ordnance. Cardboard boxes and green metal, military-style containers of ammunition were stacked next to canisters and cookie tins packed with gunpowder.

The ammunition ranged from .22 caliber bullets for small arms to .30 caliber rounds used in high-powered military rifles.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush In A Quandary Over Border Agents' Case (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, March 4, 2007

Border shooting uproar leaves him no easy option

WASHINGTON — For weeks, defenders of the two former Border Patrol agents imprisoned for shooting a Mexican drug trafficker have bombarded the White House with calls, e-mails and petitions.

Their demand is straightforward: A presidential pardon for a pair of Texans they view as heroes persecuted for doing their jobs.

"This is a terrible injustice, and I urge you to use your considerable authority and power to pardon these two agents and right this obvious wrong!" reads a petition from Grassfire.org, a conservative Web site that claims more than 337,000 people have signed the online form.

But the issue is far from simple for President Bush, who is being asked to wade into a highly controversial case where even the most basic facts are in dispute. The quandary for the president: Whether to side with former Border Patrol agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos or with the prosecutors who contend they were rogue officers who wounded a fleeing, unarmed man and then concealed evidence.

Outcry from conservativesDuring a February 2005 incident near Fabens, Texas, Compean and Ramos pursued Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila and fired 15 rounds at him as he ran back toward Mexico after ditching a vehicle with 743 pounds of marijuana. The wounded trafficker later was given immunity to testify against the agents in a case that has drawn a tremendous outcry from conservatives on and off Capitol Hill, who believe the Bush administration sided with a drug trafficker over its own law enforcement agents.

Though clemency is the one area in which a president has power unlimited by the courts or Congress, Bush thus far has indicated no inclination to sidestep the Justice Department regulations typically followed for pardons cases.

"There is a process in any case for a president to make a pardon decision," Bush said during a Fox News Channel interview in January. "In other words, there is a series of steps that are followed so that the pardon process is, you know, a rational process."

The Justice Department rules require that people petitioning for a pardon wait until five years after they have completed their sentence before filing an application. And the applications must be submitted by the guilty parties themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0139824

Compean and Ramos have not applied for a pardon or a commutation of their sentences, Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin said.

Rep. Ted Poe, a Republican from Humble who has championed the ex-agents' cause, has no use for what he views as needless red tape.

"The bureaucracy is getting in the way," Poe said. "The Constitution gives the president absolute power of pardon and parole, and the president can exercise it whenever he wishes."

'A good shield'Some clemency experts fret at the rules, saying no president should limit his pardon powers.

Douglas Berman, an Ohio State University law professor who has followed the Texas case, argues that while the Justice rules may protect the president, they also "eliminate some of the virtue" of the pardon power.

By citing the regulations, Bush "may be trying to cushion himself from the public clamoring to do something in this case," Berman said.

But Margaret Love, who headed Justice's pardons office during the Clinton and first Bush administrations, contends that the rules protect the president and the integrity of the process.

"It's been a good shield for the president," she said.

President Clinton sparked congressional hearings and a huge outcry over his pardon of fugitive financier Marc Rich, whose application bypassed the Justice Department and went directly to the White House without following the rules. And President Ford generated a tremendous public backlash with his pardon of Richard Nixon even before the former president had been charged with any crime in connection with Watergate.

Bush has known intense pressure on the clemency front.

He faced international and domestic pressure as governor of Texas in 1998 to save killer Karla Faye Tucker from the execution chamber. Bush refused to spare Tucker's life despite her reformation in prison and pleas from Pope John Paul II, evangelist Pat Robertson and others, making her the first woman executed in Texas since the Civil War.

Limited useThe Tucker case may hold some clues to Bush's thinking in the Border Patrol ex-agents' matter, said Daniel Kobil, a clemency expert at Capital University Law School in Columbus, Ohio.

"That would suggest that he may well not cave to pressure, even from his own supporters on something like this," he said.

Thus far, Kobil and other experts said, Bush has used his presidential clemency power in very limited fashion.

"It's just really very noncontroversial cases," Love said, calling them "a little unusual in their colorlessness."

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel declined to discuss the Texas case, any timeline for making a decision, or even how many e-mails, letters and calls have been received on behalf of the former Border Patrol agents.

Compean and Ramos, sentenced to 12 and 11 years respectively for shooting the trafficker, have filed a notice of appeal of their sentences, which they began serving in January.

Commutation vs. pardonSupporters argue that the two men deserve, at most, an administrative punishment such as suspension or firing for not reporting the shooting.

Kobil and Berman suggested that the ex-agents' backers might find better success if they argued for commutation of the sentence to time served rather than an outright pardon.

Legally, there is a difference. A pardon wipes the slate clean, forgiving the crime. Commutation reduces the sentence without negating the crime.

"That would be a compromise, obviously," Kobil said. Bush "may well say 'I'm not sure what happened, but they have suffered and they paid a serious price for this crime'," he said.

In light of the controversy surrounding the ex-agents' case, Kobil suggested that Bush might wait until the end of his term before issuing a pardon or commutation for the pair.

Such a stance would not suit Rep. John Culberson, R-Houston, and other conservatives who have rallied to the ex-agents' side.

"This is an utterly unique and outrageous set of circumstances that demands an immediate presidential pardon for the sake of national security and for the sake of the morale of our law enforcement officers on the border," Culberson said.

michelle.mittelstadt@chron.com

DOJ_NMG_0139825

Prosecutor Stands In Political Storm (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News

San Antonio Express-News, March 4, 2007

The Justice Department's recent firings of eight top federal prosecutors across the country have come amid allegations that the agency bowed to political pressure.

Even as the Justice Department rebuts the accusations, some are wondering who might be next.

In Central and West Texas, Johnny Sutton has held the post of U.S. attorney for more than five years, but he has come under fire recently over a case in El Paso in which Sutton's office gained convictions of Border Patrol agents who shot an alleged drug smuggler.

In a federal trial in El Paso last year, jurors convicted Ignacio "Nacho" Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean on charges that they shot the alleged smuggler in the buttocks Feb. 17, 2005, and counts alleging they covered up the shooting. Ramos got 11 years in prison. Compean was sentenced to 12. Both have appealed.

Hailing them as "heroes" who were wrongly convicted, some foes of illegal immigration and Republican members of Congress are pushing for President Bush to pardon them.

More Information

Report of Investigation on Ignacio Ramos & Jose Compean

Without a satisfactory answer from the White House on the request, supporters of the agents are aiming at Sutton who, from Austin, supervises 120 federal prosecutors in the largest federal district in the country, a territory that stretches from Waco to San Antonio, south to Del Rio and west to El Paso and Midland/Odessa.

Sutton "has violated the public's trust, and must be removed from office immediately," said T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, the union that represents 10,000 Border Patrol agents.

"Our federal government had to make a choice between prosecuting somebody who was bringing in $1 million worth of drugs, and prosecuting two border agents who did not follow policy," said U.S. Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, who stopped short of seeking Sutton's removal but has collected more than 40 signatures from fellow House members seeking congressional hearings on the case. "The government chose the wrong side."

The Justice Department had no comment Friday on whether mounting criticism would have an effect on Sutton's post. But a high-ranking department official told the Senate Judiciary Committee last month that Sutton's job is safe. The Feb. 6 hearing was to review the wave of terminated U.S. attorneys, the transcripts show.

"No," Paul J. McNulty, the No. 2 man in the Justice Department, responded to a question of whether Sutton's job was in danger over the controversial border agent case.

Sutton, a former Harris County prosecutor who has held criminal justice policy advisory roles for the Bush administration, said he does his job based on his experience and management of a large office of prosecutors. He added that deciding whether to prosecute is based on facts and evidence. He also said he had no plans to resign.

"Politics is not a consideration, and public pressure is not a consideration," Sutton said. "Those kinds of things are extraneous, and you just have to put them out of your mind."

"What happens is, the defenders of Compean and Ramos just don't like the result," he said. "They don't like the fact that a jury convicted these two men, and they're willing to change the facts or manipulate the facts to try to get a different result."

Immunity agreement

Hundreds of pages of trial transcripts, exhibits, court documents and reports reveal adrenaline-infused moments of border police work that can cut careers short.

Shortly after 1:10 p.m. Feb. 17, 2005, agents chased a van they suspected of being involved in smuggling undocumented immigrants or drugs back toward the Mexican border near Fabens, east of El Paso. It led to the shooting of Osvaldo Aldrete Davila.

Those involved in the incident agreed Aldrete ditched the van, which carried 743 pounds of marijuana, at the edge of a deep sewage ditch, not too far from the Rio Grande. Other agents involved in the pursuit gave conflicting statements about what they saw or heard. Three testified for the government during the trial after the prosecution gave them "proffer letters" that shielded them from criminal prosecution but not from administrative punishment. The three were later terminated or resigned from the Border Patrol — one of them for violations that included his admission that he picked up some shell casings fired by Compean and threw them into the ditch, where they were never found.

Compean testified he fired at Aldrete as he ran off because he thought Aldrete turned his body toward the agent and appeared to have something "black, shiny" in his hand that Compean believed was a gun. One of the agents who received immunity testified he saw Compean fire several times with his handgun, reload and fire some more.

Ramos testified that he heard gunfire, saw Compean on the ground and fired once because, "I believed I saw a gun."

The agents claimed they did not believe they hit Aldrete because he fled into Mexico. The trial documents say Compean fired 14 times, and that the final shot fired by Ramos was the one that hit Aldrete in the buttocks.

The documents also said Ramos and Compean turned back toward the drainage ditch after the shooting and that Compean picked up some shell casings and threw them into the ditch. The reports they wrote did not mention the shooting.

Border Patrol policy on firearm discharges requires agents to verbally report such incidents within an hour to a supervisor. That didn't happen, the trial documents said, although the agents claimed they did.

The shooting investigation did not start until two weeks later, when Aldrete's family reported it to the relatives of another Border Patrol agent in Arizona who is originally from the El Paso area. That agent made inquiries that resulted in the Homeland Security Department's Office of Inspector General launching an administrative probe.

One thing not directly mentioned in the public records is that Aldrete was named in a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration report as the alleged transporter of another 750 pounds of marijuana while he waited to testify at the border agents' trial. The November 2005 report identified Aldrete as the person responsible for stashing the marijuana in a van parked at a house in Clint, also east of El Paso, in October 2005, according to a story published Tuesday by the Inland Valley Daily Bulletin of Ontario, Calif.

U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone limited the defense's ability to question Aldrete about his alleged criminal activity in detail, ruling that such information would be prejudicial.

Prosecutors gave Aldrete limited use immunity, which shielded him from prosecution for his acts on the day he was shot. Additionally, no charges were filed in the October 2005 incident, infuriating the backers of Compean and Ramos. They claim the immunity deal he was originally given shows it extended beyond Feb. 17, 2005.

A civilian group in California, Friends of the Border Patrol, called for Sutton, his prosecutors and the judge to be fired. Cardone, appointed for life like all federal district judges, had no comment.

"It's clear this was a witch hunt," said the group's head, Andy Ramirez. "They protected a doper."

"We cannot comment about matters that are under seal or ongoing investigations," Sutton said in a statement. "This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it.

"We have clearly stated that the immunity necessarily afforded to Aldrete in the investigation and trial of Ramos and Compean for the February 17 (2005) incident would not extend to any subsequent or future criminal activity that may be alleged."

At Bush's side

Sutton calls the criticism "ironic," given his office's track record. Justice Department data shows his office last year led the nation's 94 federal districts in drug prosecutions and was second in prosecuting immigration cases.

Sutton has dealt with pressure before, albeit in a less serious role. As a left fielder for the University of Texas — where he said expectations were high — he played on the same baseball team with pitching great Roger Clemens that won the College World Series in 1983.

After choosing a career in law, he worked in the Harris County District Attorney's Office for eight years. It led to positions as Bush rose politically. When Bush was governor of Texas, Sutton served as his criminal justice policy director from 1995 to 2000.

Sutton later was a policy coordinator for the Bush-Cheney transition team before joining the Justice Department as an associate deputy attorney general.

Bush appointed Sutton as U.S. attorney in late 2001. He serves as the chairman of the Attorney General's Advisory Committee, a 17-member body picked by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. The committee plays a significant role in determining Justice policies and programs and in carrying out the national goals set by the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0139827

Despite Sutton's closeness to Bush, some observers note that the fired U.S. attorneys were also appointed by Bush originally. Last week, New Mexico's David Iglesias publicly claimed to have been forced out after refusing a request by two congressmen to rush an indictment that could have helped Republicans in last November's election. Iglesias has refused to identify the two.

The Justice Department staunchly denied the charge that Iglesias or any of the eight federal prosecutors were dismissed for political reasons, according to the Associated Press.

U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be fired for any reason — or none at all.

Given those circumstances, Carl W. Tobias, a law professor for the University of Richmond in Virginia, said it wouldn't be a stretch to assume that other prosecutors might not rest easy.

"The question is whether the Justice Department will listen to these people who are arguing for his removal," Tobias said of Sutton. "Whether they can get to him and whether the Justice Department would even listen, I don't know, but that's the kind of thing U.S. attorneys are worried about."

Inmates Will Replace Wary Migrants In Colorado Fields (NYT)

By Dan Frosch

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

DENVER, March 3 — As migrant laborers flee Colorado because of tough new immigration restrictions, worried farmers are looking to prisoners to fill their places in the fields.

In a pilot program run by the state Corrections Department, supervised teams of low-risk inmates beginning this month will be available to harvest the swaths of sweet corn, peppers and melons that sweep the southeastern portion of the state.

Under the program, which has drawn criticism from groups concerned about immigrants' rights and from others seeking changes in the criminal justice system, farmers will pay a fee to the state, and the inmates, who volunteer for the work, will be paid about 60 cents a day, corrections officials said.

Concerned about the possible shortage of field labor, Dorothy B. Butcher, a state representative from Pueblo and a supporter of the program, said, "The workers on these farms do the weeding, the harvesting, the storing, everything that comes with growing crops for the market."

"If we can't sustain our work force, we're going to be in trouble," said Ms. Butcher, a Democrat.

The program will make its debut in Pueblo County, where farmers have been hit hard by the labor shortage. Frank Sobolik, director of a Colorado State University extension program that works with farmers in Pueblo County, said he expected that about half of the 300 migrant workers employed by area farms might not return this season.

"There's a feeling, a perception that these laborers won't be back because it's safer for them to find work in other states," Mr. Sobolik said. "The farmers are really concerned. These are high-value crops we're talking about here with a high labor requirement."

Last year, the Colorado General Assembly passed tough legislation that included giving local law enforcement broader powers to check immigration status and restricting access to social services for workers without proper documentation.

The Colorado Immigrant Rights Coalition estimates that there are 150,000 illegal immigrants in Colorado, many of them involved in agriculture. Migrant workers typically travel here from Mexico, Texas and New Mexico for the crop season, where their labor can last from May through the late fall, before returning home to their families. But those numbers could soon be reduced drastically, as workers who are in the country illegally are unwilling to risk exposing their status.

Joe Pisciotta Jr., who owns a 700-acre produce farm in Pueblo County, said he had about 20 workers and expected to lose half of them. Mr. Pisciotta, a third-generation farmer, worried that such a reduction would undercut his ability to supply buyers with the watermelons, onions and pumpkins he grows.

"It's very frustrating," he said. "I'm definitely going to lose customers. We've never had an issue like this. With all of us trying to get enough workers on our farms, I'm worried this is going to turn into farmer against farmer."

DOJ_NMG_0139828

Although chain gangs and prison farms have long been staples of American correctional culture, the concept of inmates working on private farms is unusual. But there are signs that other states are following suit. The Iowa Department of Corrections is considering a similar program because of a migrant labor shortage in that state.

Several Iowa farmers called recently to request inmates in lieu of migrant workers, said Roger Baysden, the director of the state's prison industries program. One farmer asked for as many as 200 inmates, Mr. Baysden said.

In Colorado, Ms. Butcher said she hoped that the program, which could send up to 100 inmates to Pueblo County farmers, would remedy a situation that might otherwise turn into an economic disaster.

Immigrant rights group, however, said the Colorado program was myopic.

"Many immigrants are leaving Colorado for other states that will actually embrace their contributions as good citizens and hard workers," said Julien Ross, state coordinator for the Colorado Immigrant Rights Coalition. "This exodus from Colorado has profound negative consequences on our economy and the very fabric of our society."

Mr. Ross said his group was organizing a weeklong boycott of Colorado businesses beginning March 25 to demonstrate the workers' impact on the regional economy.

A group calling for changes in sentencing, the Colorado Criminal Justice Reform Coalition, is also uneasy about the program. The group views the inmates' pay as problematic.

"This feels like the re-invention of the plantation," said Christie Donner, the group's executive director. "You have a captive labor force essentially working for their room and board in order to benefit the employer. This isn't a job training program. It's an exploitative program."

But Ari Zavaras, executive director of the Colorado Department of Corrections, said the merit of a hard day's work outdoors was invaluable to an inmate.

"They won't be paid big bucks, but we're hoping this will help our inmates pick up significant and valuable job skills," Mr. Zavaras said. "We're also assisting farmers who, if they don't get help, are facing an inability to harvest their crops."

With the start of the farming season looming, Colorado's farmers are scrambling to figure out which crops to sow and in what quantity. Some are considering turning to field corn, which is mechanically harvested. And they are considering whether they want to pay for an urban inmate who could not single out a ripe watermelon or discern between a weed and an onion plant.

"This is not a cure-all," Mr. Pisciotta said. "What our farm laborers do is a skill. They're born with it, and they're good at it. It's not an easy job."

Americans Selling Personal Identity To Illegal Aliens (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

HARLINGEN, Texas (AP) -- Asked by a federal judge why she sold her birth certificate, Rosie Medellin said she needed a few bucks and didn't really think it through. Bobby Joe Flores said he sold his identification documents to buy drugs. Margarita Moya and her son did it to raise money for medicine for a loved one.

Their documents were destined for illegal aliens.

In all, seven defendants pleaded guilty in Corpus Christi last week to charges of selling their birth certificates and Social Security cards for $100 each. Seven other defendants pleaded guilty to buying or reselling those documents as part of a ring that sold documents to illegal aliens seeking jobs in Dodge City, Kan.

The federal government's attention has been on stolen or fabricated identity documents, and officials say they know little about people who sell their own legitimate documents.

Defense attorneys said prosecution for selling an ID may be something new.

"I've been practicing criminal law for years and this is the first I've seen in our Southern District," said Grant Jones, who represents a roofer with sporadic employment. "If they've (the government) been aware in the past, they've now decided to enforce the law."

However, Mr. Jones said his client told him that document selling was a well-known way to earn a quick buck.

Prosecutors declined to talk about the case until a sentencing hearing in May before U.S. District Judge Hayden Head Jr. in Corpus Christi. The defendants face anywhere from probation to five years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0139829

Government raids at meatpacking plants in six states in December stemmed from an investigation that uncovered up to 4,300 workers with questionable documentation.

Tim Counts, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman in Bloomington, Minn., said that investigation revealed documents were available for a price in places as open as Kmart parking lots. He said genuine documents were the most expensive, costing up to $1,500, and the most effective against detection.

"We don't have an all-inclusive picture of it," Mr. Counts said. "What we do have is evidence and information from individual cases. ... We definitely know it happens."

The issue also has turned up elsewhere.

In June, a man pleaded guilty in Concord, N.H., to selling five genuine Texas birth certificates and six Social Security cards to informants. Three years earlier, 10 people in Beardstown, Ill., were charged with receiving or transferring real documents that originated in Texas. In August 2002, a man in Green Bay, Wis., was charged with intent to sell documents including genuine Puerto Rican birth certificates and Social Security cards.

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said there isn't much specific information on the extent of the problem.

"Irrespective of the mode of identity theft, the issue itself is prevalent and it's something we're striking at very aggressively," Mr. Knocke said.

Hope For Amends To Filipino Immigrants (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Bills to Speed Children's Moves to U.S., Give Military Pensions Show Political Assertion

Amid the wrangling over immigration reform, virtually everyone in Congress appears to agree on one point: Filipino-born veterans who fought alongside U.S. troops during World War II deserve a break.

Denied the right to immigrate to the United States until 1990, they came hoping that their children could follow them here later, just as other groups have done. But the adult children have been required to wait twice as long -- up to 16 years -- as anyone else. With the veterans often too old and sick to travel home, many have died while waiting to be reunited with their families.

Now, after several longtime backers have risen to key positions in Congress, Filipino American advocates are hopeful that legislation will be pushed through to exempt the veterans' children from the immigration delay. They also are optimistic about a potentially more controversial bill that would grant Filipino veterans military pensions.

About 5,000 veterans in the United States would stand to benefit from a change in immigration provisions, and an additional 10,000 in the Philippines could be eligible for pensions.

To many in the 2-million-strong Filipino American community, the issue represents a chance to cement their political identity in a nation where they have long felt invisible, even though Filipinos rank second, behind Mexicans, in the number of immigrants living in the United States.

"Historically, we Filipinos have always been looked down on as your little brown brothers -- as these acquiescent people who would just accept anything Uncle Sam would do to them," said Jon Melegrito, communications director of the National Federation of Filipino American Associations. "This is about asserting who we are as a people and how we served this country. . . . It's a call to action to stop acting like colonial slaves and to start acting like first-class citizens."

The effort builds on an association with the United States that dates to 1898, when the United States acquired the Philippines from Spain after winning the Spanish-American War.

Laws and discriminatory practices against all Asian immigrants kept Filipino numbers in the United States low through the first half of the 1900s. But in the Philippines, many residents were taught English and raised to think of themselves as something akin to Americans.

Celestino Almeda, 90, a veteran who lives in Alexandria, remembered that the director of his elementary school in Manila led students in a pledge of allegiance to the American flag every morning.

DOJ_NMG_0139830

"We also celebrated all the holidays: Washington's birthday, Armistice Day," Almeda said. "In our mind, it was like America was our mother country."

When Japan invaded the Philippines in 1941, more than 200,000 Filipinos joined Americans in waging a fierce resistance, enduring such horrors as the Bataan death march and the grueling guerrilla campaign that followed. Technically, the Filipino fighters were under overall U.S. command. But within months of the Allied victory, Congress stripped most of them of their rights as foreign veterans of U.S. forces -- including the opportunity to become U.S. citizens -- on the grounds that the Philippines was about to be granted independence.

Even so, the Philippines continued its close affiliation with the United States. Thousands of Filipinos joined the U.S. Navy, which until recently had major bases there. By 1970, there were more Filipinos in the U.S. Navy than in the Philippine Navy.

And, after 1965, when Congress repealed the nationality quota system that had practically prohibited Asians from immigrating, hundreds of thousands of Filipinos streamed in.

Ranging from unskilled workers and nannies to nurses and professionals who came in on occupational preference visas, the new arrivals immediately formed social, cultural and professional organizations. Before long, they were rising to prominent positions in government, unions and the military. Several won elected office, including in Prince George's County, where a sizable community settled.

Yet when it came to turning their clout into political activism on behalf of Filipino American causes, many of the immigrants hesitated, said Bing Cardenas Branigin, 50, a former regional chairman of the Filipino American federation.

"There was this sense that you shouldn't make trouble, that you shouldn't contradict the government," she said. "You should just pay your taxes and send your kids to school and keep quiet."

That began to change in the mid-1970s when anger spread over the repressive policies of the Filipino president, Ferdinand Marcos. As much as their opposition to Marcos galvanized the Filipino American community, it also caused rifts with those who supported Marcos.

After Marcos was ousted, community leaders looked to refocus their newfound energy on a more unifying issue. The fight for veterans' equity was a natural choice.

Since then, the veterans have won some of the benefits they lost after the war. Most notably, in 1990, Congress granted Filipino World War II veterans the same opportunity to naturalize offered to all other foreign nationals who served in the U.S. armed forces.

But the Filipino veterans remain ineligible for a military pension, forcing many of the more than 24,000 elderly veterans who became U.S. citizens after 1990 to live off food stamps and Supplemental Security Income payments.

Joaquin Tejada, 84, a former guerrilla fighter who survived two years resisting the Japanese from jungle hideouts, said he now struggles to get by with his $545 monthly SSI check. The rent for the two-bedroom apartment he shares with another Filipino World War II veteran in Columbia Heights takes $275.

"By the end of the month, it's hard to buy even basic food," said Tejada, who proudly sported an American flag tie during an interview.

Then there is the 16-year wait veterans face if they wish to bring over their adult children, an unintended consequence of the 1965 law lifting the quotas that had prevented most Asians from immigrating.

In their place, Congress introduced a complicated system meant to offer every country the same number of family reunification visas. But because Filipino applicants far outnumber the yearly slots allotted to them, they face the longest delays -- 22 years to sponsor an adult brother or sister, for instance, compared with 11 years for applicants of most other nationalities.

Candida Romulo, 72, said she and her husband, Bayani, a veteran who became a lawyer in Manila, would not have naturalized and moved to Oxon Hill had they known that the wait to sponsor their grown children would be so long.

"We did it because we wanted to give them the opportunities of living in this country. It was going to be our gift to them," Romulo said during an interview in a living room crammed with photographs of her four children.

Soon after the couple's arrival, Bayani developed a medical condition requiring frequent dialysis, making visits to the Philippines impossible. Because of their pending residency applications, his children were unable to get visas to visit him.

DOJ_NMG_0139831

When Bayani suffered a severe stroke in September, his eldest son wasn't able to relay his final words to his father over the phone before he died.

"The receiver couldn't reach his bed in the ICU," Candida Romulo said. "So I told my husband, 'Your son says that he loves you very much and that he's so proud that you are his father.' My husband couldn't speak, but I could tell that he understood, because there were tears in his eyes."

Now Romulo worries that her son may never gain entry to the United States, because if a sponsor dies while the visa application is pending, there is a chance that the application will be annulled.

But she said she is still praying that Congress will pass the legislation for the sake of those veterans who remain alive.

"If that happens, I know my husband will be very happy about it, even if he is already in heaven," she said.

Immigration Reform, Take 2 (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Learning the lessons of last year's debacle

ADVOCATES OF sweeping measures to reform the nation's broken-down muddle of an immigration policy are preparing to enter the fray once again: A new bill may be introduced in Congress as early as this week. This time hopes are high that the political map has changed just enough to make success a real possibility. Beware: Those hopes will be realized only if everyone involved in last year's debacle has drawn the right lessons from Congress's failure to enact a meaningful law.

What are the lessons? President Bush, who favored last year's Senate bill but went limp when it came under attack by anti-reform forces in the House, should note that passivity in the face of his own party's hard-liners is a prescription for further disappointment. Republican leaders in the House, who killed last year's legislation, should conclude that they gained nothing by trying to whip up the party base with misleading talk of an "amnesty" for illegal immigrants -- and probably alienated droves of coveted Hispanic voters at the elections in November.

As for Democrats, who have squabbled among themselves but now run Congress, they must take note of an opportunity staring them in the face. They have a chance to exercise leadership and score a victory on a major domestic policy problem.

The early signs are generally encouraging. The authors of the most realistic legislation in the last Congress -- Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.), and Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Luis V. Gutierrez (D-Ill.) -- are again preparing to introduce a bipartisan bill. As for Mr. Bush, he has also sounded the right notes by calling in his State of the Union address for a "legal and orderly path for foreign workers to enter our country," and for resolving the status of more than 11 million illegal immigrants already here, "without animosity and without amnesty." Still, the president's fuzziness is worrying. He did not mention a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country in the State of the Union speech, and two of his Cabinet secretaries sidestepped it during recent testimony on Capitol Hill. It may be that their intent was to avoid, for now, inciting the hornets' nest of opponents to eventual citizenship. But without addressing the question frontally and without providing a venues by which the nation's underclass of undocumented workers may one day emerge from the legal shadows, the chances of an effective fix for immigration are nil.

To have a hope of success, both as legislation and as policy, immigration reform must also establish much tougher domestic controls and sanctions for employers; means by which they can verify prospective workers' status; and counterfeit-proof identity documents for workers. There must be a process by which new immigrants can come here legally in sufficient numbers to satisfy the obvious economic demand for them and according to rules that ensure that they will not become a permanent underclass. Time is short. Chances for a reform package will fade as the 2008 presidential campaign approaches. Let's hope that all the players take to heart last year's lessons as this year's debate is joined.

Illegal Immigrants -- They're Money (LAT)

Gregory Rodriguez

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Bank of American is right to treat them as legitimate participants in our economy.

DAN STEIN, the premier American nativist and president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, is shocked, shocked. He's mad at Bank of America for issuing credit cards to illegal immigrants. He says that to BofA "and other large corporations, illegal immigrants are a source of low-wage labor and an untapped customer market." You bet they are, and that's the American way.

DOJ_NMG_0139832

Sure, I'm proud to be a citizen of a nation that portrays itself as a refuge for the "tired," "the poor" and the "huddled masses yearning to breathe free." But let's face it, Emma Lazarus, the poet who wrote those words, may have laid it on a bit thick. The truth, no less beautiful in its way, is a little more crass and self-serving. But it wouldn't have sounded nearly as poetic to say, "bring us your able-bodied, poor, hardworking masses yearning for a chance to climb out of poverty, establish a credit history and…. " We all love to rhapsodize about immigrants' embrace of the American dream, but it's more like a hard-nosed American deal — you come here, you work your tail off under grueling conditions, and you can try your damnedest to better your lot over time.

In their generational struggle for acceptance and security, from outsider to insider and, dare I say, from exploited to exploiter, immigrants could avail themselves of those inalienable rights that stand at the core of our national political philosophy — life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

But that, of course, was before the invention of illegal immigration.

Until the early 1900s, pretty much anybody who wasn't diseased, a criminal, a prostitute, a pauper, an anarchist or a Chinese laborer could gain entrance to the U.S. Between 1880 and 1914, only 1% of a total of 25 million European immigrants were excluded from this country. But after transatlantic crossings had already been halted by World War I, Congress buckled to anti-foreign sentiment and closed the proverbial Golden Door by passing a series of restrictionist laws in 1917, 1921 and 1924.

Yet even as the historical front door of the nation was being closed, business interests were busy prying open a new side-door. Only three months after the passage of the Immigration Act of 1917, which required all newcomers to pass a literacy test and pay a head tax, the U.S. secretary of Commerce waived the regulations for Mexican workers. Thus began America's dishonorable relationship with Mexican immigrant labor.

*

FOR THE NEXT several decades, Mexican workers were brought in when the economy expanded and kicked out when times got bad. They were recruited in the 1920s, only to be deported in the 1930s. They were brought in again during the labor shortage in the 1940s. By the 1950s, one branch of the government recruited Mexican workers, under the illusion that they were "temporary," while another sought to keep them out.

The piece de resistance in the creation of the illegal immigrant is the Immigration Act of 1965. Although touted as a great piece of liberal legislation that ended discriminatory immigration barriers, it imposed an annual cap on migrants from the Western Hemisphere that was 40% less than the number that had been arriving yearly before 1965. A decade later, Congress placed a 20,000 limit per country in this hemisphere.

In other words, after importing millions of Mexicans over the decades, particularly during the bracero guest-worker program from 1942 to 1963, and establishing well-trod routes to employment north of the border, the U.S. drastically reduced the number of visas available to Mexicans. This reduction, of course, coincided with a rapid rise in Mexico's population. And guess what? When jobs were available on this side of the border, Mexicans just kept coming, whether they had papers or not.

Clearly, today as ever, mass migration to the U.S. is being driven by economic need — the immigrants' and our economy's. But the hard-nosed American deal has become unfair because, on top of the handicaps we have always imposed on new arrivals, we've added a rather brutal one — criminal status. Good luck with that pursuit of happiness as you engage in backbreaking labor when your place in society is summed up with that one cutting word, "illegal."

No, I'm not advocating open borders. Nor do I believe that immigrants should be guaranteed anything but a chance to achieve their end of the nation's cruel bargain. For hardworking illegal immigrants who've established roots here, we should uphold our end of the bargain and give them a chance to achieve their piece of the American dream. BofA is not wrong to give illegal immigrants the tools with which to compete legitimately in the marketplace. We as a nation are wrong for treating all these people as illegitimate.

*

grodriguez@latimescolumnists.com

DOJ_NMG_0139833

TAX:

The Untaxed Rich, Found And Then Lost (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

FALSE advertising is part of the problem, and it's right there in the name: alternative minimum tax.

"Minimum," when the tax was conceived, meant that even the wealthiest Americans, with their buffet of deductions, loopholes and shelters, would still pay some income tax.

"Alternative," added to the name of the tax 21 years ago, suggests a choice, but it's not much of one for one in four taxpayers this year who must pay using this calculation unless Congress comes up with a different "alternative" when it takes up the matter this week.

What happened between 1969, when the minimum tax was born, and today, when it has few champions — and many people scratching their heads? And how could it be that a tax aimed squarely at rich investors who paid no income tax now hits middle-class families?

The '69 version of the tax was more or less what it set out to be, right or wrong. And that was a remedy to the disclosure by the Johnson administration that 155 rich families some of whom made millions in 1966 had not paid any taxes — taxes that for other Americans were rising to pay for the Vietnam War. If deductions like the ones for owning oil wells and leasing rail cars had whittled some tax bills down to nothing, these rich earners would be required to pay something.

But in 1986, when President Ronald Reagan and both parties on Capitol Hill agreed to a major change in the tax system, the law was subtly changed to aim at a wholly different set of deductions, the ones that everyone gets, like the personal exemption, state and local taxes, the standard deduction, certain expenses like union dues and even some medical costs for the seriously ill. At the same time it removed and revised some of the exotic investment deductions. A law for untaxed rich investors was refocused on families who own their homes in high tax states.

Taxes are now calculated two ways — using the traditional income tax formula, and using the 1986 alternative tax formula — and taxpayers owe the higher of the two numbers. The majority of families with two or more children earning $75,000 to $500,000 now owe more under the alternative tax — anywhere from hundreds of dollars to tens of thousands of dollars annually. Among such families with an adjusted gross income of $75,000 to $100,000, almost 80 percent are affected, compared with just a third of those with incomes of $1 million or more, according to computer modeling studies by the Tax Policy Center, a joint venture of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute.

Repealing the alternative minimum tax would cost the government almost $70 billion this year, while putting everyone on the alternative and repealing the regular income tax would cost only $63 billion.

Simply removing personal tax exemptions and credits and indexing for inflation would reduce the number of taxpayers affected by 85 percent, the center estimated. That would retain the few, weakened provisions still in effect from the 1969 law intended to tax the rich.

For now, the only area of wide agreement is to keep enacting temporary patches until Congress and some future administration tackle fundamental changes in the tax code.

Regardless, until another course is chosen, a law focused on rich investors who paid little or no tax is now a law that affects 23.4 million of the nation's 90 million taxpayers.

The story began on Jan. 17, 1969, three days before the Johnson administration was to end. Joseph W. Barr, who served only a few weeks as Treasury secretary, told a Congressional panel about the 155 families who paid no income tax, despite incomes of $1 million or more in today's dollars.

Mr. Barr's report made the front page of newspapers across the country the next morning and fueled debates in coffee shops, police stations and across kitchen tables. Congress in 1969 received more letters about these untaxed Americans than it did about Vietnam, according to Michael Graetz, a Yale Law School professor and tax adviser in the George H. W. Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0139834

While the idea of paying your fair share as a moral issue may seem strange today, it was central to tax debates in that era. The disclosure that some of those who had gained the most by living in the United States did not share in the costs of the war infuriated many taxpayers.

But in 1986, when the '69 remedy was fundamentally changed, there was virtually no news coverage because at the time the changes affected only a few people. The initial amount of deductions before the new alternative minimum tax kicked in was set so high that in the first year it raised only the $1.7 billion needed to plug a hole in President Reagan's budget.

The alternative tax's long-term effect was given no more consideration than, say, the exemptions on fuel-economy standards the government in the 1960s gave to sport utilities — vehicles that at the time were far less common and were used mostly for work that required hauling.

Since its inception, the alternative tax has raised more and more revenue each year, reducing the perennial federal budget deficits. Indeed, President Bush's 2001 income tax cut plan was premised on taking back a third of the tax cut through increasing alternative minimum tax revenues.

Left unchanged, the alternative tax this year will take back about 27 percent of the Bush tax cuts, mostly from people making $75,000 to $500,000, the Tax Policy Center calculated. The center's estimates are held in high regard by the administration and by administration critics.

Two major factors now push people into the alternative system. One is that the alternative tax rate of 21 percent in 1986 was raised in 1993 to rates of 26 and 28 percent, in tandem with the increased rates in the regular tax system that President Bill Clinton sponsored. This held the spread between the two systems steady, Professor Graetz said.

But when Mr. Bush sponsored his tax cuts in 2001, they applied only to the regular tax system, narrowing the spread and pushing many more people into the alternative system.

Because those on the alternative system cannot deduct state and local taxes, their marginal tax rates are often above 40 percent, a level many economists say is high enough to discourage earning more and to encourage cheating. Many of these taxpayers also lose the benefits of the lower capital gains and dividend rates that President Bush championed as tools for economic growth.

Professor Graetz says that a second factor is inflation, which has eroded the value of the exemption from the alternative tax, pushing millions of people into it. The dollar has lost more than 44 percent of its value since 1986.

Meanwhile the stated goal of the original tax is not being met under the successor tax enacted 21 years ago. A far greater number of well-off families still pay only small amounts of tax. More than 41,000 taxpayers with incomes of $200,000 or more in 2003, the last year for which figures are available, paid less than 10 percent of their income in individual income taxes. And the number of untaxed high-income families — once 155 — grew to 2,824.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Children's Health Care On Agenda (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Divisions Surface as Congress Works to Renew Program

The success of the decade-old Children's Health Insurance Program is exposing Washington's familiar ideological divisions over health care as Congress begins to work on renewing the state-federal program.

Members of both parties want to continue the popular $5 billion-a-year effort, which at any given time provides health insurance to more than 4 million children from lower-income families that do not qualify for Medicaid but cannot afford insurance on their own. But Republicans and Democrats cannot agree on how much money the program should get, and whom it should cover.

The conflicts track long-standing divisions over the proper role of government in health care, with Democrats generally favoring more activist attempts to ensure that everyone has access and Republicans supporting a more limited role that focuses on helping the neediest.

DOJ_NMG_0139835

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office and other analysts estimate that the program, known as SCHIP, will require $13 billion to $15 billion above current funding levels just to keep covering the same number of children for the next five years. The Bush administration has proposed $4.8 billion, saying that is enough to maintain enrollment for "priority low-income children."

Many Democrats on Capitol Hill and advocates for children call the White House proposal inadequate, but the dispute is about more than numbers. Some Democrats, in control of Congress for the first time since 1994, would like to increase funding levels by as much as $50 billion over five years to extend coverage to many of the nation's 8.3 million uninsured children -- and to some uninsured parents and childless adults as well.

One possible source of money is the nearly $65 billion that the CBO says could be saved by erasing the gap between what the government pays private insurers that operate Medicare HMOs and what it pays doctors and hospitals for traditional fee-for-service care. A Medicare advisory panel reported Thursday that federal payments to the HMOs are an average of 12 percent higher.

"A lot of states, including my own, have more kids that are eligible for the program but are not enrolled that we'd like to reach out to," Rep. Frank Pallone Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on health, said Thursday in an interview during a break in a hearing on the program. "I don't understand what the president is doing. . . . If he's going to hold to his commitment that he wants to cover the uninsured, this is the best way to do it. I would ask that he not look at this from an ideological perspective, and maybe not like it because it's a government program. Look at it practically -- it's working."

But President Bush and many congressional Republicans, wary of creeping growth in a federal social program, say the program is losing its way. They note that 14 states have taken advantage of the program's flexibility to cover not just children but also 639,000 adults, according to the Government Accountability Office. States such as Arizona, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin covered more adults than children in 2005, the GAO found.

Moreover, seven states cover children from families that earn as much as 300 percent of the federal poverty level or more, or $61,950 for a family of four. Bush and some GOP lawmakers argue that the program should focus on children from families at or below 200 percent of the poverty level, or $41,300 for a family of four.

"I fear that using these limited federal dollars for adults has undermined coverage for low-income children," said Charles E. Grassley (Iowa), the ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee. "The issue is not whether or not coverage for adults is desirable: It is. The issue is not whether or not coverage for adults is beneficial for the family: It is. . . . The issue is whether SCHIP funds used to cover adults have drained resources targeted by Congress for kids."

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said last week that the program, which must be reauthorized by the end of September, should not be "the engine that pulls the train of a national health insurance program."

The partisan divisions do not carry over to state leaders. When a federal program is funded jointly with the states, governors generally prefer to see more money from Washington -- regardless of political affiliation. More than a dozen governors of both parties last week urged the White House and Congress to approve more funding for the program, including an immediate $745 million infusion to head off projected shortfalls this year in Maryland and 13 other states.

Continued funding is vital for people such as Craig and Kim Lee Bedford of Baltimore, who at a Senate committee hearing last month said that they struggled to pay high monthly private insurance premiums for their five children until they learned they were eligible for the federal program in 2004.

"We no longer have to decide whether a child is really sick enough to warrant a doctor's visit," said Kim Bedford, whose husband is an insurance agent. "We no longer have to decide whether a child really needs a certain medication prescribed by his pediatrician. . . . The times when we would have to make medical decisions for our children based on financial criteria were extremely stressful as parents, full of those impossible choices. Those are not the kinds of choices that parents in a society as advanced and as resourced as ours should be forced to make."

A Boy's Death (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139836

How could a toothache have such a tragic outcome?

THE WHAT-IFS of Deamonte Driver's short life are heartbreaking. Just 12 years old, the Prince George's County boy died last week because of a succession of breakdowns in a system set up to ensure that children get basic dental care that is critical to their health. Equally tragic is that there are many more children like Deamonte who are at risk.

Deamonte's death, as reported by The Post's Mary Otto, happened because he didn't get timely treatment for a decaying tooth. Bacteria from the problem tooth migrated to his brain, and after two operations and more than six weeks in the hospital, he died. Deamonte's death should be more than mourned. It should serve as a call to strengthen the safety net -- and the first step is not blaming the victim. We have been taken aback by the ire some have directed at the boy's mother.

Obviously there is always parental responsibility, but, as children's health advocates will attest, the real issues are with the system. The states, the federal government and the dental profession have to do more. Medicaid requires dental coverage for children who qualify. But there aren't enough dentists willing to either treat children (think of Deamonte's brother whose dental treatment was stopped when he squirmed too much) or to accept Medicaid. This is a nationwide problem; states such as Virginia and Tennessee have developed robust programs to increase the number of dentists willing to serve the needs of people on the margins.

Another solution is expanding the reach of public health: The Maryland legislature should approve a bill to increase public dental clinics by allocating $6 million over three years.

Although not required, most states provide dental care under the State Children's Health Insurance Program to low-income children who don't qualify for Medicaid. That act is now up for reauthorization. Congress would do well to include dental care in the menu of benefits, as well as help out states that face budget shortfalls. Those worried about cost should think about Deamonte. The loss of his life is immeasurable, but it's worth noting that the cost of his care is likely to top $250,000. There can't be a more vivid reminder of how shortsighted our system is in not fostering access to preventive health care that saves not only money but lives.

Nuclear Warhead Plan Draws Opposition (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Some Lawmakers Are Against New Weapon, While Others Seek Justification

The selection of a basic design for what could become a new generation of U.S. nuclear warheads has drawn immediate opposition from some key members of Congress.

The National Nuclear Security Administration announced on Friday that it had selected a design by the California-based Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory for the Reliable Replacement Warhead (RRW). It would be the first of a new generation of secure and reliable nuclear warheads initially intended for the Navy's submarine-launched intercontinental ballistic missiles.

Within the next 12 months, a team from Livermore and the Navy is to put together cost estimates and an engineering and production plan that would be presented to Congress next year for approval, according to acting NNSA Administrator Thomas P. D'Agostino.

Rep. Peter J. Visclosky (D-Ind.), the new chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee that controls the funds for the nuclear weapons complex, has sharply questioned why a new warhead is needed. Saying the NNSA announcement "puts the cart before the horse," he called on the Bush administration to present a "clear, coherent national policy" to justify the new warhead.

Visclosky said he plans to hold oversight hearings and may seek to slow or eliminate the RRW if the administration does not present a strategy "that defines the future mission, the emerging threats, and the specific U.S. nuclear stockpile necessary to achieve the strategic goals."

The same subcommittee, under the previous chairman, Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), helped eliminate the Bush administration's plan to develop a nuclear "bunker buster" weapon and, instead, initiated a program to upgrade the reliability of the current stockpile of Cold War weapons. The Bush administration turned this into a program to develop a new nuclear warhead.

DOJ_NMG_0139837

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a longtime opponent of new nuclear weapons, has declared that she is "100 percent opposed" to building the RRW. A member of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that funds the nuclear complex, she said in a statement: "While I appreciate the fact that Lawrence Livermore was selected, this in no way answers my questions about the Reliable Replacement Warhead program."

She questioned how other countries would view the U.S. effort to develop new nuclear weapons at the same time that the United States is pushing Iran, North Korea and other countries to drop nuclear weapons programs. "What worries me is that the minute you begin to put more sophisticated warheads on the existing fleet, you are essentially creating a new nuclear weapon. And it's just a matter of time before other nations do the same thing," she said.

D'Agostino told reporters on Friday that the RRW "is not about starting a new nuclear arms race." He said the program would use a warhead design that was tested in the 1980s but package it with new features, such as insensitive high explosives less liable to explode by accident, as well as locking devices that would prevent the warhead from being used if it fell into the hands of terrorists.

There is congressional support for the warhead development. Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services subcommittee on strategic forces, which also has jurisdiction over the weapons program, said she is "encouraged" by the NNSA decision. But she added that it "is only an early step in what will be a long evaluation process."

With the design going to Livermore, located in her district, Tauscher said the NNSA and the Pentagon "appear to have followed Congress's clear directions." She said her subcommittee's first hearings on the RRW will take place this week.

Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R) of New Mexico, home of Los Alamos National Laboratory, whose design lost out to Livermore's, said: "The important thing is that we're taking a step forward with the RRW to transform and reduce our stockpile, improve security and reliability, and lower the life-cycle cost." He hinted that this may only be the first of a series of RRWs, saying, "One system is not equivalent to a transformation, and we need to move on a second design competition."

Although Livermore's warhead is designed to be carried by a Navy intercontinental ballistic missile, the NNSA and the Pentagon are about to begin a study to determine what elements are needed for an RRW that would be carried by an Air Force ICBM.

FDA Rules Override Warnings About Drug (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Cattle Antibiotic Moves Forward Despite Fears of Human Risk

The government is on track to approve a new antibiotic to treat a pneumonia-like disease in cattle, despite warnings from health groups and a majority of the agency's own expert advisers that the decision will be dangerous for people.

The drug, called cefquinome, belongs to a class of highly potent antibiotics that are among medicine's last defenses against several serious human infections. No drug from that class has been approved in the United States for use in animals.

The American Medical Association and about a dozen other health groups warned the Food and Drug Administration that giving cefquinome to animals would probably speed the emergence of microbes resistant to that important class of antibiotics, as has happened with other drugs. Those super-microbes could then spread to people.

Echoing those concerns, the FDA's advisory board last fall voted to reject the request by InterVet Inc. of Millsboro, Del., to market the drug for cattle.

Yet by all indications, the FDA will approve cefquinome this spring. That outcome is all but required, officials said, by a recently implemented "guidance document" that codifies how to weigh the threats to human health posed by proposed new animal drugs.

The wording of "Guidance for Industry #152" was crafted within the FDA after a long struggle. In the end, the agency adopted language that, for drugs like cefquinome, is more deferential to pharmaceutical companies than is recommended by the World Health Organization.

Cefquinome's seemingly inexorable march to market shows how a few words in an obscure regulatory document can sway the government's approach to protecting public health.

DOJ_NMG_0139838

Industry representatives say they trust Guidance #152's calculation that cefquinome should be approved. "There is reasonable certainty of no harm to public health," Carl Johnson, InterVet's director of product development, told the FDA last fall.

Others say Guidance #152 makes it too difficult for the FDA to say no to some drugs.

"The industry says that 'until you show us a direct link to human mortality from the use of these drugs in animals, we don't think you should preclude their use,' " said Edward Belongia, an epidemiologist at the Marshfield Clinic Research Foundation in Wisconsin. "But do we really want to drive more resistance genes into the human population? It's easy to open the barn door, but it's hard to close the door once it's open."

The FDA knows how hard it can be to close that door. In the mid-1990s, overriding the objections of public health experts from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), the drug agency approved the marketing of two drugs, Baytril and SaraFlox, for use in poultry. Both are fluoroquinolones, a class of drugs important for their ability to fight the bioterror bacterium that causes anthrax and a food-borne bacterium called campylobacter, which causes a serious diarrheal disease in people.

Before long, doctors began finding fluoroquinolone-resistant strains of campylobacter in patients hospitalized with severe diarrhea. When studies showed a link to poultry, the FDA sought a ban. But while Abbott Laboratories, which made SaraFlox, pulled its product, Baytril's manufacturer, Bayer Corp., pushed back.

"They fought this tooth and nail. It took years," said Kirk Smith, an epidemiologist at the Minnesota Department of Health.

Finally, late in 2005, Bayer gave up, but not before fluoroquinolone resistance had spread even further.A Question of Resistance

Microbes are constantly mutating, and some of those mutations happen to confer immunity to one drug or another. Exacerbating the problem, bacteria constantly exchange bits of DNA with each other, spreading that resistance.

Given those realities, experts agree that all antibiotics should be used judiciously.

"If a drug is used less, then less resistance emerges," said Patricia Griffin, chief of intestinal disease epidemiology for the CDC.

Prudence is especially important for medicines of last resort, which is why the cefquinome application stirred such a storm.

Cefquinome is a fourth-generation cephalosporin, the most recent of several steadily improving versions of the cephalosporin family of antibiotics. Only one medicine from that family has been approved in the United States -- a powerful human drug called cefepime (brand name Maxipime), which is the only effective treatment for serious infections in cancer patients and a reliable lifesaver against several other nearly invincible infections.

InterVet developed cefquinome to treat bovine respiratory disease, the most common disease in cattle. Recognizing the potential public health implications of using a close cousin of cefepime in animals, the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine, which oversees animal drug approvals, convened its expert advisers in September.

One of the first things the group learned was that more than a dozen medicines are already on the market for the respiratory syndrome, and all are still effective.

"If we have no susceptibility problem, why do we need one more new drug?" asked James E. Leggett Jr., a professor of medicine at Oregon Health & Science University, whom the FDA brought in as a consultant on the cefquinome question.

The panel also learned that the disease would be a relatively minor issue but for the stressful conditions under which U.S. cattle are raised, including high-density living spaces and routine shipment on crowded trains for hundreds or thousands of miles. Those "production dynamics" suppress the animals' immune systems, explained feedlot consultant Kelly Lechtenberg of Oakland, Neb., and virtually guarantee that bovine respiratory disease will be a major problem.

Yet Stephen Sundlof, head of the FDA's Veterinary Medicine Center, told the panel members that under agency rules they should ignore those issues and consider only the language in Guidance #152.Flaws Seen in Rules

Guidance #152 is essentially a checklist of points to consider when weighing the potential human impact of a new animal drug.

After the Baytril debacle, the public health community embraced the idea of a guidance document. A formalized risk-assessment process promised to minimize the chances of making a bad regulatory call.

But a struggle ensued when the FDA hosted meetings to spell out the criteria to be used for measuring risk, often with veterinarians and veterinary drug companies on one side and doctors and public health experts on the other.

DOJ_NMG_0139839

When differences could not be resolved after repeated drafts and months of work, the agency sidestepped some tough issues and adopted language that both sides agree can block approval of the most worrisome drugs -- those such as Baytril that are put in animal feed or water, and so are easily overused. But public health experts say the wording tilts the playing field toward industry for other kinds of drugs. They want to see it revised.

Most glaring, they say, is that the guidance makes it almost impossible to say no to a new animal drug unless it is likely to threaten the effectiveness of an antibiotic that is a critical player against food-borne illnesses. By contrast, the World Health Organization recommends saying no if approval would spur resistance to any antibiotic that is important for fighting "serious human disease" -- not just food-borne illnesses.

Cefquinome's primary threat is that it may undermine the usefulness of the closely related human drug, cefepime. But as it turns out, the FDA does not consider cefepime a front-line drug against food-borne infections. So although it is a highly important drug in human medicine generally -- and although the Infectious Diseases Society of America even recommends it against some food-borne bacteria -- that risk does not count under the terms of Guidance #152.

A related problem is that the guidance's definition of "food-borne" is conservative, said Margaret Mellon of the Union of Concerned Scientists, a science policy advocacy group. For example, most urinary tract infections are caused by intestinal bacteria acquired from food, and cefepime is prescribed for those infections. If the FDA counted those infections as food-borne, then the guidance's formula would call for rejecting cefquinome for cattle.

"But FDA didn't do that," Mellon said. "That restricted the analysis right there."

Moreover, the guidance does not take into account that when microbes become resistant to fourth-generation cephalosporins, they often gain resistance to third-generation versions, too.

Third-generation cephalosporins are among the only effective therapies for serious gastrointestinal diseases in children and are the sole therapies for many cases of meningitis. That means the emergence of resistance to fourth-generation cephalosporins "could have a much more far-reaching effect" than is considered under the terms of Guidance #152, John H. Powers, a medical officer at the FDA's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research, told the agency's panel of experts.How Great a Risk?

Richard Carnevale, vice president for scientific and regulatory affairs at the Animal Health Institute, which represents veterinary drugmakers, said critics should not presume that a dozen drugs effective against bovine respiratory syndrome are enough.

"It's not a question of whether there is a need or not," Carnevale said. "The answer is, there's always a need."

The institute contends that the risk to human health posed by animal antibiotics has been overblown.

Officials at InterVet declined several requests to be interviewed. In a statement, the company said it "fully supports the prudent use of antibiotics in animals."

The statement also said that in Europe, fourth-generation cephalosporins similar to cefquinome have been used in animals for the past decade "without compromising the interests of public health."

Yet recent European data indicate that resistance against this class of antibiotics is on the rise.

An analysis of E. coli bacteria in pigs and other animals in Spain, published in December, found high levels of the resistance that renders fourth-generation cephalosporins useless. A January report from Britain documented similar resistance patterns emerging at 10 farms.

Microbes resistant to fourth-generation cephalosporins have also begun to pop up in European patients. Such resistance is virtually unknown in the United States, where fourth-generation cefepime has been used in patients since 1997. That suggests that the resistance emerging in Europe is a result of veterinary use, said Steve Roach of the Food Animal Concerns Trust, a Chicago public interest group.

Roach says he is concerned that history is about to repeat itself. U.S. cattle were free of bacteria resistant to third-generation cephalosporins in 1997, but by 2003 one of every five samples was resistant. "This is exactly what should be avoided with cefquinome," he said.Merely Suggestions

DOJ_NMG_0139840

At the FDA advisory meeting in September, the agency's experts defied Guidance #152 and voted 6 to 4 against approval of cefquinome. But that day, and in follow-up interviews, Sundlof, the agency's veterinary chief, made it plain that the vote was "not binding."

"I think we all agreed . . . that Guidance for Industry #152 would be the criteria against which we would base our decisions on safety," Sundlof said at the meeting.

Concerned that the FDA is poised to approve cefquinome, Congress's only microbiologist recently wrote to the agency.

"Given the recent outbreaks of E. coli and other food borne illnesses across the nation, it is hardly the time to ignore the advice of scientists, and potentially impair our ability to treat deadly infections," wrote Rep. Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.), who chairs the House Rules Committee.

Yet, being realists, the FDA advisers in September said more than just no. They told the FDA that if it approves cefquinome, then it should at least impose limits to minimize the potential consequences. One suggestion was to explicitly preclude "off label" use of the drug -- that is, to tell veterinarians that it can be used only for bovine respiratory disease.

But Sundlof said that, under FDA rules, those decisions must be left up to veterinarians unless there is clear evidence that wider use is causing harm.

"We have to take a fairly legal interpretation," Sundlof said in an interview. "If we have no evidence of a problem, or sparse evidence, we would not be able to make the prohibition prior to approval."

However, raising a point that opponents do not find very reassuring, he noted: "As soon as we have the first glimpse of evidence that off-label use of a drug is causing resistance, we have the authority to prohibit off-label use."

The advisers also urged that as a condition of approval, the FDA should demand that InterVet provide annual reports on how much cefquinome was used and in which animals -- data that would help scientists detect links between the drug's use and patterns of resistance that emerge in people.

"Without reliable, meaningful data on the quantity of use, the purpose of use, the type, number and location of animals treated, it will be exceedingly difficult to interpret fluctuations in rates of resistance," said Susan Prolman of the Union of Concerned Scientists.

But Sundlof offered little hope for that outcome.

"That is information that would be useful to have," he said. But the agency does not have the authority to demand it.

Public Health Agency Linked To Chemical Industry (LAT)

By Marla Cone

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

The work of a federal risk-assessment center is guided by a company with manufacturing ties. Some scientists see bias.

For nearly a decade, a federal agency has been responsible for assessing the dangers that chemicals pose to reproductive health. But much of the agency's work has been conducted by a private consulting company that has close ties to the chemical industry, including manufacturers of a compound in plastics that has been linked to reproductive damage.

In 1998, the Center for the Evaluation of Risks to Human Reproduction was established within the National Institutes of Health to assess the dangers of chemicals and help determine which ones should be regulated. Sciences International, an Alexandria, Va., consulting firm that has been funded by more than 50 industrial companies, has played a key role in the center's activities, reviewing the risks of chemicals, preparing reports, and helping select members of its scientific review panel and setting their agendas, according to government and company documents.

The company produces the first draft of the center's reports on the risks of chemicals, including a new one on bisphenol A, a widely used compound in polycarbonate plastic food containers, including baby bottles, as well as lining for food cans.

The center's work is considered important to public health because people are exposed to hundreds of chemicals that have been shown to skew the reproductive systems of newborn lab animals and could be causing similar damage in humans. Chemical companies and industry groups have staunchly opposed regulation of the compounds and have developed their own research to dispute studies by government and university scientists.

DOJ_NMG_0139841

The bisphenol A report, which some scientists say has a pro-industry bias, is a public document scheduled for review by the center's scientific panel on Monday. Employees of Sciences International involved in writing it will preside over the meeting.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) in a Wednesday letter called for an explanation of the company's role and disclosure of its potential conflicts of interest before the panel convenes Monday. Boxer chairs the Senate's environmental committee and Waxman chairs the House's government oversight and reform committee.

Sciences International executives declined to comment to The Times, referring all questions to the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences.

Michael Shelby, director of the federal reproductive health center, which is based in North Carolina's Research Triangle Park, also declined to discuss Sciences International.

But Robin Mackar, a spokeswoman for the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, which oversees the reproductive center, said Sciences International "has worked for the center since 1998 without any problems" and has participated in reports on 17 chemicals.

"These contractors have no decision-making or analytical responsibilities," she said.

But according to company and government websites and Federal Register documents, Sciences International is involved in management and plays a principal scientific investigative role at the federal center. The company has a $5-million contract with the center, according to an NIEHS document.

"The most significant project at our firm is the management of the National Toxicology Program's Center for the Evaluation of Risks to Human Reproduction," the Sciences International website says. It says half its clients are from the private sector, but its health studies are independent and it "is proud of its reputation for objective science."

Its current website contains no list of industry clients. But a 2006 version names BASF and Dow Chemical — which manufacture the plastics compound BPA — as well as DuPont, Chevron, ExxonMobil, 3-M, Union Carbide, the National Assn. of Manufacturers, and 45 other manufacturing companies and industry groups.

In 1999, Sciences International represented R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. in fighting an Environmental Protection Agency proposal to regulate a pesticide used on tobacco crops. In 2004, its vice president, Dr. Anthony Scialli, who is identified as the federal center's "principal investigator," co-wrote a study with a Dow Chemical Co. researcher on how to extrapolate data from animal tests to humans.

In addition, another Sciences International employee who works at the federal agency, Gloria Jahnke, has collaborated nine times on chemicals research with another company that gets funding from the plastics industry, according to a Times review of medical publications.

Sciences International's president boasted about its close collaboration with the federal reproductive health center, as well as the EPA and other federal agencies, in a letter soliciting R.J. Reynolds as a client in 1999.

Signed by company founder Elizabeth Anderson, the letter stated that Sciences International "serves the private sector, including many trade associations, on a wide range of health and risk assessment issues. However, we are different from most other consulting firms in that we also currently serve government agencies," which, the letter said, gives the company "a unique credibility to negotiate with regulators on behalf of our private sector clients."

The role of Sciences International in the federal center's work came to the attention of Environmental Working Group, a nonprofit advocacy group focused on environmental health, last month after some scientists who saw the report on BPA complained that it was biased toward the industry's position that low doses have no effect.

"We are unaware of any other instance in which nearly all of the functions of a public health agency have been outsourced to a private entity," wrote Richard Wiles, the working group's executive director, in a letter to the director of the NIH's National Toxicology Program, which runs the reproductive health center. "Questions about the objectivity and adequacy of this review process and the reviewers must be resolved before a final decision on BPA is reached."

Debate over BPA is one of the most contentious environmental health issues faced by government and industry. Traces are found in the bodies of nearly all Americans tested, and low levels — similar to amounts that can leach from infant and water bottles — mimic estrogen and have caused genetic changes in animals that lead to prostate cancer, as well as decreased testosterone, low sperm counts and signs of early female puberty, according to more than 100 government-funded studies. About a dozen industry-funded studies found no effects.

DOJ_NMG_0139842

Fred vom Saal, a University of Missouri-Columbia scientist conducting NIH-funded BPA research, said the draft report written by Sciences International downplays the risks of the plastics chemical and makes critical mistakes.

"It's a combination of inaccurate information and blatant bias as it exists in its draft form," vom Saal said. "They specifically ignore fatal flaws in industry-sponsored publications." He said the 300-page report misrepresented government-funded studies that found effects by inaccurately portraying their findings, and failed to note industry funding of some studies cited.

Shelby, the center's director, in a late February memo to the Environmental Working Group, said Sciences International reviews the scientific literature on chemicals and writes the basic reports, but that conclusions are prepared by the center's panel of independent scientists, which "serves to minimize or eliminate any bias that might possibly be introduced by the contractor."

Shelby wrote that there are no requirements for Sciences International or other contractors to disclose financial conflicts of interest.

Mackar, of the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, said the chemical reviews are "all open and public" and "we're confident in our scientific panel."

But Vom Saal said that although the scientific panel includes many good, independent scientists, "none of them have expertise with this chemical."

A Federal Register document describing the center's creation in 1998 said scientists from Sciences International and the center "constitute a core committee" that "selects the expert panel membership and establishes the meeting agenda."

Why They Fight (NYT)

By Jacob Heilbrunn

The New York Times Book Review, March 4, 2007

George W. Bush, reviled by the left ever since he became president, has recently accomplished the feat of acquiring a new and unlikely set of detractors. The longer he flounders in domestic and foreign policy, the more a vocal contingent of intellectuals and columnists allied to the Republican Party is attacking him. Unlike that of most Bush critics, however, their complaint isn't that the president has veered too far to the right. It's that he isn't conservative enough.

In "Leviathan on the Right," Michael D. Tanner offers the fullest exposition of this line of reasoning to date. Tanner, the director of health and welfare studies at the libertarian Cato Institute, comes not to bury but to resurrect the conservative cause. By exposing Bush and the Republican leadership as apostates who foolishly believe big government can be employed for conservative ends, Tanner hopes to persuade the right to return to what he sees as its original ideals of limited government and individual responsibility.

To dramatize this fall from grace, Tanner evokes a lost conservative golden age that stretched from Barry Goldwater to Ronald Reagan. Goldwater, the founding father of modern conservatism, prepared the stage for the revolt against big government that eventually swept the country and allowed Reagan to win the presidency in 1980. Reagan, Tanner suggests, was a paragon of fiscal restraint: he boldly declared in his first Inaugural Address that he intended to "curb the size and influence of the federal establishment." Reagan's successes, though, were quickly frittered away by his pallid successor, George H. W. Bush — "a man of no discernible ideology, who allowed government to begin growing again."

This was not all. The Republican class of 1994, which had championed the rollback of the federal government, became the cat's-paw of K Street lobbyists. By 2006, Republican legislators were approving billions in pork barrel spending, thereby replicating the corruption of the Democrats that had originally allowed the Republican Party to take power. In Tanner's view, Bush himself has been no better: while his sweeping tax cuts are laudable, he has presided over the creation of new federal agencies like the Homeland Security Department and spent wildly.

Who are the intellectual authors of the Bush administration's deviation from free-market orthodoxy? Tanner fingers neoconservatives like Irving Kristol who he thinks have always been dangerously complacent about accepting the existence of the welfare state, hoping to reform rather than abolish it outright. Matters only worsened with the advent of a younger generation of neoconservatives led by the Weekly Standard editor William Kristol and the New York Times columnist David Brooks, who tout a "national greatness conservatism." Tanner rebukes them for being "suspicious of unfettered free-market capitalism" and for rejecting "the primacy of individual choice." As he sees it, the neoconservatives, like the religious right, are dangerously obsessed with trying to legislate morality through socially responsible government programs.

DOJ_NMG_0139843

Tanner is a lucid writer and vigorous polemicist who scores a number of points against the Republican Party's fiscal transgressions, but he has ultimately produced a fairy tale. The notion that Reagan actually fought for small government is wishful thinking. The Gipper didn't abolish a single major federal agency, he strengthened Social Security by approving a payroll tax hike and he added $1.4 trillion to the national debt. It was Bill Clinton who left behind a $236 billion surplus in 2000, which Bush promptly squandered. Contrary to Tanner and many other Reagan idolaters, Bush hasn't forsaken Reagan's legacy; by engaging in simultaneous tax cuts, massive military spending and deficit spending, he has continued it.

What's more, Tanner glides rather easily from linking the corruption of the Republican Congress to big government. There is no necessary connection between the two. The fact that a Republican Congress looted the government on behalf of big business and itself does not discredit Social Security, Medicare and a host of other programs. It simply testifies to the venality of the Republican Congress. Perhaps Tanner's most questionable claim is that "politically, for all the internal disagreements, support for a strong national defense remains the glue that holds the various wings of the Republican Party together. The debate that will truly matter is whether or not conservatives still believe in small government." Like it or not, conservatives such as Tanner will have to grapple with the political, moral and fiscal consequences of an imperial foreign policy.

At first glance, Joe Conason's "It Can Happen Here" — a play on the title of Sinclair Lewis's 1935 dystopian novel, "It Can't Happen Here" — might seem to provide a valuable opportunity to do just that. Conason, a liberal columnist for The New York Observer and the author of "Big Lies" and "The Raw Deal," surveys the concentration of corporate and political power in Washington. He ably catalogs the Bush administration's attempts to subvert civil liberties. But it soon becomes apparent that he has a proclivity for substituting hyperbole for insight.

Conason briskly arraigns the usual suspects: Bush and the neoconservatives, for conducting an Iraq war he believes was launched partly to deflect attention from mounting corporate scandals; the political theorist and neoconservative mentor Leo Strauss; and Roger Ailes of Fox News, which the author says has a "journalistically illicit relationship" with the Bush administration. In Conason's view, Bush and Dick Cheney relied on "an enormous organizational apparatus ... in and around the Republican Party" as they "swept aside law, liberty and tradition to implement their new order." In case that allusion to the Third Reich's "New Order" is too ambiguous, Conason also refers to "the direction of dictatorship" and "potential tyranny."

The Bush administration has trampled on the intelligence reforms that Congress passed in the mid-1970s. But Conason appears to view the administration's machinations with something approaching lascivious horror. His language is seldom less than apocalyptic: "It is possible that the future of democratic governance in America will be determined in the final two years of the Bush presidency, when the Republicans may yet secure a court majority that reinterprets the Constitution as a mandate for theocratic dominion and untrammeled presidential power. That would raise the real prospect of an authoritarian regime acting under color of the Constitution and the law while eviscerating both." In his zeal to indict the Republicans, Conason sounds as strident as Karl Rove depicting the Democrats as gutless appeasers.

It's also the case that Conason's alarmism inadvertently buys into Bush and Cheney's own hokum by attributing a kind of implacable and infallible power to the administration. Whatever its intentions, however, the hallmark of the administration hasn't turned out to be Machiavellian cunning but sheer ineptitude. Rather like the American cold warriors who insisted that the Soviet Union was vying for world domination even as it was going poof in the late 1980s, Conason seems reluctant to recognize that the conservative movement has been heading toward collapse. Far from consolidating a right-wing dictatorship, Bush's actual political legacy may well turn out to be resuscitating American liberalism.

OTHER NEWS:

The Return Of Volatility (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Investors may have the jitters, but politicians could always make it worse by overreacting to them.

DOJ_NMG_0139844

THE REMARKABLE THING about last week's harrowing stock market plunge was how remarkable it was. And that's because for all the talk of the dangers of a post-9/11 world vulnerable to terrorism, oil shocks, warfare and rising anti-Americanism, the last few years have been unusually prosperous and stable for the global economy. Indeed, before Tuesday, when the Dow Jones industrial average fell 3.3%, the index was enjoying its longest run since 1954 without a 2% single-day decline.

Around the world, economic stability has made investors somewhat cavalier about risk. Lower-risk premiums required for everything from sovereign nations' bonds to margin stock trading in China and sub-prime mortgage lending in the United States have made this a time of plentiful, cheap capital. Last week's sell-off, triggered by the Shanghai exchange's 9% drop Tuesday, reintroduced investors to the concept of risk — fear even — and the dangers of getting overextended.

The U.S. economy remains solid, but a "soft landing" is still a landing. Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan pointed out last week that the slowdown in corporate profits is a sign that "we are in the later stages of a cycle."

Last week was also a reminder of the growing interdependence of global markets. Unfortunately, the days when President Clinton and Treasury Secretary Robert E. Rubin could quickly reassure markets as an overseas financial crises loomed, and reaffirm the desirability of stronger links between the U.S. and other economies, are long gone. In a far more protectionist climate that is wary of the outside world, there is a danger that both Republican and Democratic members of Congress will unleash a political backlash to relatively minor financial hiccups, which could trigger a financial panic or even a recession.

It would be a disaster, for instance, if Congress allowed the president's trade promotion authority — under which he can negotiate trade deals that Congress must put to an up-or-down vote — to lapse, or if it persists in erecting new roadblocks to foreign investment in this country.

And then there is the incessant temptation to vilify China. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who should know better given the example set by her husband, used the Shanghai sell-off to issue a statement expressing concern about the amount of U.S. public debt owned by China and the ensuing "erosion of U.S. economic sovereignty." The fact that foreigners, including China's central bank, are eager to invest in the U.S. economy has been a huge benefit to American living standards and a win-win for the global economy. Pressed on CNBC whether she would propose limiting the amount of Treasury bills foreigners could purchase, Clinton said "not at this time."

Even assuming she was merely pandering to xenophobic voices in her party, it's not encouraging. If enough politicians follow her lead, modest financial corrections could turn into greater trouble for the U.S. economy.

Romney Wins Conservatives' Straw Poll (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Giuliani, Brownback Next in CPAC Vote

Presidential candidate and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney yesterday won a straw poll of conservative political activists gathered in Washington, a very early indication of how an important Republican constituency might vote.

Romney was the first choice for the GOP nomination, with 21 percent of the 1,705 activists who voted at the 34th annual Conservative Political Action Conference. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani came in second with 17 percent, and Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) was third with 15 percent.

Last year, the activists said they preferred as their presidential candidate then- senator George Allen (Va.). He lost his reelection bid in November.

The nation's first primary is more than 10 months away, making such votes little more than a popularity contest among a slice of the population that might not represent any electorate.

But the result underscored the difficulty that one GOP candidate, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), faces in drawing conservative support because of past views and statements. McCain -- who did not attend the convention, unlike Romney and Giuliani -- came in fifth in the straw poll, and the mention of his name yesterday drew boos from the crowd.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) brought the convention to a raucous close yesterday with a speech in which he urged conservatives not to compromise and called for a broader national debate about ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0139845

He called on eventual presidential nominees to commit to nine, 90-minute debates after Labor Day 2008. "We need to find a way to have an honest dialogue that is far beyond the kind of baloney you get in nine-second sound bites," Gingrich said.

Gingrich, who has not yet said he is running for president, was virtually mobbed by the crowd as he entered the ballroom. He finished fourth in the straw poll, with 14 percent.

Conservatives Pick Romney In Straw Poll (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Despite his record on social issues, the former Massachusetts governor is the top choice for the GOP nomination.

WASHINGTON — Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney is struggling in national public opinion polls but, after a concerted effort, was named the winner Saturday of a straw poll of conservative activists at an annual gathering.

Despite skepticism about his record on social issues, the former Massachusetts governor received 21% of the 1,705 votes cast by paid attendees to the Conservative Political Action Conference who were asked to name their top choice for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, whose past positions on abortion and gay rights also stand at odds with social conservatives, came in second in the informal poll, with 17% of the votes.

Both men received standing ovations from the thousands of conservatives who gathered for three days to, among other things, assess damage to their once powerful movement inflicted by the increasingly costly war in Iraq and the 2006 election.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the only leading candidate who did not attend the event, received 12% of the votes, and the mention of his name drew occasional boos from the audience.

McCain came in behind his Senate colleague Sam Brownback of Kansas. Backed enthusiastically by social conservatives who admire his strong opposition to abortion, Brownback received 15% of the votes.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia, who hasn't decided whether to run, also topped McCain, receiving 14% in the straw vote.

Romney's win among the conservatives gathered in Washington contrasts with his showing in other polls. A Newsweek poll released this weekend shows Giuliani surging ahead of McCain and Romney among Republican voters.

The former mayor led McCain 59% to 34% in the Newsweek poll. When matched against Romney in the poll, Giuliani led the former governor 70% to 20%. In a McCain-Romney matchup, respondents preferred McCain by 59% to 26%.

Giuliani also did well when pitted against Democrats. Giuliani was closely matched against Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York in the Newsweek poll, with 47% to her 46%. When paired up against Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, he led 48% to 43%. The margin of error for the poll was 3 percentage points.

The poll provided another, incidental boost for the former mayor: Eighty-two percent of registered Republicans surveyed said a candidate's marital history was not an important consideration for them. Giuliani has been married three times.

Though behind in the polls, Romney has racked up endorsements from prominent Republican officeholders and party leaders. He has been pushing to establish his bona fides among conservatives who have openly worried about his changing positions on abortion and gay rights issues.

Romney paid the registration fees of some student attendees, and his campaign's representatives were visible throughout the conference.

Giuliani has not disavowed his advocacy on some social issues but has pledged to appoint "strict constructionist judges" if elected.

He received a warm reception when he spoke.

A ballot that combined conference attendees' first and second choices for the Republican nomination in 2008 showed Giuliani coming in first with 34%, compared with Romney and Gingrich, who were tied for second with 30%. McCain received 20% in the combined category.

DOJ_NMG_0139846

Conservatives pondering how to respond to the Democratic takeover on Capitol Hill received no shortage of recommendations during the three-day conference. Many speakers such as author and activist Richard Viguerie said party leaders had lost their way and had betrayed true conservatism.

Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty called on conservatives to address populist concerns such as healthcare, the environment and economic security.

This year's parade of candidates at the conservative gathering "is a reflection of the fact that there is no Reagan in the field," said David A. Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, which sponsored the convention. "It is not a slam dunk for anybody."

Keene said he detected a detached skepticism among this year's conventioneers.

"You see the attentiveness with which people are listening — it's not with adoration," he said. "They view themselves more as judges than advocates."

Not In Race, Gingrich Still Has Right Stuff (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

Newt Gingrich received a hero's welcome at the Conservative Political Action Conference yesterday, but it was Tom DeLay who gave the thousands of activists their marching orders: Unite conservative interest groups into a machine that can overpower the unity of their liberal counterparts.

Mr. Gingrich, who won't decide whether he will run for president until after September, tied former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney for second place in the conference's combined first- and second-choice straw poll with 30 percent each, trailing only former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who won with a combined 34 percent.

"We will not defeat the Clinton machine by being negative," Mr. Gingrich said, referring to Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. "We will defeat the Clinton machine by offering better solutions based on better values with a deeper reach into the American people's lives and psyche."

The former House speaker challenged all of the candidates to commit to a new way of conducting the last nine weeks of the presidential campaign: Forgo attack ads and meet once a week for 90-minute in-depth discussions, "no Mickey Mouse," with just a timekeeper, no moderator and no panel of questioners.

In the straw poll of 1,705 CPAC attendees who voted, Mr. Romney was the top choice of 21 percent, followed by Mr. Giuliani at 17 percent, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas at 15 percent, then Mr. Gingrich at 14 percent and Sen. John McCain of Arizona at 12 percent.

But combined with second-choice ballots, Mr. Giuliani vaulted to the top -- followed by Mr. Romney and Mr. Gingrich. Mr. Brownback was fourth, Mr. McCain fifth, and Rep. Tom Tancredo sixth with 9 percent.

The combined choice is the most important yardstick because it measures depth of support, said J. William Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union, the conference's chief sponsor.

"The Romney [second choice] number was markedly shallow at 9 percent," he said.

Mr. McCain was the only major candidate not to attend CPAC. He told Mort Kondracke of the Fox News Channel he didn't need to attend because CPAC was mostly Washington insiders.

Conference organizers said yesterday that the 5,200 people who registered for CPAC, held at the Omni Shoreham hotel in Northwest, came from 49 states, and just 15 percent were from Maryland, Virginia and the District.

"Newt Gingrich is probably the only rock star in the conservative world right now," Georgia Republican activist Phil Kent said. "You saw the energy when he entered the ballroom. I didn't see that for any of the others."

Mr. DeLay, the former House majority leader, who left Congress under the cloud of an indictment in Texas, criticized CPAC and other conservative gatherings for never offering plans of action to defeat the left. He said he is forming a Coalition for a Conservative Majority that would unite the various conservative interest groups into a single message for the conservative cause.

"When I left Congress, I had two things to do: support the conservative cause and defend Israel," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139847

Mr. DeLay said conservatives must overcome their independent streak and match liberal groups' willingness to take up each other's goals.

"You'll get abortionists working on labor policy. You'll get unions working for abortionists," he said of the liberal machine. "We need to understand that all of these conservative groups out there need to come together and work together to maximize our resources."

But some conservatives are not yet ready to forgive Mr. DeLay for saying, during the spending spree after Hurricane Katrina, that the money should be added to the deficit because Republicans had pared the budget down so well already.

"As a conservative activist, I'm still hoping he is going to retract his comments that there is not any more fat in the federal budget," said George Primbs, 44, a database marketing manager from Woodbridge, who was attending his 20th CPAC.

Speaking earlier in the day, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III called himself "the real conservative" in the race. He cited Mr. Romney's admission he voted for Democrat Paul Tsongas in 1992 and Mr. Giuliani's acknowledged vote for Democrat Mario Cuomo for New York governor in 1994 as evidence the others fall short.

"What are we expected to do?" Mr. Gilmore asked. "There is not a person in this room who was so confused in those days they would have voted for Paul Tsongas and Mario Cuomo."

He also attacked Mr. McCain, saying he fits the label "maverick" more than "conservative" for having opposed President Bush's tax cuts and supporting "amnesty" for illegal aliens.

"Gilmore had the best message, and he delivered it beautifully," said Donald J. Devine, who headed President Reagan's Office of Personnel Management.

The straw poll also made it clear that Mr. Bush is mostly irrelevant to the conservative movement. In the poll, 79 percent described themselves as a "Ronald Reagan Republican," but just 3 percent said they were a "George W. Bush Republican."

Romney Favored Among Conservatives In Straw Poll (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Mitt Romney won the most support for the Republican presidential nomination in a Saturday straw poll of GOP activists attending an annual conference.

Despite his record of inconsistency on some social issues, the former Massachusetts governor got 21 percent of the 1,705 votes cast by paid registrants to the three-day Conservative Political Action Conference.

They were asked who their first choice would be for the Republican nomination.

Rudy Giuliani, the former New York City mayor whose moderate stances on social issues irks the party's right wing, was second with 17 percent.

Both were among the more than half-dozen White House hopefuls who spoke at the conference.

Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who rounds out the top tier of serious GOP contenders, skipped the event -- and was punished for it. He got only 12 percent of the vote.

Ahead of him were Romney, Giuliani and two others. Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, a favorite of religious conservatives, got 15 percent, while former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia, who says he won't decide whether to run until the fall, got 14 percent.

Others got 5 percent or less.

A year ago, then-Virginia Sen. George Allen received 22 percent of the vote. His presidential chances evaporated last year as he struggled to win -- and eventually lost -- his Senate re-election race.

In that CPAC poll last year, McCain had 20 percent, Giuliani had 12 percent, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had 10 percent, and Gingrich had 5 percent.

G.O.P. Candidates Criticize Slur By Conservative Author (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139848

WASHINGTON, March 3 — Three of the leading Republican presidential candidates on Saturday denounced one of their party's best-known conservative commentators for using an antigay epithet when discussing a Democratic presidential contender at a gathering of conservatives here.

The remarks by Ann Coulter, an author who regularly speaks at conservative events, were sharply denounced by the candidates, Senator John McCain of Arizona, Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York and Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. Their statements came after Democrats, gay rights groups and bloggers raised a storm of protest over the remarks.

Speaking at the Conservative Political Action Conference before an overflow crowd on Friday, Ms. Coulter said, "I was going to have a few comments on the other Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, but it turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I — so kind of an impasse, can't really talk about Edwards."

Mr. Edwards's aides responded with an e-mail message that attacked Ms. Coulter and urged supporters to donate to Mr. Edwards's campaign. "John was singled out for a personal attack because the Republican establishment knows he poses the greatest threat to their power," said his campaign manager, David E. Bonior. "Since they have nothing real to use against him, Coulter's resorting to the classic right-wing strategy of riling up hate to smear a progressive champion."

Ms. Coulter, asked for a reaction to the Republican criticism, said in an e-mail message: "C'mon, it was a joke. I would never insult gays by suggesting that they are like John Edwards. That would be mean."

At the conference, she said she was likely to support Mr. Romney.

The criticisms by the Republican candidates put them in a difficult position because the Conservative Political Action Conference has been gathering for conservative and Republican leaders for over 25 years.

The speakers this year included Vice President Dick Cheney and most of the presidential candidates, whose presence suggested the political influence the group holds in the party's nominating process. Mr. Cheney was not at the event on Friday.

Of the major Republican candidates, only Mr. McCain did not attend, but he denounced her remarks on Saturday morning. "The comments were wildly inappropriate," said his spokesman, Brian Jones.

Mr. Giuliani said, "The comments were completely inappropriate and there should be no place for such name-calling in political debate."

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mr. Romney, said: "It was an offensive remark. Governor Romney believes all people should be treated with dignity and respect."

Mr. Romney preceded Ms. Coulter at the event and mentioned that she was speaking later — he jokingly referred to her as a "moderate." But he was not in the room when she spoke, Mr. Madden said.

Coulter Drops F-bomb Onto Political Battlefield (CNN)

CNN.com, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Prominent politicians from both parties and a gay-rights group on Saturday condemned right-wing commentator Ann Coulter for her reference Friday to Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards as a "faggot."

"Ann Coulter's use of an anti-gay slur yesterday was un-American and indefensible," Edwards said in a posting on his Web site, www.johnedwards.com.

"In America, we strive for equality and embrace diversity. The kind of hateful language she used has no place in political debate or our society at large.

"I believe it is our moral responsibility to speak out against that kind of bigotry and prejudice every time we encounter it."

Edwards' campaign posted the video on their Web site, and asked readers to help them "raise $100,000 in 'Coulter Cash' this week to keep this campaign charging ahead and fight back against the politics of bigotry."

Coulter made her comment in Washington during an address to the 34th annual meeting of the Conservative Political Action Conference, during which she gave her opinions about the Democrats' slate of presidential hopefuls.

"I was going to have a few comments on the other Democratic presidential candidate, John Edwards, but it turns out that you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I'm - so, kind of at an impasse, can't really talk about Edwards, so I think I'll just conclude here and take your questions," said Coulter, whose comment was followed by applause.

CNN has reached out to Coulter's representative, and received no response.

DOJ_NMG_0139849

But the New York Times reported that she responded, in an e-mail, "C'mon, it was a joke. I would never insult gays by suggesting that they are like John Edwards. That would be mean."

A spokesman for Sen. John McCain, a Republican presidential candidate, called Coulter's comments to the conservative group "wildly inappropriate."

In a written statement, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said, "Ann Coulter's words of hate have no place in the public sphere much less our political discourse. Not only should she apologize but those who participated in the conference with her should denounce her shameful and divisive actions."

"Ann Coulter's use of this anti-gay slur is vile and unacceptable," said Neil G. Giuliano, president of the Gay & Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation, "and the applause from her audience is an important reminder that Coulter's ugly brand of bigotry is at the root of the discriminatory policies being promoted at this gathering."

In a written statement, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called on Republicans to denounce her remarks. "There is no place in political discourse for this kind of hate-filled and bigoted comments," he said.

During a question-and-answer session, Coulter referred back to the issue of gays by alluding to the bid for the Republican presidential nomination being made by former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

"I do want to point out one thing that has been driving me crazy with the media -- how they keep describing Mitt Romney's position as being pro-gays, and that's going to upset the right wingers," she said. "Well, you know, screw you! I'm not anti-gay. We're against gay marriage. I don't want gays to be discriminated against."

She added, "I don't know why all gays aren't Republican. I think we have the pro-gay positions, which is anti-crime and for tax cuts. Gays make a lot of money and they're victims of crime. No, they are! They should be with us."

A spokesman for Romney called Coulter's use of the slur "offensive."

Ann Coulter, You're No Sister Souljah (POL)

By Jennifer Rubin

The Politico, March 3, 2007

Ann Coulter is not African-American, does not sing and never said “If black people kill black people every day, why not have a week and kill white people?” However, she is the closest the Republicans will get to Sister Souljah.

Coulter has made a career of interspersing insightful and cutting political criticism with outrageous and morally repugnant remarks. She attracted considerable attention with her crack about the group of 9/11 widows dubbed the “Jersey girls,” with a line in one of her books, “These broads are millionaires, lionized on TV and in articles about them, reveling in their status as celebrities and stalked by grief-arazzis. These self-obsessed women seemed genuinely unaware that 9/11 was an attack on our nation and acted as if the terrorist attacks happened only to them. ... I’ve never seen people enjoying their husbands' deaths so much.”

Then, there was her crack about Muslims at last year’s Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC): “I think our motto should be post-9-11, ‘rag head talks tough, rag head faces consequences.’” At CPAC on Thursday, in endorsing Republican presidential aspirant Mitt Romney, who needs more bad press like a hole in the head, she piped up with this one: “I was going to say something about John Edwards, but it turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word ‘faggot.’”

It's about time for a presidential contender, perhaps all of them in the spirit of Newt Gingrich’s crusade for improving public discourse, to say “enough.” Coulter’s never-ending stream of venom is not amusing, unhelpful to Republicans, and not in keeping with the ideals of a party that fancies itself as the proponent of a colorblind society and heir to Lincoln.

It is not “caving” into political correctness to distance and indeed condemn such remarks as unworthy of a political event like CPAC. To the contrary, it is altogether fitting that a group that ostensibly searches for the best in conservative ideas, rewards political courage and encourages intellectual debate, should be able to differentiate the amusing from the offensive, and the clever from the vile.

Conservatives take great glee in condemning ideological opponents who share stages with Al Sharpton or give a convention seat to Michael Moore. It would certainly boost their credibility to toss their own baggage out.

DOJ_NMG_0139850

Would it be a stunt to call out Coulter, who obviously revels in the attention of provocative pronouncements? No. Excommunication is not being suggested, just a public rebuke. By clearly stating her comments are beyond the bounds of civil discourse and her presence not a welcome addition to a mature political party, the Republicans could do themselves a world of good. How often does a party have the opportunity to display some measure of dignity, restraint and self-reflection.?

So who will play the role of Bill Clinton to Coulter's Sister Souljah? It would be a sad commentary on the GOP if the answer is "no one."

Jennifer Rubin is a writer who lives in Virginia. Her columns appear in the Weekly Standard, the American Spectator, Human Events, abc.com and National Review Online.

Giuliani Has No Real Chance With GOP Voters... Or Does He? (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

The 2008 presidential campaign is just weeks old, but already an article of faith within the Republican Party -- the belief that no politician who favors abortion rights and gay rights can win the GOP nomination -- is being challenged by the candidacy of former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

The man who was named Time magazine's "Person of the Year" for his response to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks is now leading in a slew of national polls. He is testing whether cultural and religious conservatives in the GOP will support a candidate who offers strong leadership on security and terrorism rather than ideological purity on social issues.

"This is the first Republican presidential primary since Sept. 11," said Ed Gillespie, a former Republican National Committee chairman who is neutral in the nominating battle. "Rudy Giuliani is a candidate who can clearly test the proposition that a Republican who is more moderate on social issues can capture the nomination. He's testing it now."

Whit Ayres, a Georgia-based Republican pollster, said he has been struck by the number of conservatives he has encountered who disagree with Giuliani on abortion or gay rights but are still attracted to him as a possible Republican nominee. The issue is whether that appeal can survive a long campaign in which Giuliani's New York record, his position on issues, his three marriages and his complex business dealings will be subjected to withering scrutiny.

"It truly is the question in Republican presidential politics at the moment," Ayres said. "There are a lot of people with a more traditional view who think that his leading in the polls is just a mirage and that he has no real chance. I don't believe that. I think there's more to this than simply name ID. "

Many GOP strategists still question whether Giuliani can survive the scrutiny and develop a message that appeals to voters across the spectrum of Republican conservatism. Based on his speech Friday at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington, there are good reasons for doubt. Giuliani highlighted his record as a tax cutter, crime fighter and welfare reformer. But he offered little resembling a traditional conservative agenda for the future, other than saying the United States must remain on offense against terrorism. The speech won a polite but hardly enthusiastic response from the audience of activists.

Still, the former mayor's decision to show up at a conference that the other leading candidate for the nomination, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), skipped may earn some goodwill with an audience not predisposed to support him.

His strength in recent national polls and some state polls has already prompted many strategists, including some in rival camps, to reexamine their long-held assumptions about a party that is approaching not only its first nomination battle since the terrorist attacks but also the first since the 2006 midterm elections, which put Democrats back into power in Washington. With President Bush's approval ratings still low, Republicans are looking for a winner.

For many months, McCain has been seen as the closest thing there is to a front-runner in the Republican contest. But Giuliani has emerged not only as the popular choice for the GOP nomination but also as the Republican candidate who is currently most highly regarded by the American people -- Republicans, Democrats and independents alike.

The latest Washington Post-ABC News poll showed Giuliani leading McCain 44 percent to 21 percent, with former House speaker Newt Gingrich at 15 percent and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney at 4 percent. A month ago, Giuliani's lead was much narrower: 34 percent to 27 percent. Without Gingrich in the field, the most recent poll showed Giuliani's margin over McCain was 53 percent to 23 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0139851

A veteran Republican strategist, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to candidly assess the situation, said he is among those who long believed that a Republican with Giuliani's profile would have no chance. He still believes the former mayor faces significant obstacles but said the odds of Giuliani winning the nomination are not as remote as they once seemed.

He gave three reasons: the absence of a strong, traditional conservative in the GOP field; continuing antipathy among many social and religious conservatives toward McCain; and the prospect of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) becoming the next president.

Giuliani "looks like he can beat Hillary, make the party competitive again in the Northeast, competitive again in California and allow us to keep our strong electoral advantage in the South and Rocky Mountain states," the strategist said.

The former mayor's campaign team believes it has found a credible path to the nomination. Its foundation is a conclusion that while the overwhelming majority of Republicans differ with Giuliani on abortion, gay rights and gun control, a much smaller percentage of GOP primary voters -- perhaps no more than a quarter -- are single-issue voters who would never vote for him because of his views on those issues, a percentage borne out by the latest Post-ABC News poll.

Giuliani's advisers see that as a reason for optimism. They say those findings still leave a significant majority of the party beginning the campaign open to his candidacy, and they think the more he can emphasize his conservatism on issues such as taxes, welfare and crime, as well as his leadership on national security issues, the more voters are likely to back him.

"Rudy Giuliani and Republican voters are going to find a tremendous amount of common ground on a wide variety of issues important to Republican voters," said Mike DuHaime, Giuliani's campaign manager.

That raises the question of what it would say about the Republican Party if Giuliani were to become the nominee. Joe Gaylord, a GOP strategist close to Gingrich, said Giuliani's well-deserved celebrity appeal from his Sept. 11 response is a powerful attribute in the current environment. But he gave voice to something other Republican strategists are saying, which is that if Giuliani were to win the nomination, "this is a different Republican Party than I know."

Giuliani's advisers also challenge the assumption that he is doing well among Republicans because they remember his post-Sept. 11 job performance but know little about his positions on social issues. They believe that many Republicans are aware of both sides of the story and still find him an attractive candidate. Even some strategists in rival campaigns share that view, based on their own analyses.

Another factor may be working in Giuliani's favor. Many big states -- California, New Jersey and Florida among them -- could hold their primaries Feb. 5. If the former mayor survives early tests in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, his advisers argue, he will be positioned to do well in the larger states.

Social conservatives make up a significant portion of the GOP primary and caucus electorates in South Carolina and Iowa -- about two-thirds of South Carolina Republican voters oppose abortion, for example. The role of social conservatives is considered to be less decisive in New Hampshire, where low taxes are a bigger priority among GOP voters than abortion.

"I believe the compression [of the nomination] calendar helps us," DuHaime said.

All that assumes that Giuliani's early strength is not a mirage and that he finds a way to transcend his disagreements with conservatives. GOP strategists say he cannot change his positions, as Romney has done in some cases, but Giuliani's advisers believe he can reassure conservatives that he is not bent on a change in party orthodoxy.

On social issues, Giuliani has tried to shift the focus from his positions on abortion and gay rights to his argument that, as president, he would appoint federal judges akin to Supreme Court Justices Antonin Scalia and Samuel A. Alito Jr. His record in New York does not necessarily support that, according to an analysis recently published in the Politico, but a Giuliani adviser said the selection process there is quite different.

Giuliani's having been married three times could hamper his efforts to appeal to culturally conservative voters, although Gingrich faces the same issue if he enters the race. Similarly, Giuliani may have to answer for his past association with former New York police commissioner Bernard B. Kerik, who was forced to withdraw as Bush's nominee to be secretary of homeland security.

Other Republicans will be watching for signs that Giuliani's candidacy is built for the long haul. Right now, he trails McCain and Romney in building a national network of organizations. Giuliani has substantial fundraising appeal, but his first-quarter numbers, due at the end of this month, will be an indicator of whether he can tap his full potential. His skills as a campaigner will undergo continual examination.

DOJ_NMG_0139852

"I think that people like him, and likeability is a big, big factor in presidential politics," a senior Republican strategist said. "Right now, I think his numbers reflect that. As you get closer to the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary, likeability may give way to vote-determinative issues, like abortion."

Said Ayres: "I don't think there's any question those issues will come into play. The question is, will they get traction?"

Romney Values Old Time Religion (NHUL)

By Garry Rayno

New Hampshire Union Leader, March 4, 2007

MANCHESTER – Presidential candidate Mitt Romney said the Judeo Christian values that helped found America continue to guide the country today.

On the campaign trail and in the media, Romney has faced questions about his Mormon faith and whether it could hurt his chances to win the Republican Party's nomination.

"The fundamental principle of faith of Judeo Christian (belief) is there is a God, who is our heavenly Father and all the people on this earth and every speck of humanity on this earth is a creation of God ... And every creation of humanity is a child of God," Romney told the New Hampshire Union Leader and Sunday News in an interview last week.

While this country welcomes Muslims, Hindus, Buddhists and other faiths, he said, the Judeo Christian tradition remains its foundation.

Romney's positions on abortion, same-sex marriages and stem cell research have changed and are now in line with religious conservatives. Once a moderate on social issues, Romney now says: "If you had somebody in the private sector who didn't change their mind when they knew they were wrong, you fired them because they were stubborn.

"I'm happy to admit when I make mistakes and go on. And my experience is that to the voters, the response is overwhelmingly positive: 'We've got a guy who'll admit his mistakes, tell us what he's going to do and he'll honor that,'" Romney told the Associated Press after an appearance in Concord Thursday.

Having Judeo Christian values also means as a people, Americans reach out to people in need, he said at the New Hampshire Union Leader and Sunday News offices. "When we see people suffering, we feel as though it's a brother or a sister suffering," said Romney, who has a vacation home in Wolfeboro.

Seeing what is going on in Darfur, Sudan, brings pain to people's hearts, he said, just as the world's problems cause concerns.

Romney said he believes the First Amendment of the Constitution has been misinterpreted to mean that no religion should be established. Instead, he said, some believe that means establishing secularism, which is not a religion.

Romney said he would retain the word "God" in the Pledge of Allegiance to the flag, on U.S. money and in public places. "They give us a sense of remembrance of who we are and we are all related through our Divine heritage," he said. "There is a creator, and we are the family of humankind."

America's culture is what has made the country successful and the power it is, Romney said. "By in large, we are a God-fearing people."

But he noted, American culture is under attack by radical Islamists, by the economies of China and India and from within by problems such as out-of-control immigration and too many people without access to health care.

"The family structure is critical to our society. We will not succeed if 60 percent of our children are born out of wedlock," he said.

But, he added, "I'm not wringing my hands with worry. America does well when faced by challenges ... Washington is the problem. It's not a Republican or a Democratic thing."

Romney portrayed himself as an outsider who is not a career politician and is willing to work in a bipartisan manner to make needed changes.

DOJ_NMG_0139853

"I am not a life-long politician. I'm in this because I care about my kids and my grandkids and I care about your kids and grandkids," Romney said.

He said he does not want America to become the "France of the 21st century," noting that France began the 20th century as a world power, but lost that designation by the end of the century.

America still has time to deal with the issues that must be addressed in order to avoid a similar fate, Romney said.

He said the United States needs to do more to free itself from the grip of oil-producing countries, many of which are not friendly. "It's like paying the cannibals to eat you last," he said.

Romney, who as Massachusetts governor opposed a proposed wind farm off Cape Cod, said he would favor such a proposal in Buzzard's Bay. "I'd be happy to have a wind farm, but not in Nantucket Sound, or the Grand Canyon, or Chesapeake Bay or the Bay of Fundy," he said.

Along with alternative energy sources, the country needs to strive for greater energy efficiencies, Romney said. This country has yet to make a real effort to save energy, he noted, saying it cannot be done in 10 years, but could be accomplished in 20 years.

If the country becomes energy independent, he noted, it would not have to deal with someone like Hugo Chavez, the president of Venezuela, who is providing cheap heating oil to low-income residents of many Northeastern states, while severely criticizing the Bush administration.

"We have stopped thinking about Latin America in this country and we need to change that," Romney said.

He first gained national recognition for his role in turning around the 2002 Winter Olympics.

From 1978 to 1984, Romney was vice president at Bain & Company, Inc. In 1984, he founded Bain Capital, a venture capital and investment company.

Romney received his B.A. from Brigham Young University in 1971, and was awarded an MBA from Harvard Business School, and received his law degree, cum laude, from Harvard Law School.

Auditor Kicked Off Campaign (TSSC)

The State, March 4, 2007

MYRTLE BEACH — Lois Eargle felt the sting of the political whip this week when she was one of two people cut from a presidential campaign for making unpopular remarks.

Eargle, the Horry County auditor, knows she'll be taking the lashes for a long time just by looking at the fate of the other person dropped by the Duncan Hunter campaign — Henry Jordan, whose words have stuck with him for a decade.

"I guess, darling, just to put it in a nutshell, that's politics," she said.

Ten years ago during a school board meeting, former board member Jordan said, "Screw the Buddhists and kill the Muslims," adding, "And put that in the minutes." He said it was a joke.

Last week, Eargle said she told a woman looking for free legal help for her abused child "to get back to Mexico."

Eargle later said she was misquoted, but in further interviews she restated her view that the woman should return to Mexico.

The campaign took the pair off its list of a fistful of state co-chairmen — honorary titles for regional supporters — because it feared the increasing scrutiny from bloggers and media, said Ron Tyler, Hunter's spokesman.

"It'll never die, so it doesn't matter if she made an error," Tyler said. "For the campaign, it was a fatal error."

But Eargle said she was sure it would not affect her popularity at home.

"That's not going to have anything to do with me, honey, because the people in Horry County know who I am and know I'll stand up for what's right," she said. "I have enough backbone to stand up and say something that other politicians are thinking but won't say."

Eargle went on to rip Hunter, a California Republican, dismissing him as a viable candidate.

"He's not even going to win South Carolina," the former supporter said. "He lied to me. ... A politician is fake. There's a difference between a politician and a statesman. He is no statesman — he's a politician."

Jordan blamed his woes on the media, which he said paid more attention to things conservatives said than liberals.

DOJ_NMG_0139854

"Let me tell you how I feel," he said. "The daggum news media's got nothing to write about. I made a joke about Muslims and the daggum news media won't forget it. They keep bringing it up and bringing it up."

Jordan said Hunter had told him some bloggers in California had already begun bringing up his infamous remarks. "He said he thought it might be an issue," Jordan said. "The last thing we want to do is hurt his campaign."

Former Wisconsin Governor Campaigns In Iowa (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

MOUNT PLEASANT, Iowa -- Former Wisconsin Governor Tommy Thompson may not have drawn huge crowds during campaign stops across southern Iowa today, but some of the Iowans who saw him liked what they heard.

Thompson covered several domestic issues and detailed his plan for handling the Iraq war to about three dozen people at a Mount Pleasant restaurant.

Mount Pleasant Republican Bill Layne says Thompson has qualities the country needs in a president including intelligent leadership.Diane Brinkmeyer, of New London, says she liked Thompson's solutions to welfare reform in Wisconsin. And, she says he's personable, which a politician must be to win today.

Thompson criticized health care policy in the United States as stupid, saying it spends almost all the money on care after people are sick instead of prevention.He offered a three-part plan on Iraq including an Iraqi parliament vote on whether the U.S. military should remain in the country, establishment of 18 territories in Iraq and giving one-third of the revenue from the country's oil industry directly to the people.

Thompson also campaigned in Burlington, Ottumwa and Fairfield today.

Recalling Civil Rights, Democrats Seek Black Votes (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

SELMA, Ala., March 3 — Representative John Lewis, whose political career grew out of the civil rights movement, had longed for the day he could vote for someone that he believed could become the nation's first black president. So when Senator Barack Obama entered the race, he was on the cusp of declaring his support.

Until Bill Clinton called.

Now, Mr. Lewis said, he is agonizing over whether to choose Mr. Obama, whom he once described as "the future of the Democratic Party," or Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"One day I lean one way, the next day I lean another way," said Mr. Lewis, Democrat of Georgia. "Sometimes, you have to have what I call an executive session with yourself, a come-to-Jesus meeting, and somehow, some way we will all have to make a decision."

In the opening stretch of the 2008 Democratic presidential contest, Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, are embroiled in what party officials believe is one of the most competitive scrambles for black supporters since the Voting Rights Act was passed four decades ago. The chief rivals will be here on Sunday when the Clintons and Mr. Obama commemorate the 42nd anniversary of Bloody Sunday, when hundreds of activists — Mr. Lewis among them — crossed the Edmund Pettus Bridge during a civil rights march from Selma to Montgomery.

Representative Artur Davis, Democrat of Alabama, invited Mr. Obama to deliver the keynote address at the historic Brown Chapel on Sunday. After Mr. Obama agreed, Mr. Davis said, Mrs. Clinton accepted an invitation to speak at a church just down the street. And two days ago, Mr. Clinton said he would join his wife in Selma, the first time since she formally entered the race that he has been called on to use his clout so directly to give her a hand.

"Her timing speaks for itself," said Mr. Davis, who supports Mr. Obama.

It will be the first time Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama share the same campaign turf, and curiosity was building Saturday evening as hundreds gathered in the historic district for the weekend festival. Aides to Mrs. Clinton dismissed suggestions that they were following Mr. Obama, but members of Congress traveling to Selma said they were encouraged by her allies to attend her speech, not his.

DOJ_NMG_0139855

Mr. Obama also adjusted his schedule, a spokesman said, postponing a fund-raiser in Boston on Sunday evening after learning that the Clintons would be attending the daylong series of events here.

Mr. Edwards declined an invitation. He plans to be in California on Sunday to deliver a speech — about Selma and civil rights — at the University of California, Berkeley.

Black voters are a crucial component of the Democratic electorate. In 2004, despite intensive efforts by President Bush to break the Democratic dominance, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts won about 89 percent of the black vote.

In contested primaries, particularly in South Carolina, black support could be vital to the Democratic nominee. About 50 percent of the primary voters in South Carolina are black, and the state is fourth in line on the nominating calendar. Alabama, where about 60 percent of the primary voters are black, is making plans to move its contest to Feb. 2. And at least 16 states are considering voting on Feb. 5, including Florida, California, Illinois, New York and Texas, all states where black voters could hold considerable sway.

But the weekend appearances also offer a window into a broader struggle among the candidates to define themselves to the country and to associate themselves with the legacy of the civil rights movement in a way that could help them appeal not only to blacks but also to white Democratic voters who are proud of their party's role in that struggle.

Mr. Obama, who was born in 1961, four years before the Selma march, grew up in Hawaii and Indonesia, far from the civil rights battles that played out in the American South. While he plunged into racial issues as a young adult, he has traveled to the region only in recent years, beginning to build relationships with older leaders of the movement.

Mrs. Clinton, who was born in 1947, had her political sensibilities forged during the tumult of the late 1960s. She has benefited from her husband's immense popularity among black voters, built gradually during their years in Arkansas and then the White House. Mr. Clinton will be in Selma to be inducted into the Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

Mr. Edwards, who was born in 1953 and raised in North Carolina, often discusses growing up in the segregated South and the obligation that brings him to address issues of race and class. He has courted black support in both of his presidential campaigns.

For Mrs. Clinton, the Selma appearance could be a test of her ability to connect with black audiences, and of Mr. Clinton's ability to transfer his political aura to his wife.

It also gives Mr. Obama a chance to show he can compete with the Clintons, both in connecting the language and themes of the civil rights movement to the politics of today and in keeping the spotlight on himself in the middle of a head-to-head political spectacle.

"President Clinton remains popular and Senator Clinton will benefit a lot from that, but there are a lot of African-Americans who see the possibility of this," said Representative Elijah E. Cummings, Democrat of Maryland, who supports Mr. Obama. "People say, 'He's like my son or my grandson, and before I die, I'd like to have a chance to vote for someone who can win.' "

Clinton advisers said they were not concerned about polls showing some early signs of a tightened race for black support. They have been honing both a public message and a private political strategy to deal with what they acknowledge is the unmatchable personal appeal of Mr. Obama as a black candidate courting black voters.

"African-Americans historically align with people based on issues, not personality," said Minyon Moore, a senior Clinton adviser who, among other things, has focused on building support in the black community. "People will look at her record, look at her biography, look at her experience, and support her as a real champion of their issues."

Asked how Mrs. Clinton would compete for black votes with Mr. Obama Ms. Moore said: "It's probably a proud moment for us all. But there's so much history to be made this time around — having the first woman president, having the first African-American nominee, having the first Latino nominee." The latter was a reference to Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, another Democratic candidate.

Ertharin Cousin, a senior adviser to the Obama campaign, said Mr. Obama needed to introduce himself to all voters, including blacks. "We have a responsibility to tell his story, to paint his narrative," Ms. Cousin said. "He may not be of the civil rights era, but he is definitely an extension of the work that was done of that era."

DOJ_NMG_0139856

While Mr. Obama must appear credible to civil rights leaders, he is also looking beyond the establishment of black political leaders. He is seeking to give voters a deeper look at him, advisers said, hoping to drive home the notion that a black candidate can win the presidency.

For Mrs. Clinton, the strategy for reaching black voters at this early stage of the campaign involves strong outreach to black elected officials, business leaders and others, followed by phone calls to reinforce her candidacy from her husband and supporters like Robert L. Johnson, who founded Black Entertainment Television.

Mrs. Clinton is seeking to deepen her own relationships with black voters, Mr. Johnson said. "When she's running for president, it's far more important that someone say, 'Gee, it's Hillary Clinton on the phone,' and not, 'President Clinton's calling to ask if we can support his wife,' " Mr. Johnson said. "Hillary knows the black community's attachment to her husband doesn't transfer to her."

It may, however, buy her time to win over voters on her own.

Mr. Lewis, one of the few icons of the civil rights era still active in politics, has been enamored with Mr. Obama since he arrived in Washington. Long before Mr. Lewis knew Mr. Obama would run for president, he invited him to headline a 40th anniversary gala of the Voting Rights Act, saying, "I think the hopes and dreams and aspirations of so many of us are riding on this one man."

Nevertheless, his strong sentiment toward Mr. Clinton has been enough for him to remain neutral in the presidential race.

"I talked with President Clinton. I know him a little better than I know Mrs. Clinton," Mr. Lewis said. "Some of us are caught in between, but isn't it healthy that we have the luxury to choose between two wonderful, gifted politicians?"

The Bridge From Selma, 42 Years Down The Road (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Forty-two years after a 25-year-old activist named John Lewis led voting-rights marchers onto the Edmund Pettus Bridge outside Selma, Ala., only to be beaten and tear-gassed by state troopers on what became known as Bloody Sunday, the bridge is the scene of another kind of showdown. Today, Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton are joining Lewis, now a Democratic congressman from Georgia, and thousands of participants in the annual commemoration of the march from Selma to Montgomery, which was finally completed two weeks after Bloody Sunday with the Rev. Martin Luther King.

In an interview yesterday, Lewis reflected on how history might dignify politics -- and whether politics could cheapen history.

-- David Montgomery

Q. Can this annual pilgrimage to keep the memory of Bloody Sunday alive inform the political discourse of today?

A.It is important to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge again . . . People must never forget that 42 years ago, all across the South, people of color could not participate in the democratic process. It was very hard, almost impossible, to become a registered voter. In Selma, 2.1 percent of African Americans were registered to vote. . . . The journey is to remind us what happened and how it happened. And to try to get the nation to take lessons from the past and build on those lessons and go forward.

Do you fear that the political attention will take away from the historical memory, that the anniversary will be over-politicized?

When we go to Selma and walk across the river, we will be traveling across a very special place where people gave a little blood. I think Senator Clinton and Senator Obama will be mindful that this is not some political march or political gathering. This is a gathering to commemorate, to pay tribute, but to also say to another generation they too can make a difference by getting involved in their own communities.

Do you worry that you and the marchers and these sacred places -- that bridge -- will end up being used as props?

It is my hope and my prayer that with the presence of the media and the presence of these two candidates for the Democratic nomination, that bridge will not become a prop. People want to be identified with these sacred places. It's like going to the Holy Land, going to Mecca, going to some shrine.

Do you expect Clinton and Obama to put aside their rivalry, link arms and walk together across the bridge?

If you have Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama in a formal presence there on the bridge walking together, I think it will send a strong message of people coming together. It will be beyond politics. What happened in Selma 42 years ago, and what I hope will happen [today], transcends politics. It says something about the distance we've come and the progress we've made as a nation and a people, to have the top two contenders for the nomination for president to be a woman and an African American.

DOJ_NMG_0139857

What will you be thinking about as you cross the bridge?

As I walked across that bridge 42 years ago, it was so quiet, so peaceful, so orderly, no one was saying a word. . . . When we got to the highest point on the Edmund Pettus Bridge, looking down across the river, we could see a sea of blue: Alabama state troopers. . . . You saw these guys putting on gas masks, they came toward us, beating us with nightsticks, trampling us with horses and releasing tear gas. . . . I was hit in the head by a state trooper with a nightstick, I thought I was going to die, I had a concussion on the bridge. Forty-two years later, I don't recall how I made it back across the bridge to the streets of Selma to the [Brown Chapel AME] church. Seventeen of us were hospitalized. . . . As I walk across the bridge, I will be reliving those moments.

Will Clinton's speaking simultaneously at First Baptist Church take away from Obama's keynote address at Brown Chapel AME Church?

I don't think it will take away. The churches are so close, both are on the same street. During the height of the movement, during the height of the whole struggle in Selma, Brown Chapel would be full sometimes to capacity, and First Baptist would be full, and the speakers would rotate. We would leave Brown Chapel and go to First Baptist. It's going to be a large crowd [at the anniversary]. They won't all be able to get into Brown Chapel, some people will go to First Baptist.

How will you decide whom to vote for?

Senator Obama is a friend, a wonderful friend. Mrs. Clinton is a friend. Her husband is a friend. . . . It's a luxury, in a sense, it's a good thing to have two strong viable candidates vying for the Democratic nomination, and one happens to be a woman and one happens to be African American. During the movement, from time to time, I would have an "executive session" with myself. I think I'll do that.

Clinton Courts Black Support Amid Obama Surge (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- At 21, South Carolina State Rep. Bakari Sellers is the youngest legislator in the United States and one of the African-American Democrats most rabidly courted by the 2008 presidential contenders.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton personally lobbied Sellers, the son of 1960s civil rights activists, who defeated an incumbent six decades his senior last year.

But he's about to endorse Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and offered some friendly advice for the former first lady about winning the African-American vote.

"For her sake, she needs to get Bill Clinton out there a lot more," said Sellers, one of a half-dozen South Carolina politicians set to endorse Obama.

Her advisers had planned to hold Bill Clinton off the campaign trail until later in the race. But a stunning surge by Obama among black voters in recent weeks has made the former president's help "all the more pressing," according to a person close to the campaign.

That may explain the rushed scheduling of the Clintons at today's anniversary commemoration of the 1965 civil rights march in Selma, Ala., which is shaping up to be a political showdown between political pioneers Obama and Clinton.

Obama confirmed that he'd be attending the event about two weeks ago, followed a week later by Hillary Clinton, who was to accept an award for her husband. In an increasingly claustrophobic race, they'll both be delivering sermons about 11 a.m. to churches scarcely a block apart.

Clinton aides insisted her trip wasn't a me-too excursion -- even though she had to wedge it between a round-trip schlep to California on Saturday and Sunday night-to-Monday swing through Iowa.

On Thursday, the campaign announced that Bill Clinton would also be flying down to Alabama.

The timing aroused suspicion. On Tuesday an eye-popping ABC News/Washington Post poll showed Obama had erased Clinton's 40-point lead among blacks in the past month, jumping out to an 11-point lead.

DOJ_NMG_0139858

Despite Obama's gains, the former first lady is entering friendly territory in Alabama. She holds a 34 to 19 percent lead over Obama among Alabama Democrats, according to a Feb. 28 poll making the rounds among party leaders, with John Edwards finishing third with 10 percent.

But longer-term problems loom, exacerbated by the Clintons' own push to create a 20-state super primary on Feb. 5, 2008. Many of the states scheduled to take part -- including Alabama, Mississippi and Florida and Georgia -- are dominated by black voters. That was fine in pre-Obama days, but now she's in for a fight against a racial native son.

"[The Feb. 5 primary] amplifies the Democratic vote in the South, and this is a region where blacks play a very, very strong role," said Joe Reed, a Democratic National Committee member who runs the influential Alabama Teachers Association.

It's not clear if Clinton needs to win a majority of African-American primary voters to take the nomination, but she has to fight, aides say. And that's why Bill Clinton -- famously mothballed by Al Gore in 2000 -- is coming back to center stage so quickly in the campaign.

"Hillary's in a battle and she needs her best artillery," said New York-based political consultant Hank Sheinkopf, who advises Alabama Democrats. "Bill's the best artillery."

Hillary's Snipe At Obama Erodes Standing In Polls (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

Front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton's decline in the polls stems partly from her attack on Sen. Barack Obama, her chief rival for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, political pollsters said.

The poll numbers changed after the senators traded political blows through their spokesmen when movie mogul David Geffen called Mrs. Clinton a disingenuous, "incredibly polarizing figure" who isn't electable and appeared to allude to her husband's past infidelity. Mr. Geffen, a former Clinton ally, is now backing Mr. Obama.

A Fox News survey of 900 registered voters nationwide conducted Feb. 27-28 found Mrs. Clinton's support had fallen to 34 percent, down from 43 percent the month before. Mr. Obama's support, however, climbed to 23 percent from 15 percent.

"From a national perspective, there has been an erosion in Hillary's support among Democrats and especially among independents, while Obama's numbers have risen among these voters," said pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, a media polling firm based in Rockville.

"I think the attack by her campaign on Obama was a negative for her because of a perception that it was calculated, that it was an attempt to break Obama's momentum. Second, whether fair or unfair, it was seen as the typical Clinton attack machine, where she doesn't do the attacking, but her surrogates do," Mr. Ali said.

An ABC News/Washington Post poll completed four days after the attack story broke showed Mrs. Clinton's support dropping to 36 percent from 41 percent in January, while Mr. Obama's numbers rose to 24 percent from 17 percent.

The poll also showed that voters overall had a less favorable opinion of Mrs. Clinton, with 49 percent holding a positive impression of her, down from 54 percent.

Pollster David Johnson of Strategic Vision, a Republican media marketing firm, said that his polls in key states -- including Florida, Iowa, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Washington and Wisconsin -- showed Mrs. Clinton had "a basic support level of between 30 percent and 35 percent, but she's never been able to go much beyond that."

The Clinton campaign's attacks on Mr. Obama changed the complexion of the campaign and the way some voters perceived her candidacy, Mr. Johnson said.

"The feud knocked the Clintons off their pedestal and affected the polling numbers somewhat," he said. "She's still in first place, but there definitely has been erosion in her support among the Democrats."

Pollsters also say that Mr. Obama's candidacy has hurt Mrs. Clinton's campaign among black voters, who were among her husband's most loyal Democratic supporters during his two terms in office.

Mrs. Clinton had led among black voters in January by 60 percent to 20 percent, but the latest ABC/Washington Post poll shows Mr. Obama leading among blacks, 44 percent to 33 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0139859

"Of course, 44 percent is a far cry from the 85 percent of the black vote he will need to win, but it's quite a turnaround in the past month," former Clinton campaign adviser Dick Morris wrote Friday on the Townhall.com political Web site.

Mr. Obama's surge in the polls was especially impressive in Georgia, where increased support from a large black vote has helped to push his approval numbers higher.

"Obama has gone from 18 percent support to 25 percent. Hillary has fallen from 35 percent to 28 percent. He's really surged in that state," Mr. Johnson said.

Geffen, Clinton Were Often At Odds (LAT)

By Stephen Braun, Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

The billionaire shocked many when he criticized the former first lady. But his friendship with the former president was rocky.

WASHINGTON — Long before the fractious public airing of their poisoned relations, the political friendship between David Geffen and Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton was an unconventional alliance with a cloudy future.

The outspoken Hollywood mogul Geffen lavished nearly $1.2 million on the Clintons and other Democrats during the Clinton White House years, gaining extraordinary access to the president while hosting the couple at intimate dinners at his Malibu beachfront home and sleepovers at his estate in Beverly Hills.

But their relations were in constant flux. Intimates of the two said that flashpoints surfaced often: Clinton's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays in the military. The president's scolding of Hollywood after the Columbine school massacre. The Monica S. Lewinsky affair and Clinton's impeachment. And finally, the 11th-hour flurry of controversial pardons that excluded a convicted murderer whose release Geffen had championed.

Their alliance was marked by genuine affection, colleagues say, and a large measure of self-interest. Whether its meltdown has any lasting significance remains to be seen, but Geffen's recent broadside against the Clintons left the political world agape.

Aimed chiefly at Hillary Clinton, who was mostly a bystander to the friendship, Geffen's waspish comments to a New York Times columnist gave voice to the kind of sentiments — that she is polarizing, dishonest, far too ambitious — that her presidential campaign expected from the right, not from a political soul mate.

Geffen has since retreated into silence. He declined to comment for this account, as did spokesmen for both Clintons.

But others who know the principals well described the arc of the star-crossed friendship. Most would only speak anonymously, fearful of risking Geffen's legendary ire and political retribution from the Clintons.

Timely alliance

Geffen first joined forces with Bill Clinton in 1992, soon after becoming a billionaire from the sale of his record company to MCA. Nearing 50, he was about to openly acknowledge his homosexuality.

Several intimates said he grew unnerved by the sway of social and religious conservatives backing the reelection campaign of President George H.W. Bush. Conservative Pat Buchanan's call to arms for a "cultural war," and his mocking that Democrats were radicals posing as moderates in an "exhibition of cross-dressing," nudged Geffen toward a high-profile role in funding the Clinton ticket.

"They were talking about an America that was about being white, Christian, heterosexual male," Geffen said in a 1993 Times interview. "Well, you know there are people who just don't fit into that category."

Eagerly assuming the role of campaign benefactor, Geffen was a leading light among 150 guests who paid $5,000 to honor Clinton at the Beverly Hills home of MCA mogul Lew Wasserman. By the time Clinton won in November, Geffen had donated nearly $100,000 to the campaign and other Democratic causes.

Geffen didn't attend the inaugural festivities. But he joined Clinton at an economic summit in Los Angeles. The agenda was dry financial policy — not Geffen's cup of tea. But the invitation from the White House had thrilled him.

"I can't imagine him doing it for anyone else," the associate said. "But for Clinton, he sat there and got into it. Or at least he pretended to."

DOJ_NMG_0139860

The associate said that Geffen openly admired Clinton, intrigued by his mix of Arkansas informality, wonkish fluency and political shrewdness. But at the same time, "David was pretty level-headed about the relationship. He wasn't a showoff about it … you didn't see him dial him up in front of other people to show what kind of access he had."

Geffen had joined a rarified group of Hollywood liberals shepherding millions to campaign coffers, including director Steven Spielberg and film executive Jeffrey Katzenberg, who would become Geffen's partners in founding DreamWorks SKG, the film studio.

One former White House aide said Clinton was particularly "star-struck" by Spielberg and Katzenberg, and eagerly rubbed elbows with them. He roomed overnight at their sumptuous Los Angeles homes, in the Hamptons and in ski country. Geffen opened his beachfront home to Clinton and, on occasion, the first lady.

Several former Clinton aides and fundraisers said that although Geffen could be counted on to open his checkbook, he was prickly and not easily pleased. White House aides "thought of him as high-maintenance," said one Clintonista. Another called him a "whiner." A veteran fundraiser watched Geffen stand on a dining room chair at one event to lecture top Democrats on social policy.

"He's a passionate guy, and he's not cowed by anyone," the fundraiser said. "He'll give you anything you ask for if he thinks it's in his interest. And he'll decide on a dime to dry up that support if he's mad at you."

Friendship tested

Almost from the start, Geffen's presidential friendship was tested by political tensions of the day. Once elected, Clinton retreated from a promise to allow acknowledged homosexuals to serve in the military. Instead, he adopted a "don't ask, don't tell" policy of letting gays remain in the military as long as they kept their sexual orientation quiet.

Geffen helped bankroll a media campaign led by gay activists to pressure Clinton. "No one in Hollywood did more on gays and lesbians in the military than David Geffen," said David Mixner, an old Clinton friend. But Clinton stuck with his compromise. For gay leaders like Mixner, this led to a severing of ties. Geffen remained a Clinton ally.

"He consciously decided he didn't want it to be a rupture point," an associate said. "David's tendency was to get mad, but he realized he had larger fish to fry, and why give up a good relationship?"

"They had a deep friendship. You could see it," said former Clinton White House Chief of Staff Leon E. Panetta, who joined Geffen and the president at a private Malibu dinner in 1994.

Geffen took care not to neglect the first lady. He co-chaired a January 1994 banquet for AIDS Project Los Angeles where she was feted for her support of AIDS programs. Geffen intimates say that he saw Hillary Clinton as a benign figure on the periphery of his friendship with the president. "She wasn't a political candidate then; she was the first lady," a Geffen colleague pointed out.

Bill Clinton's affair with Lewinsky in 1998 and the impeachment crisis that followed was another test of Geffen's loyalty. At the time, associates say, Geffen privately advised Clinton on how to deal with the media and the public. "They were still close, and they spoke," one Geffen colleague said. "They discussed the issues that were confronting the president."

But Geffen's outlook on Clinton "began to sour," the colleague said. Clinton had also found a new pal in Los Angeles: supermarket magnate Ron Burkle, a political supporter who became a close personal friend.

During one of Clinton's visits to the West Coast in 1999, according to a California Democrat, Geffen insisted that Clinton stay at his home even though Geffen would be out of town. Clinton spent much of the evening at an event at Burkle's 8-bedroom, 13-bath mansion in Beverly Hills, but then dutifully went around the block to neighbor Geffen's estate (8 bedrooms, 9 baths) for the night.

In April 1999, after the Columbine High School rampage, Clinton surprised Hollywood by ordering a commission to investigate how the entertainment industry marketed violent video games to teenagers.

DreamWorks called it "finger-pointing," and Geffen questioned what he perceived as the administration's failure to press hard for tougher firearms controls.

Still, Geffen joined Spielberg and Katzenberg that May in hosting the Clintons at a fete in Beverly Hills. While tenor Andrea Bocelli serenaded the attendees, more than $1.5 million in checks was written to pump up the Democratic Party's 2000 Senate campaigns. One of the new candidates was Hillary Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0139861

If Geffen had become skeptical of the first lady, it didn't prevent him from backing her. Geffen donated $2,000 to her campaign and $13,000 to party political committees that aided her. Geffen also promised $1 million toward the planned Clinton library in Little Rock, Ark., and sent $200,000 as a down payment.

No special favor

As the Clinton presidency neared its end, Geffen also pressed for a favor. He had become a supporter of a campaign to win a presidential pardon for Leonard Peltier, a Native American activist serving a life sentence in the shooting deaths of two FBI agents in 1975 at the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota. Peltier's advocates say he was wrongly convicted.

A pardon was a long shot. Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) was opposed, and more than 500 federal agents and their families protested outside the White House.

According to Geffen associates, DreamWorks corporate spokesman Andy Spahn contacted the White House three times on Peltier's behalf, and Geffen spoke to Clinton about it. Clinton associates recalled only that there were "general contacts." Clinton was "noncommittal," a Geffen intimate said.

When Clinton denied Peltier's petition, Geffen told an aide, "This guy's a politician; you know what they're like."

Geffen's disappointment turned to ire when he learned who did win pardons. They included Marc Rich, a wealthy commodities trader who had fled to Switzerland after he was indicted in 1983 for tax evasion, and convicted Los Angeles drug dealer Carlos Vignali, whose case was pressed by Hugh Rodham, Hillary Clinton's brother.

Several Geffen intimates say he was most angered by a Time magazine article quoting Clinton as telling friends that his denial of the Peltier pardon showed he had not traded pardons for money. "David Geffen will barely talk to me!" Clinton reportedly said.

"That sent him up the wall," an associate said of Geffen. "He had a thing about people who used him to prop themselves up."

Their friendship dissolved overnight. The DreamWorks executive sent a final $800,000 to honor his pledge to the Clinton library, but that was his last stipend. Geffen remained a loyal benefactor to other Democrats, even donating $5,000 to a PAC that aided Daschle, despite his opposition to the Peltier pardon.

Geffen shut down his donations to Hillary Clinton's Senate campaign and began saying she had no future as a presidential candidate. His recent criticisms of her were not the first.

"She can't win," Geffen said during a public forum at the 92nd Street Y in New York in 2002. "She's an incredibly polarizing figure. I think ambition is not a good enough reason."

By then, Geffen had met with a new Senate hopeful, Barack Obama of Illinois. DreamWorks' Spahn had been impressed and urged the two men to meet, so Geffen invited Obama to his Malibu home for a private dinner with several other Democratic Party supporters.

"They hit it off," Spahn recalled.

Meanwhile, Geffen had ended all contact with the Clintons.

According to one Clinton intimate, the former president tried to keep the relationship alive. "He called a bunch of times, but Geffen never called back," the Clinton associate said. "Eventually, he stopped trying."

Tripping Over The Inevitable (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

The Coming Backlash Against the Clintons

In the 1920s, the Brooklyn Dodgers finished in sixth place seven times in eight years. Late in that unfortunate period, a droll sportswriter, noting the team's listless play, wrote, "Overconfidence may yet cost Brooklyn sixth place."

Hillary Clinton's campaign did not display overconfidence when it directed the recent fusillade at Barack Obama. Her campaign's rhetorical megatonnage was in response to a prominent Obama contributor saying rude things about her. Her overreaction was one of several developments that have clarified the Democratic contest.

DOJ_NMG_0139862

Bill Clinton has said, regarding presidential candidates, that Republicans like to fall in line and Democrats like to fall in love. Which explains the Clinton campaign's palpable panic: Democrats have fallen in love, but not with her.

Republicans tend to nominate the next person in line: Vice President Richard Nixon, not Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, to follow President Dwight Eisenhower in 1960; Vice President George H.W. Bush, not Sen. Robert Dole, to follow President Ronald Reagan in 1988; Dole rather than Lamar Alexander or any other contender in 1996; Gov. George W. Bush, whose dynastic lineage propelled him past Sen. John McCain in 2000.

There is a Republican tinge to Sen. Clinton's campaign: She is next in line. That fact -- combined with the Clintons' (how often the plural is pertinent) money machine, combined with the Clintons' earned reputation for ferocity -- is supposed to impart to her an aura of inevitability.

But such an aura annoys voters by telling them that they really have no choice. And that can provoke them to play the game that G.K. Chesterton called "Cheat the Prophet": The players listen politely to explanations of what is inevitable, then they make something else happen, which defeats boredom.

Boredom, the sociologist Robert Nisbet wrote, is among the universal and insistent forces driving human behavior. Mankind's nervous system evolved during millions of dangerous years (saber-toothed tigers, etc.). Now, however, mankind has suddenly, in a few millennia, encountered the monotony of orderly life, which bothers human brains formed by and for hazardous circumstances.

Among the cures of boredom that Nisbet listed are war, murder, revolution, suicide, alcohol, narcotics and pornography. He might have added presidential politics. Memo to the Clinton campaign: Inevitability is boring.

So is a narrow range of choices. Democrats have many interesting candidates, but governors often are the most plausible candidates to be the nation's chief executive and only one remains in the Democratic race -- New Mexico's Bill Richardson. Three former governors -- Virginia's Mark Warner, Indiana's Evan Bayh and Iowa's Tom Vilsack -- have left the field.

Vilsack said the demise of his candidacy was determined by " money and only money." Well, yes, but there were reasons, political and ideological, why he could not find buyers for what he was selling. Nevertheless, his statement triggered the usual laments about the determinative role of money in politics. This year we are told to be horrified by the fact that by November 2008 the presidential contest will have cost $1 billion. Which means that the two-year process will cost half as much as Americans spend every year on Easter candy.

Candidates do have to spend too much time raising money. But that is because the government, by banning large campaign contributions, has transformed a huge American surplus -- money -- into an artificial scarcity. The government began to do this for anti-competitive purposes.

The modern drive for campaign finance "reforms" is usually said to have been initiated by Democrats in response to Watergate. Democrats did start it, but before Watergate, in response to their traumas of 1968.

That year, Sen. Gene McCarthy's anti-Vietnam insurgency disturbed the Democratic Party's equilibrium by mounting a serious challenge to the renomination of President Lyndon Johnson. McCarthy was able to do that only because a few wealthy people gave him large contributions. Democrats also were alarmed by former Alabama governor George Wallace's success in 1968, and they mistakenly assumed that Wallace, too, was mostly funded by a few very large contributions.

According to John Samples of the Cato Institute (in his book " The Fallacy of Campaign Finance Reform"), congressional Democrats began the process that culminated in criminalizing large contributions -- the kind that can give long-shot candidates, such as Vilsack, a chance to become competitive. Yes, the initial aim of campaign "reforms" was less the proclaimed purpose of combating corruption or "the appearance" thereof than it was to impede the entry of inconvenient candidates into presidential campaigns. In that sense, campaign reform is a government program that has actually worked, unfortunately.

Bring Back The Politics Of Personal Destruction (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

IF you had to put a date on when the Iraq war did in the Bush administration, it would be late summer 2005. That's when the bungled federal response to Hurricane Katrina re-enacted the White House bungling of the war, this time with Americans as the principal victims. The stuff happening on Brownie's watch in New Orleans was recognizably the same stuff that had happened on Donald Rumsfeld's watch in Baghdad. Television viewers connected the dots and the president's poll numbers fell into the 30s. There they have largely remained — at least until Friday, when the latest New York Times-CBS News Poll put him at 29.

DOJ_NMG_0139863

Now this pattern is repeating itself: a searing re-enactment of the Iraq war's lethal mismanagement is playing out on the home front, again with potentially grave political consequences. The Washington Post's exposé of the squalor at Walter Reed Army Medical Center — where some of our most grievously wounded troops were treated less like patients than detainees — has kicked off the same spiral of high-level lying and blame-shifting that followed FEMA's Katrina disasters.

Just as the debacle on the gulf was a call to arms for NBC's Brian Williams and CNN's Anderson Cooper, so the former ABC anchor Bob Woodruff has returned from his own near-death experience in Iraq to champion wounded troops let down by their government. And not just at Walter Reed. His powerful ABC News special last week unearthed both a systemic national breakdown in veterans' medical care and a cover-up. The Veterans Affairs Department keeps "two sets of books" — one telling the public that the official count of nonfatal battlefield casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan stands at 23,000, the other showing an actual patient count of 205,000. Why the discrepancy? A new Brownie — Jim Nicholson, the former Republican National Committee hack whom President Bush installed as veterans affairs secretary — tells Mr. Woodruff "a lot of them come in for dental problems."

Yet 2007 is not 2005, and little more damage can be inflicted on the lame-duck Bush White House. The long-running Iraq catastrophe is now poised to mow down a second generation of political prey: presidential hopefuls who might have strongly challenged Bush war policy when it counted and didn't. That list starts with the candidates long regarded as their parties' 2008 favorites, John McCain and Hillary Clinton.

Senator McCain, who, unlike Senator Clinton, fervently supports the war and the surge, is morbidly aware of his predicament. This once-ebullient politician has been off his game since a conspicuously listless January "Meet the Press" appearance; on Thursday, he had to publicly apologize after telling David Letterman, in an unguarded moment of genuine straight talk, that American lives were being "wasted" in Iraq. (Barack Obama had already spoken the same truth and given the same pro forma apology.) Last week a Washington Post-ABC News Poll confirmed Mr. McCain's worst political fears. Rudy Giuliani now leads him two to one among Republicans, a tripling of Mr. Giuliani's lead in a single month.

Mr. Giuliani is also a war supporter and even contributed a Brownie of his own to the fiasco, the now disgraced Bernard Kerik, who helped botch the training of the Iraqi police. But, unlike Mr. McCain, Mr. Giuliani isn't dogged by questions about Iraq. To voters, his war history begins and ends with the war against the enemy that actually attacked America on 9/11. He wasn't a cheerleader for the subsequent detour into Iraq, wasn't in office once the war started, and actively avoids speaking about it in any detail.

What makes Mr. Giuliani's rise particularly startling is that his liberal views and messy personal history are thought to make him a nonstarter with his own party faithful. These handicaps haven't kicked in, the Beltway explanation has it, because benighted Republican voters don't yet really know that "America's mayor" once married a cousin or that he describes himself as "pro-choice." But perhaps these voters aren't as ignorant as Washington thinks. After the flameouts of Tom DeLay, Bill Frist, Rick Santorum, Ralph Reed and other Bible-thumping politicos who threw themselves on the altars of Terri Schiavo or Jack Abramoff, maybe most Republicans could use a rest from the moral brigade. Maybe these voters, too, care more about the right to life of troops thrust into an Iraqi civil war than that of discarded embryos used in stem-cell research.

The same cultural dynamic is playing out among Democrats, though Mrs. Clinton doesn't seem to know it. Her poll numbers, too, are showing erosion — some of it because of Mr. Obama's growing profile among African-Americans, but some of it (in a Time survey) after her dust-up with the Hollywood tycoon David Geffen. Most Washington hands declared Mrs. Clinton the winner in that spat because she had forced Mr. Obama off his high horse of "hope." But there's no evidence to support this theory. In the real world, most Americans don't know who Mr. Geffen is. There wasn't even any video of him to run on "Hardball," where the Clinton campaign spokesman's Jim Cramer-esque hyperbole made him look threatened by Mr. Obama's rising popularity.

The most revealing aspect of the incident was not in any case the who's-up-who's-down prognostications for a primary process some 10 months away. Rather, it was the fervor with which the Clinton campaign accused Mr. Geffen and Mr. Obama of practicing "the politics of personal destruction." This over-the-top reaction seemed detached from reality, almost as if the Clinton camp were nostalgically wishing it could refight the last political war — and once again clobber repellent old impeachment nemeses. But that battle may not be in the offing. Anti-Clinton rage has cooled, and the Clinton hating industry ain't what it used to be. As The Times reported last month, even Richard Mellon Scaife, who bankrolled much of the vast right-wing conspiracy, has moved on. As with Mr. Giuliani's marital history, any scandalous new revelation about the Clintons' private lives might play out less momentously in post-9/11 America than it did in the last century.

DOJ_NMG_0139864

You can't blame the Clinton campaign for praying it had Kenneth Starr and The American Spectator to kick around again. It would be easier to fight that war than confront the one in Iraq. Far easier. Senator Clinton's words about the war still don't parse. When I made this point previously, a Clinton ally phoned to say that whatever the senator's Iraq statements, she is an exceptionally smart and capable leader by any presidential standard. I agree, and besides, Iraq isn't the only issue in 2008. But Iraq will overshadow every candidate and every other subject as long as the war grinds gruesomely on, whether in Baghdad or at a V.A. hospital.

The issue is not that Mrs. Clinton voted for the war authorization in 2002 or that she refuses to call it a mistake in 2007. Those are footnotes. The larger issue is judgment, then and now. Take her most persistent current formulation on Iraq: "Obviously, if we knew then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote and I certainly wouldn't have voted that way." It's fair to ask: Knew what then? Not everyone was so easily misled by the White House's manipulated intelligence and propaganda campaign. Some of her fellow leaders in Washington — not just Mr. Obama out in Illinois, not just Al Gore out of power — knew plenty in the fall of 2002. Why didn't she?

Bob Graham, then Senate Intelligence Committee chairman, was publicly and privately questioning the W.M.D. intelligence. So was Nancy Pelosi. Chuck Hagel warned that the war was understaffed, that an Iraq distraction might cause Afghanistan "to go down again" and that the toppling of Saddam could be followed by chaos. Joe Biden convened hearings to warn of the perils of an ill-planned post-Saddam Iraq.

Some of these politicians ended up voting to authorize war exactly as Mrs. Clinton did (Senators Hagel and Biden). Some didn't. But all of them — and there were others as well — asked tougher questions and exerted more leadership. John Edwards, by the way, did not: he was as trigger-happy about speeding up the war authorization then ("The time has come for decisive action") as he is gung-ho about withdrawal now, despite being an Intelligence Committee member when Mr. Graham sounded alarms about the Bush administration's W.M.D. claims.

Another fair question is what Mrs. Clinton learned once the war began. Even in the summer of 2003 — after the insurgency had started, after the W.M.D. had failed to materialize, after the White House had retracted the president's 16 words about "uranium from Africa," more than two months after "Mission Accomplished" had failed to end major combat operations — she phoned a reporter at The Daily News, James Gordon Meek, to reiterate that she still had no second thoughts about the war. (Mr. Meek first wrote about this July 14, 2003, conversation in December 2005.) Was that what this smart woman really believed then, or political calculation?

Either way, she made a judgment, and she will not be able to spend month after month explaining it away to voters with glib, lawyerly statements. The politics of personal destruction, should they actually visit the Clintons once more, will not take America's mind off the politics of mass destruction in Iraq.

Politics Means Sometimes Having To Say You're Sorry (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

O.K., so Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton won't accede to demands from some Democrats to apologize for her 2002 vote authorizing military action in Iraq.

But that doesn't mean she has an allergy to apologizing.

She just does it in her own, very Hillary way, as a review of her apologies shows.

Mrs. Clinton can be rather artful, for instance, at turning around her apologies to generate sympathy for herself. During her husband's campaign against President George H. W. Bush in 1992, amid the Gennifer Flowers fracas, Mrs. Clinton casually mentioned to a journalist rumors that Mr. Bush had engaged in extramarital "carrying on." She soon paid penance for her gossiping this way:

DOJ_NMG_0139865

"It was a mistake. People were asking me questions at the time and I responded. But nobody knows better than I the pain that can be caused by even discussing rumors in private conversation, and I did not mean to be hurtful to anyone."

Said Mary Matalin, a Bush campaign aide at the time: "They call that an apology?"

Self-deprecation is another trademark. After a head-shaker of a line in 2004 — that Gandhi used to run a gas station in St. Louis — she poked at herself by saying: "I have admired the work and life of Mahatma Gandhi. I truly regret if a lame attempt at humor suggested otherwise."

Like many talented politicians, on matters of state — such as the 1994 defeat of the health care reform effort she led — her admission of error can be so nuanced that listeners may wonder if an apology was really her point.

"I'm not bitter," she said in the fall of 1994. "We made mistakes. But I actually feel good about the way we ended up. We got people talking about national health care. People say, 'Don't give up.' So I won't."

Thus, people who say that Senator Clinton is too self-righteous to admit fault on Iraq are at least half-wrong. There are plenty of examples of her saying she was wrong. And sometimes she does it quickly, as she did in 1992 to the country singer Tammy Wynette, famous for the 1969 hit, "Stand by Your Man," after saying that she was not "some little woman standing by my man like Tammy Wynette."

She can also drag her heels on admitting a mistake — and has regretted it. She says in her autobiography that she did not appreciate the political toll of the Whitewater scandal, and that, as a result, public relations mistakes were made. At a Whitewater news conference in 1994, she said that one of her biggest regrets was that her reluctance to provide information to the news media had fed an image that she was hiding something.

Some of her Democratic rivals are thirstily trying to make a character issue out of her refusal to apologize on Iraq. Twice in the last two weeks, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, has said that voters want a president "to tell the truth when you believe you have made a mistake," as he put it during a visit to New York.

But beyond the fact that Mrs. Clinton says she has nothing to apologize for, she knows, as with Whitewater, that apologizing in the midst of political warfare is risky. Indeed, she has said that she is willing to lose voters rather than make an apology she does not believe in.

"In politics, people demand an apology from an opponent in order to humiliate them," said Deborah Tannen, a linguistics professor at Georgetown who has written on apologies.

Many Americans don't love leaders who apologize willy-nilly. In 2004, voters chose a Republican for president who stood his ground on the war against all critics instead of a Democrat who sounded apologetic when he said that he voted for $87 billion in troop funding before he voted against it.

And President Clinton was derided in some quarters as the apologizer in chief, not just for personal foibles (see Lewinsky, Monica) but for a whole history book of national wrongs (from the slave trade to Rwanda).

Graham Dodds, a political scientist at Concordia University in Montreal, who has studied political apologies, said of Mrs. Clinton, "She comes from a household that is well versed in the art of political apology, and, I'm sure, knows the risks in coming off as overly apologetic." .

On foreign affairs, beyond Iraq, Mrs. Clinton hasn't been much of a target for apology-seekers. She speaks with precise care on national security matters.

In a review of her history of apologizing, only one mea culpa on the international stage stands out: That she did not immediately reject remarks by Suha Arafat, wife of the Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat, at a joint event where Mrs. Arafat suggested that Israel had used poison gas to control Palestinians. Mrs. Clinton denounced the remark a day later, saying she had gotten an incomplete translation.

Conventional wisdom holds that a commander in chief cannot look weak, and a female candidate for the office faces an even stricter standard for toughness.

DOJ_NMG_0139866

"We're a very macho culture, and I think every women in public office has to find her path to negotiate that," Ms. Tannen said. "To the extent she's a woman and has to prove she's tough, standing her ground is the best thing to do. And to the extent she's a woman and people don't tolerate toughness in women, she's going to be faulted for that."

Professor Tannen sees four elements to a good apology: You admit fault; you express regret; you acknowledge the damage done; and you either promise to make amends, or promise not to make the same mistake again.

On the matter of her 2002 Iraq vote, Senator Clinton has put the fault on President Bush. She has expressed regret that he used the 2002 Senate vote as a means for war, acknowledged that the war was poorly conducted, and promised that she would not vote the same way again. Not exactly a rationale for an apology.

In this regard, Professor Dodds said, she is more like President Bush than her husband.

"It's a hallmark of Bush that he sticks to his guns no matter what," Mr. Dodds said. "If she were to apologize now, she would open herself up to the charge of flip-flopping."

Phony apologies, too, can easily fail the smell test. So do half-way admissions of remorse.

"The thing about an apology is that it can make powerful people look weak, such as if Hillary admitted mistakes on Iraq and Democrats didn't accept that," Mr. Dodds said. "An apology does not always work."

Obama Headlines Labor Rally (CHIT)

By John McCormick

Chicago Tribune, March 4, 2007

With Democrats in control of Congress and seeking to boost a struggling labor movement, national union leaders joined Illinois' two senators at a rally Saturday in Chicago to promote legislation to make it easier for workers to join a union against the wishes of their employers.

"We will pass the Employee Free Choice Act. It's not a matter of if, it's a matter of when," said Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). "We may have to wait for the next president to sign it, but we will get this thing done."

The Democratic presidential candidate headlined the rally before traveling to Alabama for a Sunday event commemorating the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march, an occasion that also will attract Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and her husband.

In his speech to about 1,500 labor activists at the Hyatt Regency Chicago, Obama reflected on the crusades of Martin Luther King in support of the labor movement.

"He didn't just march for justice that day," he said. "They were marching for jobs."

Two protesters briefly interrupted Obama's speech. One of them carried a large sign that appeared to be critical of statements the senator made Friday to a pro-Israel group in Chicago where he said he would not rule out military action against Iran because of its uranium-enrichment program.

"OK. We appreciate that," Obama said, trying to deflect the situation, as the protesters were escorted from the ballroom. "I oppose the war in Iraq."

For the second day, Obama made no mention of Friday's Baltimore Sun report that some of his mother's ancestors owned slaves. Despite a crush of local reporters seeking comment, he exited the ballroom without answering any questions after several minutes of shaking hands, posing for photos and signing books.

The labor rally followed a vote Thursday in the House, where Democrats, in a nod to organized labor for its help in retaking control of Congress, approved a bill that would take away the right of employers to demand secret balloting by workers before unions could be recognized.

Under the bill, the National Labor Relations Board would certify a union if it wins a majority of cards signed by workers. Currently, the NLRB calls for a secret vote if more than 30 percent of workers say they support a union. In order to win the election, the union must garner the majority of the workers' votes.

Unions argue that change is needed because employers intimidate workers before voting and by legally battling elections for so long that the victories become meaningless.

DOJ_NMG_0139867

Should the legislation pass both chambers of Congress, President Bush would almost certainly veto it. The rally was sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Council 31, which has 100,000 active and retired members.

As part of the event, the local union received a check from its national parent for $1 million to aid an ongoing labor-organizing effort involving Chicago-area hospital operator Resurrection Health Care. AFSCME President Gerald McEntee, who was joined on stage by AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, delivered the check for what is the largest private-sector union drive in the nation.

In his address at the rally, Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) lamented the movement of American jobs overseas and pledged his support in the Senate for the bill.

"If we're going to end this race to the bottom … we need to restore balance in the American workplace," he said. "Workers need to be free to choose whether they want to be in a union."

Durbin also reiterated his support for his junior senator's campaign. "You can tell your papa. You can tell your mama. This voter is for President Barack Obama," he said.

Obama: Senate Will Pass Labor Union-backed Measure (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

CHICAGO – Democratic Presidential candidate Barack Obama said yesterday that the Senate would pass legislation making it easier for workers to start unions against companies' wishes. Getting it past President Bush is another matter, he said.

"We may have to wait for the next President to sign it, but we will pass it," the Illinois senator told a cheering crowd of more than 1,000 people at a labor rally. "We will get this thing done."

Despite Obama's optimism, the Senate's Republican leader, Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, has said he will block the measure and the White House says Bush will veto it if it gets to him.

The House passed the Employee Free Choice Act on Thursday.

Obama headlined a rally that included national and local labor leaders, and state politicians. The event was sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Council 31, which has 100,000 active and retired members in Illinois.

It was Obama's second major public appearance in his hometown in as many days. The state's junior senator did not take questions from reporters at either event.

On Friday, Obama told the American Israel Public Affairs Committee that he was committed to the security of Israel.

He also criticized the Bush administration for what he said were failings in Iraq that have strengthened Iran's position in the region.

The senator said he planned to be in Selma, Ala., today to commemorate the 42nd anniversary of the civil rights march that helped end segregation in the South.

Richardson Vows To Outwork Rivals (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, March 3, 2007

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said Friday on his first trip to Iowa as a presidential candidate that he will challenge the better-known Democrats running for the 2008 nomination by working harder to reach party activists in the leadoff caucus state.

"My campaign mode is shaking hands, meeting people, being scrutinized, talking issues," Richardson said in a Des Moines Register interview at the outset of his two-day campaign swing. "Iowans, I understand, like to decide. They like to decide, not who the pundits and the polls decide."

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's withdrawal from the race last week leaves Richardson the only governor in the large Democratic field. The rest of the better-known candidates are members or former members of Congress.

Richardson served seven terms in the U.S. House, but his executive experience, plus past work as U.S. energy secretary and ambassador to the United Nations, makes him the most qualified, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0139868

Getting U.S. troops out of Iraq within a year and dramatically diminishing the nation's use of petroleum in 10 years are Richardson's top priorities, he said during appearances in Des Moines.

"Bill Richardson is not a rock star," Richardson said during a taping of Iowa Press, a public affairs program on Iowa Public Television. "Bill Richardson is a grass-roots candidate."

A national Fox News poll published Friday showed Richardson with support from 1 percent of Democrats. The poll's leaders were New York Sen. Hillary Clinton with 34 percent, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama with 23 percent and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards with 12 percent.

As Clinton planned to return to Iowa on Sunday for a quick overnight visit, Richardson was making several stops throughout central Iowa on Friday and today.

Richardson met with about two-dozen Democratic elected officials from Polk County at an east-side restaurant in Des Moines before attending a reception with students at Drake University. He also planned to attend a reception at the home of state Rep. Mark Davitt in Indianola, the first of several similar receptions he was scheduled to attend during his two-day trip.

Thursday's blizzard threatened the trip, and forced him to wait until Friday morning to take off from Santa Fe, N.M.

"It was a little dicey," Richardson said about his arrival in Iowa on a small private jet. "Like, zero visibility and 40-mile-per-hour winds."

Richardson plans to meet with a group of Democratic women, then with union leaders in Des Moines today before headlining local party gatherings in Marshalltown, Ames and Boone.

While Richardson has registered in the low single digits in early Iowa polls, he has signed as a top consultant one of the party's most notable veteran organizers with Iowa experience. Steve Murphy, who managed former U.S. Rep. Dick Gephardt's 1988 and 2004 presidential campaigns, is signed on with Richardson.

Richardson's national success relies on doing well in the Nevada caucuses, scheduled for five days after Iowa's. But Iowa, scheduled to host the first nominating event of 2008 on Jan. 14, could give him a boost before heading to the first Western contest.

"It's probably hard to win here, but I've got to break through here," Richardson said. "What I don't want is to get buried here, so I'm going to be here a lot."

Neither Clinton, Nor Obama (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

So there I was, sitting in my office, quietly contemplating suicide. I was watching a cattle call of Democratic presidential candidates on C-Span. In their five-minute speeches, they were laying it on thick with poll-tested, consultant-driven clichés of the Our Children Are Our Future variety. The thought of having to spend the next two years listening to this drivel set me wondering if it was literally possible to be bored to death.

Then Bill Richardson walked onstage. He was dressed differently — in slacks and a sports jacket. He told jokes that didn't seem repeated for the 5,000th time. He seemed recognizably human, unlike some of his overpolished peers. He gave the best presentation, by far.

Then a heretical question entered my head: What if Richardson does this well at forums for the next 10 months? Is it possible to imagine him as a leading candidate for the nomination?

When you think that way, it becomes absurdly easy to picture him rising toward the top. He is, after all, the most experienced person running for president. He served in Congress for 14 years. He was the energy secretary (energy's kind of vital).

He's a successful two-term governor who was re-elected with 69 percent of the vote in New Mexico, a red state. Moreover, he's a governor with foreign policy experience. He was U.N. ambassador. He worked in the State Department. He's made a second career of negotiating on special assignments with dictators like Saddam, Castro and Kim Jong Il. He negotiated a truce in Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0139869

Most of all, he's not a senator. Since 1961, 40 senators have run for president and their record is 0-40. A senator may win this year, but you'd be foolish to assume it.

When it comes to policy positions, he's perfectly positioned — not by accident — to carry liberals and independents. As governor, he's covered the normal Democratic bases: he raised teacher pay, he expanded children's health insurance, he began programs to stall global warming, he built a light rail line.

But he also cut New Mexico's top income tax rate from 8.2 percent to 4.9 percent. He handed out tax credits to stimulate economic growth. (He's the only Democrat completely invulnerable on the tax cut issue.) He supports free trade, with reservations. And he not only balanced the budget — he also ran a surplus.

On cultural issues, Richardson has the distinct advantage of not setting off any culture war vibes. He was in college in the late 1960s, but he was listening to the Beach Boys, not Janis Joplin. He was playing baseball in the Cape Cod League, not going to Woodstock. He idolized Humphrey, not McCarthy.

Richardson is actually something of a throwback pol — a Daley or La Guardia who doesn't treat politics as a moral crusade. That might appeal this year.

On the nuts and bolts of the campaign, he has some advantages as well. He won't have the $150 million war chests that Clinton and Obama will have. On the other hand, he won't have the gigantic apparatuses that fund-raising on that scale requires. While those campaigns may be bloated, overmanaged and remote, Richardson has the potential to be small and nimble.

Furthermore, he could generate waves of free media the way John McCain did in 2000. He's a reporters' favorite — candid, accessible and fun to be around. "I'm a real person, not canned. I don't have a whole bunch of advisers. I'm a little overweight, though I'm trying to dress better," he told me last week. So far, rumors of personal peccadilloes are unfounded.

Finally, there is the matter of his personal style. This is his biggest drawback. He's baggy-faced, sloppy (we like our leaders well groomed), shamelessly ambitious and inelegant. On the other hand, once a century or so the Democratic Party actually nominates somebody the average person would like to have a beer with. Bill Richardson is that kind of guy.

He is garrulous, amusing, touchy-feely (to a fault), a little rough-edged and comfortably mass-market. He's Budweiser, not microbrew. It doesn't hurt that he's Hispanic and Western.

In short, when you try to think forward to next winter, you see that this campaign will at some point leave the "American Idol"/"Celebrity Deathmatch" phase. The Clinton-Obama psychodrama may cease to fascinate while the sheer intensity of coverage will create a topsy-turvy series of revolutions.

I wouldn't bet a paycheck on Richardson. But I wouldn't count him out. At the moment, he's the candidate most likely to rise.

Kucinich Outlines Plan For Iraq Withdrawal (NHUL)

By Jim Kozubek

New Hampshire Union Leader, March 4, 2007

MERRIMACK – Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich outlined his 12-point plan for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq during a meeting with residents in the basement of the Merrimack Public Library yesterday.

The initial and perhaps most important step for a stable Iraq is to stop funding military operations that are contributing to a civil war, insurgency and more casualties, said Kucinich, a Democratic candidate for President.

Congress is preparing to vote for $100 billion in supplemental funding for the operation, money that he said might be used for military strikes in Iran, covert operations, and what some suspect, funding for insurgencies to maintain a balance of power in the region.

The executive branch has exploited the War Powers Act, and Congress has tacitly supported the war every step of the way by rubber-stamping funding, he said.

"The funding of this war has been voted on at least 12 or 13 times, and Congress keeps reauthorizing the war all over again," he said, adding that candidates Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards have repeatedly voted to renew funding.

DOJ_NMG_0139870

Kucinich said the government often does not even have a record for how funds are spent, and corrupt contractors and enemies might end up with money with no specified earmarks.

"Iraqi holdings were originally taken and shipped to the United States and converted into $10.8 billion in hundred dollar bills, shrink-wrapped, put on pallets and loaded on a cargo plane, and nobody knows what happened to that money," he said.

Kucinich said the United States should turn Iraq and its oil reserves back over to its countrymen to restore accountability and enable them to control their own assets.

The U.S. has an obligation to pay reparations to the families of the 650,000 collateral deaths caused since the start of the war, and to provide some backing to an Iraqi government that will gradually begin to take on international loans, he said.

The U.S. subsequently has a responsibility to ensure that loans granted by the World Bank are negotiated fairly, without conditions that in return impose corporate interests such as the privatization of oil on the country, he said.

Corporate-dominated trade negotiations have already compromised domestic policies and economic prospects, he said.

"I want to restore bilateral trade for worker rights, human rights and the environment," he said. "Before NAFTA and other such trade agreements, there was more of a balance, but since these agreements, we have seen a trade deficit and wages depressed."

Kucinich also said one out of every four dollars currently paid for health care was going for profit, and he would like to develop a non-profit health care system with savings that could easily cover the expense of modern medicine.

Andy Sylvia, chairman of the Merrimack Democratic Committee, said he wasn't sure who he was going to vote for yet, but was especially impressed with Kucinich's stance on Iraq.

"I appreciate the clarity he has brought to the Iraq issue," Sylvia said. "We were kind of railroaded into this and he stood up to that."

Ex-GOP Candidates Turn Attacks Back On National Panel (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- One advertisement accused the rival candidate of billing taxpayers for a call to a phone-sex line. One alleged that a candidate "fixed" his daughter's speeding tickets. Still others stated that a candidate endorsed a "coffee talk with the Taliban," and that another was supported by the Communist Party.

Each charge was misleading at best, demonstrably false at worst. Yet the National Republican Congressional Committee paid for each of those ads last year, and its leaders said they could do nothing to pull them, even after some of the Republicans whom the ads were designed to help demanded that they come down.

Now, four months after Republicans lost control of Congress, many of their former candidates are calling for major changes at the NRCC. They depict the committee as a rogue attack-ad shop that shielded party leaders from having to account for the claims in their ads -- encouraging over-the-top accusations that often hurt GOP candidates.

"They weren't just attacking my opponent -- they were, bit by bit, destroying a reputation that I had spent years and years building," said Ray Meier, a Republican candidate in upstate New York whose Democratic opponent was wrongly accused of making adult fantasy calls.

The NRCC funneled more than $83 million through a special "independent expenditure" arm that made all decisions regarding ads.

The creation of the independent entity meant that when candidates such as Meier called NRCC headquarters to complain about the ads, committee officials said they couldn't discuss them, much less yank them from the air, without violating campaign-finance law.

The law places strict limits on how much help national parties can offer candidates; in 2006, they were limited to about $80,000 in direct support of each House candidate. But court rulings have established the right of independent groups to spend unlimited sums.

Thus, national parties have been funneling their giant war chests into independent committees -- putting vast resources behind ads of a type that used to exist only on the political fringes.

DOJ_NMG_0139871

The 1988 "Willie Horton" ad aimed at Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis, for instance, was run by an independent group that had no ties to the Bush-Quayle campaign. Likewise, the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth attacked Democrat John F. Kerry in 2004, but was independent of President Bush's campaign.

But now, taking advantage of the latest loophole in the campaign-finance system, the national parties have started putting most of their advertising money into independent groups of their own creation. In 2006, spending by the Democratic and Republican parties' independent expenditure arms jumped 65 percent from 2004, to $202.4 million, according to Federal Election Commission data.

The parties have essentially created their own version of the Swift Boat Veterans -- entities that operate outside the normal political apparatus, said Fred Wertheimer, president of the government watchdog group Democracy 21.

"There's no accountability," he said. "When you have unaccountability on this stuff, people start overreaching. And this idea of creating a Chinese wall within the party, where the people who are doing the ads are kept separate from the people who are doing the expenditures, is a fiction."

Though both parties spent heavily on negative ads through their independent expenditure arms, the NRCC was by far the biggest spender last year, spreading around $20 million more than its Democratic counterpart. And watchdog groups have tagged the Republicans -- and the NRCC in particular -- as the worst offenders in stretching the truth.

Annenberg Political Fact Check, a nonpartisan group that studies campaign advertisements, called the NRCC's ads "the very definition of political mudslinging."

"The National Republican [Congressional] Committee's work stands out this year for the sheer volume of assaults on the personal character of Democratic House challengers," stated the Fact Check report, which also cited one Democratic ad as based on "flimsy evidence at best."

Representative Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican who is among the 2006 candidates who feel the NRCC's actions hurt his campaign, said he plans to file a bill that would allow candidates in both parties to prohibit the national parties from advertising on their behalf.

"I would have been better off if they didn't spend one penny on my race," said Shays. "The least we should do is give a candidate the ability to say no. "

The NRCC's chairman during the 2006 elections, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, defended the ads, saying they were well-documented and generally effective. He conceded that his independent expenditure arm "took a lot of liberties," but said Democratic committees also stretched the truth.

NRCC ads saved 10 to 20 Republican-held seats, Reynolds said. "Everybody has an opinion, and hindsight after an election is about 20-20," he said.

Last year, Reynolds put a veteran NRCC operative, Carl Forti, in charge of the party's independent committee. Reynolds said that, in keeping with the law, Forti made all advertising decisions and had no contact with his bosses at the NRCC while working on independent ads.

Forti, who now works as political director of the presidential campaign of former governor Mitt Romney, declined to comment, citing the NRCC's policy of not discussing independent expenditure operations publicly.

The independent expenditure operation spent $77 million attacking Democratic House candidates, while spending $6.6 million in positive ads boosting Republicans, according to FEC disclosures.

Among the attack ads was the television spot in Meier's race against Michael Arcuri, a former county district attorney. Arcuri's hotel bill from a business trip included a one-minute call to an adult talk service, which cost taxpayers $1.25. Immediately thereafter, another call was placed to a number that was identical except for the area code: the number for the state Department of Criminal Justice Services.

It was clearly a wrong number, but the NRCC stood by the ad. Arcuri won the race.

Similar alleged misstatements reverberated in races across the country. In North Carolina, an NRCC ad said that Democrat Heath Shuler was "caught again not paying his taxes on time." But Shuler had sold his majority stake in the business referenced in the ad in 2003. Shuler won his race, defeating an incumbent Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0139872

In Indiana, Democrat Brad Ellsworth was accused of "fixing" his daughter's speeding tickets while serving as a county sheriff, though Annenberg Political Fact Check found the ticket was paid in full. Ellsworth also unseated an incumbent Republican.

In Iowa, an NRCC ad suggested that Democrat Bruce Braley was backed by the Communist Party, citing the fact that a party newspaper labeled Braley a "peace candidate." Republican candidate Mike Whalen said he immediately called friends in Washington to pressure the NRCC to take the ad down, but was told that nothing could be done because it was a product of the independent expenditure arm.

"I went ballistic, desperately trying to send the message through back channels," Whalen said. "They didn't care. They said, 'We don't have any control over it.' . . . That ad in particular I think sullied my reputation, and I will always resent that ad."

Braley beat Whalen by 12 percentage points in a district that had long been a GOP stronghold.

Voters in Connecticut received an NRCC mailing that accused Democrat Diane Farrell of wanting to have a "coffee talk with the Taliban." The NRCC's evidence: Farrell accepted a campaign contribution from a group that included a board member who had once suggested establishing talks with the Taliban.

Farrell's Republican opponent -- Shays -- said he called allies at the White House and the Republican National Committee to press the NRCC to repudiate the mailing.

But NRCC officials, Shays said, prevented him from speaking directly with Reynolds. Reynolds defended that move, saying the committee would have been violating the law if it permitted candidates to coordinate with the independent expenditure arm .

But some campaign-finance specialists dispute the claim that party committees couldn't stop ads they were paying for. While the law prevents party leaders from coordinating messages with their independent arms, they could have refused to pay for ads they disapproved of, said Paul S. Ryan, associate legal counsel at the Campaign Legal Center, a nonpartisan group.

"The party leadership can close the purse strings when and if they don't like the ad coming out of their independent expenditure arm," Ryan said.

Because the Supreme Court has affirmed parties' rights to set up independent committees, party leaders say, they are likely to continue the practice .

Nonetheless, the NRCC's new leaders say they are listening to candidates' complaints. The new NRCC chairman, Representative Tom Cole of Oklahoma, appointed a task force to reevaluate the party's independent expenditure strategy.

Acknowledging lapses in "political judgment" last year, Cole said he wants assurances that his committee's ads will be factual as well as politically wise.

"When you get a lot of consultants in a hothouse, late in the campaign, and people really aren't responsible [for the message] because you're not working for the candidate, it's really easy to take a flier," Cole said.

Until party leaders take more responsibility for their ads, they are likely to frustrate more candidates. Meier, who gave up his state Senate seat to run for Congress, said he found it maddening to watch the campaign he waged on local issues make a sudden turn to the gutter.

"These scandalous and slanderous ads became the topic of conversation," Meier said. "Never having run for national office before, you know this is a mean business. You have no idea how mean."

The Power Player (WP)

By Robert G. Kaiser

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

How the Rise of One Lobbying Firm Helped Transform the Way Washington Works

For Gerald Sylvester Joseph Cassidy, creator and proprietor of the most lucrative lobbying firm in Washington, May 17, 2005, was a day to exult. That bright, clear spring Tuesday marked the 30th birthday of Cassidy & Associates, and an impressive crowd had come to pay tribute to a godfather of the influence business.

Hundreds of guests gathered on the rooftop terrace of a handsome new office building at the foot of Capitol Hill, 13 stories above Constitution Avenue. A vivid orange sun descended gently behind the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial at the western end of the Mall, casting angular beams of light across the assembled throng. The guests' view from the roof was filled by the United States Capitol, which from this startling vantage point could be seen, from end to end, in a single field of vision. The Capitol looked contained and compact, almost a plaything within easy reach.

DOJ_NMG_0139873

As the setting sun illuminated the scene, the party illuminated a new Washington -- a capital transformed by big money in the 30 years since Cassidy became a lobbyist. This new Washington operated on new ethical norms, embraced new standards of risk and reward and offered tempting new career choices for former officials, members of Congress, their spouses and their aides.

Cassidy helped invent the new Washington, which had made him seriously rich. His personal fortune exceeded $125 million. He and his original partner, whom he forced out of the firm 20 years earlier, devised a new kind of business, subsequently mimicked by many others. Their innovation was the first modern "earmarked appropriations" -- federal funds directed by Congress to both public and private institutions when no federal agency had proposed spending the money. Over the subsequent three decades, the government dispensed billions of dollars in "earmarks," and lobbying for such appropriations became a booming Washington industry.

Cassidy may be the richest Washington lobbyist, but he is far from the best-known. Since a scandal erupted that bears his name, that title belongs to Jack Abramoff, the confessed felon, bribe-payer and tax evader who is now an inmate in the federal prison camp in Cumberland, Md. He is still cooperating in a widening federal probe of corruption on Capitol Hill.

Abramoff's brazen behavior fit a stereotypical caricature of the Washington lobbyist as a willful rogue eager to corrupt members of Congress. The Abramoff story is a crude pulp thriller punctuated by free dinners, lavish golfing outings, big campaign contributions, arm-twisting and old-fashioned bribery.

Cassidy's is a subtler epic that probably reveals more about the culture of Washington, D.C. It, too, involves favors, gifts and contributions, but they are supplemented by the disciplined application of intellect, hard work, salesmanship and connections. In Cassidy's story, all these can influence the decisions of government to the benefit of private parties -- Cassidy's clients.

On a personal level, Cassidy's saga is a variation on the classic American myth: A determined man from nowhere accumulates great wealth and rises to the top. At different moments it evokes Charles Foster Kane, Jay Gatsby or a character from a Horatio Alger tale. Like them, Cassidy is a self-made man who fulfilled many of his most ambitious dreams. But material success has not pacified all of his personal demons. He is tough, temperamental, driven and, according to many around him, rather lonely.

Over the next five weeks, The Washington Post will tell Gerald Cassidy's story in a unique way. On Monday, the series will jump to the newspaper's Web site, washingtonpost.com, to begin a 25-chapter serial narrative that will describe how Cassidy built his business, how he made the deals that earned his millions, and how he and his fellow lobbyists influenced decisions of government and helped create the money-centric culture of modern Washington.A Gatsbyesque Affair

Charlie Palmer Steak, the gleaming Washington outpost of a famous Las Vegas restaurant, had catered Cassidy's party. Restaurant staff circulated with platters of miniature hamburgers and tartlets of goat cheese and mushrooms. The restaurant occupies much of the ground floor of the building at 101 Constitution Ave., where the rooftop party was held. One of the restaurant's owners is the same Gerald Cassidy, a man of many investments.

He had turned 65 a month before the party, and he looked spiffing. His full beard of uniformly short whiskers was trimmed to a triangle of white. His fullback's frame was perfectly draped in a dark gray, double-breasted and pin-striped suit made by Alan Flusser in New York, Cassidy's home town. Flusser's custom suits start at $3,800. A white shirt with French cuffs and a silk tie in a pattern of black and white checks completed the ensemble. The checked tie set against the suit's prominent pin stripes evoked a Las Vegas defense attorney.

The outfit advertised the distance Cassidy had come from his difficult childhood in a troubled Irish American family. None of its other members, denizens of Brooklyn and Queens, wore custom-made suits; none had even graduated from college before Cassidy did in 1963. Cassidy's memories of his youth are short on nostalgia, long on deprivation. "I remember evictions, repossessions, things you never forget." Jack Cassidy, his stepfather, was a pugnacious Navy veteran and former boxer who sometimes threw a punch at his son.

DOJ_NMG_0139874

At his big party Cassidy's shyness was displaced by pride; he was virtually preening. He presided with a certain dignified formality, greeting guests with a warm smile but never slipping out of character. Like Gatsby, F. Scott Fitzgerald's self-invented tycoon, Cassidy seemed to enjoy the idea of the party at least as much as the party itself.

Gatsby sought riches to reclaim a lost love who had rejected him when he was young and poor; Cassidy, too, sought riches as armor against poverty and rejection. Both were dreamers who would be forced by circumstances to become realists.

For Cassidy, the urge to accumulate money drove him to succeed. "I'm a big fan of financial security," he said in one of numerous extended interviews. "I didn't have a lot of it as a kid, so I wanted to be successful and financially secure." He never pretended not to be interested in money nor tried to deny who he was or how he made his cash. He proudly, though quietly, made large donations to numerous charities.

His candor about his business and his pursuit of wealth set him apart from the most successful lobbyists of earlier generations, who often were reticent about their trade. Washington powerbroker Clark Clifford was a good example; he never registered as a lobbyist and would deny heatedly that he was one, even as he helped his law firm's corporate clients solve problems in Washington for handsome fees. Clifford wanted to be known as an elder statesman.

Cassidy made no bones about his work. He liked to talk about his ability to get things done: winning hundreds of millions in federal dollars for his university clients, getting Ocean Spray Cranberry juice into school lunches, helping General Dynamics save the billion-dollar Seawolf submarine, smoothing the way for the president of Taiwan to make a speech at Cornell despite a U.S. ban on such visits.

Cassidy's career has spanned an astounding boom in the lobbying business. When Cassidy became a lobbyist in 1975, the total revenue of Washington lobbyists was less than $100 million a year. In 2006 the fees paid to registered lobbyists surpassed $2.5 billion; the Cassidy firm's 51 lobbyists earned about $29 million. In 1975 the rare hiring of a former member of Congress as a lobbyist made eyebrows rise. Today 200 former members of the House and Senate are registered lobbyists. Two of them, tall, gregarious men named Marty Russo and Jack Quinn, work for Cassidy, and at the 30th birthday party they worked the crowd with relish.

The business involves giving as well as receiving. As lobbying became more and more lucrative, Cassidy realized that members of Congress who helped his clients could be thanked with campaign contributions. "You can't be in this business and not give," he once explained.

He encouraged his colleagues to give, and he gave prolifically himself. In the quarter century leading up to his party, Cassidy, his employees and their spouses had personally given at least $5.3 million to candidates for the House and Senate and to the two major parties. Cassidy and his wife, Loretta, donated more than a million of that themselves. The lobbyists of Cassidy & Associates had received many times that much in fees from their clients -- almost always in the form of monthly retainers. The clients had received hundreds of millions in earmarked appropriations and other benefits worth hundreds of millions more.

Cassidy's appetite for lobbying revenue could lead him into trouble. It was the cause of one of the few public mistakes of his career: his 2004 offer to the soon-to-be notorious Abramoff to join Cassidy & Associates as a consultant just after the law firm of Greenberg Traurig had fired him. Abramoff accepted the offer, but then Cassidy had to withdraw it. Abramoff was not invited to the 30th birthday party.Starting with McGovern

The party crowd looked like a typical A-List Washington gathering, sprinkled with past and present senators, House members and Washington hangers-on of many varieties. But there was a story up on the roof that evening that wasn't obvious to most of the guests -- the story of Gerry Cassidy's remarkable career.

The crowd included figures from every stage of Cassidy's life in Washington, beginning with George McGovern.

The long-retired Senator and 1972 Democratic presidential nominee had flown in from South Dakota to toast Cassidy, whom he had first met 36 years earlier in Immokalee, Fla., when McGovern chaired the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs.

In 1969, Cassidy, then a young legal aid lawyer for migrant workers, helped McGovern's staff organize hearings in Immokalee on hunger among those workers. Cassidy then escorted the senator around one of the most impoverished areas in the United States. The hearings drew extensive television and newspaper coverage, one of McGovern's first moments in a national spotlight. Just two months later, Cassidy made his way to Washington and knocked on the nutrition committee's door.

DOJ_NMG_0139875

Could he have a job? In April 1969, Gerry Cassidy arrived in the nation's capital to join the staff of McGovern's committee. He has been here ever since.

When Cassidy moved up from Florida, he and Loretta rented a small apartment in Arlington. Today, they own grand houses in McLean and on the Eastern Shore and a condo on Key West.

Cassidy and McGovern have maintained friendly if not close relations over the years -- a typical pattern for Cassidy, who has many acquaintances but few real friends. McGovern expresses personal amazement at Cassidy's financial success, and also gratitude for it. The lobbyist has contributed $100,000 to the George and Eleanor McGovern Library, which was dedicated in October at Dakota Wesleyan University in Mitchell, S.D.

Both men say they have forgotten that McGovern fired Cassidy from the nutrition committee in early 1975 to make room on the staff for Bob Shrum, at the time a young political operative who McGovern hoped could help him run for president again in 1976. Shrum went on to advise eight losing Democratic presidential candidates.

McGovern's order to fire Cassidy, in a letter to Kenneth S. Schlossberg, staff director of the nutrition committee, can be found in McGovern's papers at Princeton University. Schlossberg interpreted that letter as a cue that it was also time for him to find a new job. He proposed to Cassidy that they start a consulting business, he recalled in an interview. They became 50-50 partners in a firm called Schlossberg-Cassidy & Associates, though they had no associates.

When they first set up shop in a tiny, one-room office, Schlossberg and Cassidy sent letters to everyone they knew offering to provide whatever assistance might be needed in Washington. One of the first to respond was Jean Mayer, a renowned nutritionist, who had just become president of Tufts University in Medford, Mass., outside Boston. Mayer summoned Schlossberg to Tufts to talk about his dream of building a human nutrition research center. He recounted how House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill had once told him about the childhood days when he and his brother sneaked onto Tufts' playing fields to play ball. "If I can do anything to help you, let me know," O'Neill had said.

Mayer hired Schlossberg-Cassidy to figure out how O'Neill might help him. And they did. After two years of work by the young lobbyists, Congress appropriated $27 million for the human nutrition center. Over the course of the next three decades, that $27 million would be followed by hundreds of millions more in directed, earmarked appropriations to Cassidy clients -- colleges, universities, hospitals, corporations and state and local governments.The Absent Alumni

Many of Cassidy's Democratic friends were in attendance at the rooftop party. Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), for example, came prancing across the canvas "carpet" that had been laid on the roof to greet his host: "My Cassidy!" he proclaimed with a mischievous Irish grin, "I'm a fan of yours!"

Cassidy has long had good relations with members of the Massachusetts delegation, going back to his friend O'Neill, the speaker from 1977 to 1987, boom years for Cassidy's firm. Many of the early clients were Massachusetts institutions. By the end of that period, Cassidy was paying himself as much as $5 million a year, several times more than the earnings of even Washington's fanciest lawyers.

One of the loudest guests at the party was Russo, the former Congressman from the suburbs of Chicago who was defeated in 1992 and joined Cassidy the next year. At the party, Russo greeted his pals from the House with a booming voice, and had hugs and pats on the back for many -- a Chicago pol of the old school. On his Cassidy & Associates calling card, Russo has put an embossed, golden Seal of the United States and identifies himself as "Marty Russo, Member of Congress, Retired."

The guest list for the party was long, but so was the list of people who had played a prominent part in building the Cassidy firm but had not been invited. Many of the professional and personal relationships Cassidy developed over three decades had not survived. His mercurial personality and sometimes violent temper put an end to some of them; his ways of doing business ended others. Some left him for greener pastures.

Members of a large Cassidy alumni association could be found in lobby shops and public relations firms all around town. When someone left the firm, Cassidy tended to take it badly. He got into a prolonged legal action with one former employee and forced him into a settlement, a story that quickly made the rounds and had the desired effect. Only a fraction of the former employees was invited to the party on the roof, though the event had been the talk of the alumni for weeks.

The uninvited included some of the most important people in the history of the firm -- first of all James P. Fabiani. Fabiani was the third person to join the firm, after Schlossberg and Cassidy. He designed many of its procedures; he became its most successful marketer, luring in dozens of clients. But he and Cassidy fell out after 15 years of working together. Fabiani thought the firm had changed: "It went from . . . hard-charging, driven, we're-going-to-succeed-for-our-clients to a company preoccupied with money."

DOJ_NMG_0139876

Schlossberg was absent, too, an ironic status for the actual founder of the firm -- despite many references in the firm's literature and on its Web site to Cassidy as its founder. The two men's gradual estrangement had culminated in 1984, when they agreed on a settlement that dissolved their partnership. Schlossberg left with $812,600 as his share of the enterprise. Today he runs a family business, the Schlossberg Memorial Chapel, providing funeral services to the Jewish community on Boston's South Shore. He and Cassidy haven't spoken in 22 years.

The two had an achingly complicated relationship. "He only agreed to the deal we finally settled on," Schlossberg said recently of Cassidy, "because he knew that if we actually ended up in court I would make sure the whole city knew every last detail about our business and no clients would be left after that." The money Schlossberg received proved to be a piddling amount. Eventually, in a series of complicated financial transactions from 1989 to 1999, Cassidy sold his interest in the firm for a total of $30 million, while staying in place to run the business for a handsome salary.Ten-Percenters

One of the alumni who did make it to the rooftop terrace was William F. Cloherty, a feisty little fireplug of a man who came up with an idea that helped Cassidy soar. Cloherty had been working in the Tufts administration when Cassidy and Schlossberg won that first earmark for Jean Mayer. He quickly grasped that what Schlossberg-Cassidy had accomplished for Tufts could become the basis of a real business.

Through a connection with John Silber, the resourceful president of Boston University, Cloherty got to know Cassidy. Intense, bright, disheveled and hopelessly disorganized, Cloherty quickly bonded with Cassidy, a fellow hustling Irishman.

Cloherty proposed to work for Cassidy on a commission basis. He would receive ten percent of whatever fees the clients he brought in paid to the firm. By 1985 Cloherty had signed up 10 clients, eight of them universities. Over the years Cloherty collected hundreds of thousands of dollars in commissions without doing any lobbying himself. Cloherty's success prompted Cassidy and Fabiani to build a large stable of "ten-percenters," who became critical to the firm's early growth.

At the party, Cloherty spent a long time chatting with Silber, who had flown to Washington for the occasion. Prior to joining Cassidy, Cloherty had worked for Silber as BU's government liaison. Over a quarter century, BU has paid Cassidy millions of dollars in lobbying fees, and the school has received $106.5 million in earmarks from the federal government.

Cloherty's success reflected the firm's. For years in the 1980s, Cassidy and his colleagues could truthfully tell prospective clients that they never failed to win an earmark for an institution that had retained them. "Sometimes it took longer than we expected," admitted Elliott Fiedler, who worked at the firm from 1987 to 1995, "and sometimes the client had to settle for a good deal less than it hoped for. But for years every client eventually got something."

From its inception the firm also represented businesses. One of Cassidy's earliest corporate clients was the Ocean Spray Cranberry cooperative, a national organization of cranberry and grapefruit growers. Ocean Spray got him into the political contributions business; he set up a political action committee for the group and decided which members of Congress would receive its largesse. That only increased Cassidy's influence.

His firm has also organized hundreds of fundraisers for members of Congress, many of them breakfasts in the firm's conference room. Cassidy believes in giving money to his friends for their election campaigns. The system doesn't bother him in the least.

"Lobbyists have always been contributors; they always will be," he said in an interview. "It's like if you lived in a rural community and you wanted to be part of that community, and they had a volunteer fire department. If you didn't participate, you wouldn't be very well accepted in the community. It's as simple as that."Selling the Firm Again and Again

In the decade that began in 1989, Cassidy & Associates was transformed. Cassidy was able to fulfill his dream of becoming not just prosperous and successful, but rich. In two stages, he sold a portion of the firm to an Employee Stock Ownership Plan, an unusual financial transaction that put $15 million in his pocket.

He used some of the money to greatly expand his business. He created Powell-Tate, a public relations firm named for its key partners, Jody Powell, President Jimmy Carter's press secretary, and Sheila Tate, press secretary to first lady Nancy Reagan. Cassidy also acquired a Republican lobbying firm, a polling firm and a grass-roots lobbying firm.

DOJ_NMG_0139877

The Republican victory in 1994, taking control of Congress from the Democrats whom Cassidy had spent more than 20 years befriending, cost the firm about $6 million in revenue, or roughly 20 percent of what it had been making. Cassidy cut his own salary way back; for a couple of years he earned no bonus. But he survived, and business slowly picked up again.

In 1999, Cassidy sold the firm to InterPublic Group (IPG), a British advertising and public relations conglomerate, in a stock transaction that netted about $60 million. Cassidy's share would total just over $15 million. His timing was impeccable; he used a financial device called a collar to sell the IPG shares he received in the deal at what turned out to be a historic high. Within months, the IPG shares lost half their value. Most of Cassidy's associates held on to their shares and suffered heavy losses.

For an entrepreneur who had created a business and shaped it in his own image, becoming the property of an international conglomerate was not easy. At first Cassidy's relationship with IPG was rocky. Some executives working for the new owner thought it might be best to ease Cassidy out of the firm and turn it over to his longtime associate, Fabiani. The gambit failed with the new owner, and Cassidy remained the boss. But the firm fell on hard times. Fabiani left, and the earmarked appropriations business was suddenly crowded with new competitors. And Congress, which loved earmarks, loved them so well that their number burgeoned, but their average size shrank radically.'A Republican Lobbying Firm'

Another guest at the 30th birthday party was Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, the Republican whip in the House. Ten years earlier, a Republican as important as Blunt probably would not have attended an event honoring a Democratic lobbyist. But times changed after the Republicans took control of Congress in 1994, forcing Cassidy to adapt to Republican tastes.

His latest adaptation had been the hiring of Gregg Hartley, an open, friendly Missourian like Blunt, who had worked as Blunt's right-hand man for nearly all his political career. In 2003, following a path trod by countless other Congressional aides, Hartley had decided to "go downtown" -- to become a lobbyist. A bidding war for his services ensued. Cassidy won it with an offer of just under $1 million a year plus a substantial percentage of the lobbying fees paid by clients Hartley could bring to the firm.

Hartley had earned $150,000 as Blunt's senior aide. Now he was the chief operating officer of Cassidy & Associates. Hartley worked the crowd at the party with a friendly, low-key style. A number of the guests represented corporate clients he had attracted to the firm.

Blunt was a nice catch for the Cassidy party, but not in the class of the man who arrived soon afterward, surrounded by a bustling entourage. That was Tom DeLay of Texas, then still the House majority leader. His presence was probably a favor to Hartley, who had belonged to the House leadership's inner circle.

To have someone with Hartley's connections essentially running Cassidy's firm, as he has since 2005, showed how the times had changed Cassidy. "I'm running a Republican lobbying firm," Cassidy quipped sheepishly to an old friend.

* * *

One of the most influential guests at the party was a senior senator who once went after Cassidy in public -- Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.), ranking Democratic member of the Senate Appropriations Committee. In 1989, just after Byrd became that committee's chairman, he threw a theatrical temper tantrum when The Washington Post reported that the University of West Virginia had hired the Cassidy firm to help win an earmarked appropriation for an $18 million facility to study the uses of coal. When this became public knowledge, Byrd decided he was furious. He actually blocked the $18 million, which the House had already approved, and forced his home state university to fire Cassidy. In a speech on the Senate floor he denounced "lobbyists who collect exorbitant fees to create projects and have them earmarked in appropriation bills . . . for the benefit of their clients," a thinly veiled reference to Cassidy.

The episode created a political opportunity, prompting Byrd to draft the "Byrd Amendment," putting new restrictions on all lobbyists. It appeared to be a memorial to his anger at Cassidy.

So why, 16 years later, when he was 87 and frail, had Byrd come to a party to celebrate Cassidy? He responded to that question a little testily: "I'm here because I'm here. I was invited, and I decided to come."

Soon after the party another successful Washington lobbyist ventured an explanation: "That's simple. It's his cycle. He's up." Indeed he was. Republicans thought Byrd might be vulnerable, and they had targeted him in 2006. He was busily raising money to defend his seat, and Cassidy, it turned out, was doing his best to help.

Byrd's re-election committee later reported to the Federal Elections Commission that six weeks before his party, Gerald Cassidy had made a $2,000 contribution.

DOJ_NMG_0139878

Then in November 2006, six months after the 30th birthday party, Cassidy & Associates' Political Action Committee made a $938 "in-kind" contribution to organize and pay the tab for a Byrd fundraiser at Finemondo, an Italian restaurant downtown. That event raised $16,645 more for Byrd, nearly all of it from employees of the Cassidy firm. One $2,000 donation was recorded in the name of Loretta Cassidy, the lobbyist's wife, whose pretty smile and high spirits lit up the party on the roof on May 17.

* * *

As the sun set and the party wound down, Cassidy took a microphone and spoke, very briefly:

"All I want to say is it's been a great time, I've enjoyed it. . . . I've had a great time over the years because of all of you. . . . I've loved being in Washington working on important issues. . . . My boss is here, Senator McGovern. He brought me to Washington 35 years ago and opened the door to a great life. Thank you."

Your Tax Dollars At Work: Buckytubes And RedOwls (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Last week, the Washington group Taxpayers for Common Sense released a compendium of 2,646 spending projects earmarked for lawmakers' home states and congressional districts in the 2007 defense appropriations bill. In many cases, the legislation itself provides only a vague description of the project, and omits the name of the company or community that would benefit. Taxpayers for Common Sense filled in the details by using lobbying disclosure databases, congressional news releases and Internet sites.

New measures passed by Congress this year will require detailed disclosure in future legislation of the recipient of such earmarks, as well as the identity of the member seeking them. The following is a sample from the conference report:

p. 243. $1.6 million for the "Weapons of Mass Destruction Marking Set."

Explanation: Rep. David Obey (Wis.), then-ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, obtained this for Rex Systems, Inc., of Chippewa Falls. The system is a mobile laboratory that samples air, water and soil for signs of WMD. The lobbyist is JEH Government Consulting of Chippewa Falls. An Obey news release also announced that Pliant Corp., employing 182, would receive $2.4 million to continue to develop better packaging for military rations -- known as meals ready to eat (MREs).

* * *

p. 303. $2 million for "Electronic Type-specific Buckytubes for Next Generation Defense Electronics."

Explanation: Then-House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) obtained this for Carbon Nanotechnologies Inc. and Brewer Science (both of Springfield) for work to be done on failure-resistant electronics at Missouri State University's Roy Blunt Jordan Valley Innovation Center. The Washington lobbying firm of Fabiani and Co. represents Brewer Science.

p. 98. $4.5 million for "Golden Hour Technology Containers."

Explanation: Minnesota Sens. Norm Coleman (R) and Mark Dayton (D) obtained this earmark for Minnesota Thermal Science Co. in Plymouth. The containers are temperature-controlled devices for transporting blood products. The lobbyist is mCapitol Management.

* * *

p. 243. $2.25 million for "Electroconversion of Energetic Materials."

Explanation: Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) obtained this earmark for Nanomaterials Discovery Corp. of Cheyenne.

* * *

p. 216. $3.2 million for "Palmtop Emergency Action for Chemicals (PEAC)."

Explanation: Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) obtained this earmark for AristaTek of Laramie, which is developing the software system capable of detecting up to 10,000 chemicals. The company's lobbyist is American Business Development Group in Arlington.

* * *

p. 241. $1 million for "Defect-Free Commercially Viable Si/C Semiconductors Using Superlattice Technology."

Explanation: Rep. Michael R. McNulty (D-N.Y.) obtained this for C9 Corp. in Kingston.

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0139879

p. 327. $2 million for a "Secure Advanced Electronics Fabrication Facility."

Explanation: This earmark, for a facility at the University of Albany, was obtained by Rep. Michael R. McNulty (D-N.Y.).

* * *

p. 276. $5 million for the "Thermal Management Systems for High-Density Electronics. "

Explanation: This earmark for Rocky Research Inc. of Boulder City was obtained by Nevada Sens. Harry M. Reid (D) and John Ensign (R). The company's lobbyist is Stirling Strategic Services.

* * *

p. 240: $4.5 million for the "RedOwl Acoustic Targeting Device/Photonics Center."

Explanation: Development of the sniper detecting sensor system at Boston University, represented by Cassidy & Associates, was backed by Massachusetts's senators.

Bush Shows New Willingness To Reverse Course (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

He was against it before he was for it.

The same president who mocked the idea of talking with Iran and Syria as recently as two weeks ago is now sending emissaries to a regional conference to talk with Iran and Syria.

For President Bush, last week's decision was the latest of several reversals on issues on which he once refused to budge. Since Democrats captured Congress, Bush has fired Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, authorized direct talks with North Korea, sent more troops to Iraq, agreed to discuss the contours of a Palestinian state in Middle East peace negotiations, and even proposed a tax increase for millions of Americans -- all ideas he rejected earlier.

"It's not really surprising to me that they're beginning to change," said former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, whose report in December recommended opening talks with Iran and Syria. "The realities of the situation are becoming more apparent to them. . . . Presidents begin to focus very much on their legacy, and he recognizes that insufficient progress has been made on some of these international issues."

Some of Bush's shifts are being welcomed by Democrats and some Republicans, although often with the caveat that, in their view, he has not gone far enough. "Any administration, including this one, has to face reality that changes over time," said former senator Warren B. Rudman (R-N.H.), an ally of the president's father. "They should. Circumstances change. I'd hate to see an administration that was so rigid that it didn't react to that."

But it can be a bitter pill for a politician who got to the nation's highest office by stressing his unwavering fidelity to core principles and painting his opponents -- first Al Gore, then John F. Kerry -- as flip-floppers who changed their minds depending on the political currents. Now, suddenly, it is George W. Bush -- the stubborn, resolute, "never give in" leader -- who finds himself explaining how he can reject a position one moment and embrace it the next.

All politicians flip-flop at times, of course, though few characterize it that way. Governance sometimes requires it and, if skillfully presented, it can be seen as thoughtfulness or growth in office. As Gore and Kerry showed, though, it can be a political killer if it becomes central to one's image. That's why Republican Mitt Romney is struggling to explain his changing positions on abortion and gay rights, while Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton refuses to apologize for her 2002 vote for the Iraq war despite pressure from liberal activists.

In Bush's case, he sometimes acknowledges a shift and attributes it to evolving conditions, such as his decision to increase the number of troops in Iraq after years of insisting he had sent enough to do the job. In other instances, though, the White House denies any change of position at all, offering nuanced arguments for why the latest move is consistent with past statements.

Bush's new health-care plan, for example, would raise taxes on 30 million Americans. The White House says this is not a real tax increase, because the proceeds would finance tax cuts for 100 million other Americans and the overall plan would be revenue-neutral.

Likewise, after the announcement that U.S. envoys will attend an Iraqi-sponsored conference of its neighbors, White House spokesman Tony Snow complained that the move was being portrayed as a policy switch. At a briefing, he read a list of multinational meetings attended by U.S. and Iranian diplomats in the past and chastised reporters for mischaracterizing the situation.

DOJ_NMG_0139880

"You guys are getting it wrong, and I don't know how to get you to get it through your heads that it's not new," Snow said. "I mean, it's not new. What's going on here is something that has a long-seated precedence. There are multilateral forums where, if the Iranians are there, we're not going to walk out."

The same list of past meetings, though, has been cited repeatedly by critics in recent months in asking why Bush has refused to talk with Iran and Syria lately. Until last week, the president had said he would not talk with either until Tehran suspended its uranium enrichment, Damascus stopped interfering in Lebanon, and both dropped support for terrorist groups.

He made his attitude abundantly clear at a news conference last month when he mocked those calling for him to negotiate. "This is a world in which people say, 'Meet! Sit down and meet!' " Bush said in a sarcastic tone. "And my answer is: If it yields results, that's what I'm interested in." Just two weeks later, he agreed to sit down and meet in the context of a conference of Iraq's neighbors and major powers -- even though none of his previous conditions has been met.

Conservatives expressed exasperation. "I have never seen an administration with such an enormous gulf between the president's public statements and its actions," said Michael A. Ledeen, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "Presidential statements should reflect policy. They don't seem to in this administration."

Ledeen said Bush should not talk with Iran, given the charges that it is arming Iraqi militants: "They're killing our kids. They're in open warfare against us. So we're going to sit around a conference table with them to talk about the security of Iraq, which they have no interest in?"

Other Bush allies say that the president flip-flopped on North Korea's nuclear program. Whereas he used to reject one-on-one talks with Pyongyang, insisting that negotiations take place in a six-nation forum, he reversed himself and authorized direct talks in Berlin in January, which ultimately led to a breakthrough agreement.

John R. Bolton, Bush's former ambassador to the United Nations, said the Berlin meeting "was clearly a shift" that yielded a deal rewarding North Korea for bad behavior.

Bolton was further disturbed by reports last week about administration officials backing off assertions about North Korea's uranium enrichment. "There's a risk that the administration looks weak through the media spin," Bolton said, "and if the president doesn't like the media spin, he should correct it immediately."

Bush has strategically changed positions in the past when it suited him, perhaps most notably when he embraced the creation of a Department of Homeland Security after initially opposing it. But he has cultivated an image of a leader who rarely veers from course -- to the point of irritating many who wish he would, particularly on Iraq.

That could immunize him now to an extent from charges of flip-flopping. "It actually may be greeted warmly, and you may see his poll numbers tick up," said Scott Reed, who ran Republican Robert J. Dole's 1996 presidential campaign.

More important to Bush, Reed added, is burnishing the record before his term expires: "They're really playing for the history books now."

Chavez's Influence Hovers Over Bush Trip To Latin America (HC)

By Dudley Althaus, John Otis, Patty Reinert

Houston Chronicle, March 4, 2007

U.S. is hoping Latin American tour tempers the leftist, shores up allies' support

MEXICO CITY — Like many Americans at this time of year, President Bush is striking out for southern climes.

Packing strategies for fostering trade, fighting drug-traffickers and fending off the regionwide shift to the political left, Bush flies out Thursday to start a swing through the friendlier parts of Latin America.

He'll talk energy and free trade in Brazil and Uruguay. Those topics — as well as crime, punishment and border jumping — will dominate the conversations in Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

At every turn, Bush almost certainly will work to counter Hugo Chavez, Venezuela's leftist president. Chavez ranks among the world's more vocal and influential Bush-bashers, and his aura hovers over Bush's trip like a holiday-spoiling drizzle.

DOJ_NMG_0139881

"It's a very calculated effort to become more proactive in confronting Chavez and shoring up U.S. allies in the region," said Cynthia Arnson, who heads the Latin America program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, D.C.

Brazil and Uruguay are governed by moderate leftists inclined to support market economics and trade. Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico have elected conservative presidents who probably would feel among brethren at a GOP fundraiser.

Still, the trip's rhetoric likely will exceed its reach, Arnson and other analysts say.

"He's coming at a time of extreme vulnerability," said Rafael Fernandez de Castro, who teaches foreign relations at ITAM, a leading Mexico City university.

What Bush is up againstThe White House world view remains centered on the Iraq war and its consequences. The 2008 U.S. presidential campaign already has begun, sapping some of Bush's domestic influence. Latin America continues both veering left and riding a commodities boom that has loosened its dependence on the Bush administration's economic policies.

For its part, Washington is trying to portray the seven-day, five-country trip — Bush's eighth to Latin America since taking office — as a show of support for democratic governments. But the visit also is meant to deliver the message that the governments must lift up their poor and vulnerable, said the administration's top diplomat for the region, Thomas Shannon.

The foray is Bush's first extended trip to the region since a September 2005 visit to Argentina and Brazil that many analysts rate a disaster. Attending a regional summit, Bush weathered large street protests — some led by Chavez — that denounced the Iraq war and Washington-sponsored free trade.

Emphasizing his continued opposition to Bush, Chavez plans to visit Argentina at the same time Bush is touring neighboring Brazil and Uruguay. At a recent news conference in Venezuela, Chavez said Bush's swing through the region is an attempt to divide the loyalties of its leaders and public. He called for street protests at every stop.

Chavez's role in regionBankrolled by more than $50 billion a year in oil earnings, much of it from sales to U.S. consumers, Chavez has been throwing money in the region like a rich uncle.

He's bought up more than $3 billion worth of risky debt in Argentina, built roads and schools in Bolivia, promised electricity plants in Nicaragua and sold oil on the cheap to many friendly countries.

In contrast, the Bush administration often has seemed like a tight-fisted distant relative. U.S. aid to the region totals $1.7 billion this year — nearly half of that going to Colombia — and will drop to about $300 million in 2008.

Not surprisingly, Argentine President Nestor Kirchner has been cozy with Chavez, and Bolivia's Evo Morales, Ecuador's Rafael Correa and Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega appear to be ardent allies.

"Free trade and counternarcotics have always been the Bush administration's agenda, and these are things that — with a few notable exceptions — Latin America does not see as a priority," said Arnson, the Washington analyst.

"Poverty, inequality and exclusion constitute the social agenda of the hemisphere and explain the rise of so many leftist governments," she said.

Then there's the moderatesStill, Brazil's president — Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, who's universally called Lula — and Uruguay's Tabare Vazquez have proved more moderate leftists, publicly expressing their friendship with Chavez while maintaining cordial ties to the Bush administration.

Although Lula trends left, Brazil remains a functioning democracy with a stable economy that offers an alternative to Chavez-style politics.

"This is precisely the type of government the United States would like to see in South America," said Paolo Sotero, a Brazilian analyst at the Wilson Center. "Brazil is a natural ally."

In addition, Brazil and the United States are the world leaders in producing ethanol, the plant-based fuel being used as a blend with gasoline in cars. Combined, the two countries could expand and dominate the world ethanol market, Sotero said.

Closer to home, the Bush administration sees Mexico as another foil to Chavez in the region, a key trading partner and as a crucial ally in the drug war. Few were more relieved than the White House when Calderon won a controversial squeaker election over leftist rival Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador in the summer.

DOJ_NMG_0139882

Both Calderon and the White House intend to push for an overhaul of immigration law this year, of which Mexico would be the prime beneficiary. And Calderon has moved in his first three months in office to strengthen cooperation with the United States in narcotics enforcement.

"The administration really wants Calderon to succeed," said Pamela Starr, a Mexico analyst with the Eurasia Group risk-analysis firm in Washington.

Dealing with ColombiaEn route to meeting Calderon in Mexico, Bush will make a short layover in Colombia, where President Alvaro Uribe has become embroiled in a scandal linking senior members of his government with right-wing militias that finance themselves in part through the cocaine trade.

But Uribe strongly supported the Iraq war and is a no-holds-barred anti-drug warrior. That ranks him among Washington's closest allies in the region.

Uribe wants a new package of nearly $750 million in mostly military aid and is pushing for a longer-term commitment of U.S. support. A U.S.-Colombia trade agreement remains pending in the Congress.

On a two-day visit to Guatemala, Bush will meet with President Oscar Berger, also a conservative, in what one analyst called payback for that country's challenge last year to Chavez's failed bid for a rotating seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Like most winter sojourns, Bush's tour may prove a pleasant respite from the pressures at home. But analysts say that like a hastily acquired suntan, the trip's impact, for both the White House and Latin America, will soon fade.

"There isn't time to do anything," Fernandez de Castro said, referring to Bush's remaining months in office. "He will be just another president who came into office promising to pay attention to the region who ended up not doing that."

Iran President Meets Saudi To Discuss Mideast Issues (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, Sunday, March 4 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran met with King Abdullah here in the Saudi capital on Saturday to address the Middle East's growing sectarian and political crises.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who arrived in Riyadh in the afternoon, was greeted at the airport by King Abdullah, a rare honor from the aging monarch, and talks began shortly afterward, the official Saudi Press Agency reported. Later, he was the guest of honor at a state dinner put on by the king and attended by top Saudi officials and dignitaries, and he held further meetings with the king.

Without elaboration, Prince Saud al-Faisal, the Saudi foreign minister, told [a news organization], "The two parties have agreed to stop any attempt aimed at spreading sectarian strife in the region."

The trip was Mr. Ahmadinejad's first official visit to the Saudi kingdom, and is widely believed to have been set up at the behest of the Iranians. It was the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts by the two regional powers, as well as other Arab countries.

The two leaders met just as diplomats from Germany and the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council talked Saturday about tougher sanctions on Iran for its continued uranium enrichment efforts in defiance of the Council. The diplomats, speaking in a conference call, ended their discussion without an agreement.

King Abdullah and Mr. Ahmadinejad were believed to be focused on finding ways to end the political standoff in Lebanon between Hezbollah, backed by Iran, and the government of Fouad Siniora, supported by the United States. Saudi Arabia and Iran have expressed alarm at the sectarian violence in Iraq, worrying that it could fuel similar tensions throughout the Middle East.

Saudi Arabia has in recent months led an aggressive diplomatic effort to counterbalance Iran's growing influence in the region, most recently playing host in Mecca to the warring Palestinian organizations, Hamas and Fattah, to resolve their differences and to arrive at a government of national unity. Saudi Arabia is also said to be working to bring Lebanese parties together to reach a peaceful settlement of the three-month crisis.

But many analysts also expected Mr. Ahmadinejad to offer a more stark message warning to Arab governments that everyone would be harmed by any possible United States attack on Iran. The United States has been expanding its naval presence in the Persian Gulf in recent weeks, with a second aircraft carrier group now in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0139883

Mr. Ahmadinejad departed late Saturday night, the Saudi Press Agency reported, after about eight hours on the ground, despite initial plans for him to leave on Sunday.

Iran's Ahmadinejad Visits Saudi Amid Regional Crises (AFP)

By Lydia Georgi

AFP, March 3, 2007

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad left Saudi Arabia late Saturday after talks with King Abdullah which had been expected to focus on the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq, the crisis in Lebanon and Tehran's nuclear row with the West.

Saudi officials said Ahmadinejad departed after spending some seven hours in the kingdom, but did not give details about the talks, which lasted around two hours.

The Saudi monarch hosted a dinner for the Iranian leader, whom he greeted earlier at an airbase in Riyadh in a red-carpet but brief ceremony which underlined the working nature of the visit.

Ahmadinejad, who previously saw the king at an Islamic summit in Mecca in December 2005, said before leaving Tehran that he would discuss how Iran and the kingdom could work together to reduce tensions in the Middle East.

"We will discuss with King Abdullah the joint work that we have to carry out in the Islamic world and the region," he told reporters.

"Iran and Saudi Arabia are two significant countries whose relations in recent years have been expanding and developing, and we are interested in expanding our stable ties," he said.

Relations between the two regional heavyweights have been strained over non-Arab Iran's growing influence in Iraq and its perceived backing of Shiite militias battling the once-ruling Sunni minority there.

The Iranian president, whose country has been accused by the United States of meddling in the region, also said Iran was ready to do all it could to reduce political tensions in Lebanon.

"If Lebanon requests the Islamic Republic of Iran to assist its national unity and independence then we are ready to help," he said.

Lebanon has severely tested ties between predominantly Shiite Iran and Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia, a key US ally which provides substantial financial aid to Beirut and which has close links with the Western-backed government of Sunni Prime Minister Fuad Siniora.

The anti-Syrian Lebanese administration has been crippled by an opposition ministerial walkout and an open-ended protest spearheaded by the Iranian-backed Shiite movement Hezbollah, raising fears of Sunni-Shiite clashes.

Lebanon's parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri arrived in Riyadh earlier on Saturday. A source close to Hariri told AFP he would have contacts with Saudi officials on issues connected to Lebanon and the region.

Iran is also accused by the United States, Riyadh's top Western ally, of arming Shiite militants attacking US forces in Iraq -- a charge that Tehran vehemently denies.

"We should allow the Iraqis to implement their decisions and enforce security themselves," Ahmadinejad said on Saturday.

In December, King Abdullah likened the situation in the Arab world to "a powder keg waiting for a spark to explode," and Riyadh and Tehran recently began working together to reduce tensions in Lebanon.

The two oil powerhouses have sought to contain differences over Iraq, which at one point saw Saudi Arabia accusing the United States of effectively handing the country to Iran and triggered reports -- swiftly denied by Riyadh -- of possible Saudi intervention on behalf of Sunnis.

Saudi commentators saw Ahmadinejad's visit as a sign that the two countries are pooling efforts to ease regional crises at a time when Tehran is under heavy Western pressure over its nuclear ambitions and Riyadh is keen to avert a US-Iran military showdown which could destabilise the entire Gulf region.

The visit "might yield a joint initiative" to break the deadlock in Lebanon and lead to "an understanding that will ease the conflict in Iraq," analyst Anwar Eshki told AFP.

The leading daily Al-Riyadh said a "half success" of the Saudi-Iranian summit would be "better than the continuation of crises" in regional trouble spots.

DOJ_NMG_0139884

"Mr President," said the Saudi Gazette, "your visit in this darkest hour yet for our region offers hope" of achieving Muslim unity.

"As we people of the desert know, it's always darkest before dawn."

Ahmadinejad's moderate predecessor, Mohammad Khatami, visited Saudi Arabia in 1999 and 2002, repairing relations which had nosedived after Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution.

Mid-East Vow To Curb Sectarianism (BBC)

BBC.com, March 4, 2007

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah have agreed to work together to fight sectarian strife in the Middle East.

The announcement followed a visit by Mr Ahmadinejad to Riyadh for rare talks.

Speaking on his return to Tehran, he said the two countries would stand together against "enemy plots" seeking to divide the Muslim world.

The summit comes at a time of sectarian division and tension between Saudis and Iran over events in Iraq and Lebanon.

Saudi Arabia, a major Sunni power in the region, and Iran, an important Shia power, have found themselves aligned with groups on opposing political sides.

Correspondents say Saudi Arabia has led a diplomatic drive in recent months to counterbalance what it sees as Iran's growing influence in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

Closing ranks

An account of the talks was issued by the official Saudi Press Agency early on Sunday, shortly after Mr Ahmadinejad left Riyadh to return home to Tehran.

Iran and Saudi Arabia oppose the dominance of enemies over the region and their conspiracies. During this trip, we tried to devise some measures to prevent the enemies from harming the Muslim world and to foil their plots

President Ahmadinejad "The two leaders asserted that the greatest danger threatening the Muslim nation at the present time is the attempt to spread strife between Sunni and Shia Muslims and that efforts should be exerted to stop such attempts and close ranks," it said.

The agency quoted Mr Ahmadinejad as saying he supported Saudi attempts to calm the situation in Lebanon and resolve the political crisis there.

There has been a recent flurry of contacts between Saudi Arabia, which is influential with Lebanon's Sunnis, and Iran, which backs Hezbollah and is also allied to Syria.

The two leaders also reportedly stressed the importance of Palestinian unity and the need to safeguard Iraq's independence and integrity.

'Common views'

Speaking in Tehran after the talks, Mr Ahmadinejad said: "We discussed the Palestinian and Iraq issues comprehensively. We have common views in this regard."

He also said that "plots carried out by the enemies in order to divide the world of Islam were discussed" and that the Saudis had joined Iran in condemning them, the AFP news agency reports.

Mr Ahmadinejad said he supported Saudi efforts to calm Lebanon "Iran and Saudi Arabia oppose the dominance of enemies over the region and their conspiracies. During this trip, we tried to devise some measures to prevent the enemies from harming the Muslim world and to foil their plots," Mr Ahmadinejad said.

Mr Ahmadinejad's trip to Riyadh came as Iran is under growing pressure from the West over its refusal to halt its uranium enrichment programme.

The US has also claimed that the "highest levels" of Iran's government are supplying arms used by Shia militants in Iraq.

Watching anxiously

Iran is a rising power bolstered by the removal by the US of its two great enemies - the Taleban in Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq - the BBC's diplomatic correspondent Jonathan Marcus says.

DOJ_NMG_0139885

Iran's Shia allies are now the dominant force in Iraq, while Tehran's influence is spreading more widely into Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

Sunni-ruled states like Jordan and Saudi Arabia are watching Iran's rise with a degree of anxiety, our correspondent adds.

It makes sense for the Saudis and the Iranians to talk as neither country has an interest in a Sunni-Shia rivalry in the region getting out of control, our correspondent says.

Indeed, the fact that this bilateral meeting has come ahead of a wider multilateral gathering on Iraq suggests that some sort of new understanding just might be in the works, he says.

North Korea Inspections Will Put U.S. To The Test Too (LAT)

By Bob Drogin

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

The return of U.N. monitors could disprove White House assertions about Pyongyang's nuclear program.

WASHINGTON — North Korea's unexpected promise last month to open its nuclear weapons arsenals and production facilities to U.N. inspectors provided a welcome foreign policy success for the White House, but may prove embarrassing as well.

At stake is whether the Bush administration overstated a purported secret North Korean program to produce highly enriched uranium for nuclear bombs in 2002. President Bush's charges that autumn about the alleged program helped derail an accord intended to freeze the weapons effort before it could produce fissile material for a bomb.

North Korea tossed out United Nations nuclear inspectors, built up a stockpile of plutonium and finally tested a small nuclear device last October, using plutonium rather than enriched uranium as fuel.

Under last month's agreement among North Korea, the U.S. and four other countries, the U.N.'s chief nuclear inspector, Mohamed ElBaradei, has scheduled a three-day visit to Pyongyang, the North Korean capital, beginning March 13 to arrange the inspectors' return. The inspectors could validate the U.S. suspicions, or could prove them unfounded.

Questions about the uranium enrichment effort emerged last week when the chief U.S. intelligence officer for North Korea, Joseph R. DeTrani, appeared to suggest during a congressional hearing that intelligence authorities had backtracked from their original classified assessments.

Afterward, senior intelligence officials argued that their assessments had not changed.

They said the evidence was clear that in mid-2002, North Korea obtained uranium-spinning centrifuges and other tools and components necessary for an illicit enrichment program. However, they said, the evidence has always appeared far less conclusive as to whether Pyongyang procured enough equipment to start industrial-scale enrichment of uranium, whether it installed and operated any of the machinery or whether it has sought additional supplies.

The intelligence officials and some others spoke on condition of anonymity when discussing internal interpretations of intelligence assessments.

John D. Negroponte, deputy secretary of State, said Friday that inspections should resolve the questions. The recent accord calls for a "full and complete" accounting of North Korea's nuclear programs, including "its uranium enrichment activities," he told reporters in Tokyo.

Negroponte, the former director of national intelligence, said the judgment of the intelligence community "is that they are very confident that North Korea had an enrichment program in the past, and they are moderately confident that this program still continues."

A U.S. intelligence official in Washington said the apparent shift in language is "not a change in what the confidence level was. It's not an effort to look back at what we thought of the program. It's an effort to look at where it is in the present."

Another U.S. intelligence official said the question of what North Korea did with its centrifuges, and how far or how quickly it progressed in uranium enrichment, "was always presented as murky and with caveats. Nothing has changed. We are absolutely not backtracking or changing the judgment."

But a U.S. diplomat with access to the intelligence said the administration was "trying to walk back some of the rhetoric."

"The problem is they've opened up a can of worms," the diplomat said. "Was this another case of faulty intelligence, like Iraq? Or is it possible they cooked the books?"

DOJ_NMG_0139886

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) sought clarification from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, asking them in a letter whether any intelligence assessments on North Korea's programs had changed since 2002. "If so, when did it change, why did it change and how did it change?" he wrote.

The Senate Intelligence Committee also is "taking steps to understand the evolution" of the assessments on North Korea since 2002, an aide said.

Few doubts appeared in White House statements and public CIA reports on the enrichment program in 2002.

At a news conference in November that year, President Bush said: "We discovered that, contrary to an agreement they had with the United States, they're enriching uranium, with a desire of developing a weapon."

In an unclassified estimate for Congress that month, the CIA wrote that North Korea "is constructing a plant that could produce enough weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year when fully operational — which could be as soon as mid-decade."

Robert Gallucci, who was the chief U.S. negotiator with North Korea in the mid-1990s, called the mid-decade conjecture a "worst-case scenario."

"It could also be 10 to 20 years," he said last week. "The estimates were a wild guess."

David Albright, an arms expert who heads the Institute for Science and International Security, a nonprofit group that tracks nuclear issues and opposes arms proliferation, said the U.S. assessments of North Korea's uranium enrichment effort "appear to be flawed." He compared them to prewar misjudgments on Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction.

"I think there were deliberate attempts to hype all this," Albright said. "Now that the administration has got a deal with North Korea, they're on the other side. They don't want to slit their own throats with things they said back in 2002."

N. Korea Talks May Lead To New Era (MCT)

McClatchy, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As North Korean and U.S. officials sit down Monday to begin mending fences after 55 years of hot war and cold peace, it will be a turning point for both countries -- and it could be the beginning of a transformation for President Bush.

Republican presidents in the past have made policy shifts that Democrats feared to take. Dwight Eisenhower ended the Korean War, and Richard Nixon opened relations with communist China.

There's also a bipartisan tradition of two-term presidents turning to diplomacy in their final years in office.

Ronald Reagan railed against the Soviet "Evil Empire" in his first term, then cut nuclear arms deals with Mikhail Gorbachev in his second, opening the way to ending the Cold War. Bill Clinton mostly ignored foreign policy in his first term, then threw himself into Middle East peacemaking as his days in office drew to a close, although he came up short.

But one big question about Bush's opening to North Korea and steps last week that could lead to a dialogue with Iran and Syria is whether a vision of peace is the driving force or desperation over a string of diplomatic failures, last fall's elections and a failing war in Iraq.

The other big question is whether the administration is sincerely interested in negotiating normal relations with North Korea, Iran and Syria or remains interested in overthrowing them.

The talks in New York between U.S. envoy Chris Hill and North Korean Vice Minister Kim Kye Gwan will occur a week after the United States agreed to sit down at an international conference on Iraq with representatives of Iran and Syria.

Many foreign-policy observers say the decisions add up to a major turn, or at least the start of one.

"The point is, it's an important shift. But it's only a start," said Daniel Serwer of the U.S. Institute of Peace. Serwer was the executive director of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which urged Bush to launch a diplomatic initiative on Iraq that included Iran and Syria.

"You have to have sincere talks with these people," he said. "Getting results is going to be tough. Let's face it, America is much weakened by this experience" in Iraq.

Vision doesn't seem to be the prime motivator of Bush's shift on North Korea: It may have been more a shift of advisers. Confrontation with North Korea, advocated by a hard-line faction in the administration, may have helped provoke Pyongyang into developing and testing a nuclear weapon, the opposite of U.S. intent.

DOJ_NMG_0139887

But now the hard-line faction, led by Vice President Dick Cheney, has been weakened by the U.S. failure in Iraq, the perjury trial of Cheney's former chief of staff and the departure of some of his allies in the administration, among them Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary and John Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. This has worked to the advantage of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was facing a grim final two years in office with little to show for it.

Her own official version is that the openings to Iran, Syria and North Korea are part of a well-planned strategy.

"What you have to understand is, this didn't happen overnight. OK? These policies have been put in place over a period of years," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "Now you are seeing the administration in a position to be able to reap some of the benefits of the diplomatic groundwork that has been laid."

There's little evidence that Bush, who usually portrays himself more as a rough and tumble politician than as a visionary, undertook the opening to Iran and Syria with a long-term aim of normalizing relations.

The talks in Iraq won't be direct negotiations, and the only real development will be that U.S. officials will sit at the same table with Iranian and Syrian officials at talks hosted by the government of Iraq.

Some suspect that Rice's announcement before a Senate committee was aimed mostly at defusing rising congressional criticism of Bush's Iraq policy.

"A lot of our discussions and the votes over the last several weeks, I think, have prompted the administration to begin a diplomatic effort, which is long overdue," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I.

The toughest critics of the president's shift are conservatives, who fear that U.S. adversaries will see the administration as severely weakened by the war in Iraq.

"Negotiating with bad guys from a position of weakness is not the right place to start," said Danielle Pletka, the vice president of the conservative American Enterprise Institute.

U.S. Urged To Reject Taiwan Missile Sale (AP)

By Joe McDonald, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 4, 2007

China pressed visiting Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte on Saturday to reject a proposed sale of missiles to Taiwan, the self-ruled island that Beijing claims as its own territory.

Negroponte was visiting Beijing on a three-nation Asian tour focused on North Korea and regional security.

In his meetings with Chinese officials, "the Chinese side expressed that it is firmly opposed to the export and sale of weapons to Taiwan and the United States maintaining official relations with Taiwan," said Qin Gang, a Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman.

An American Embassy spokeswoman said the U.S. government had no comment on the meetings.

China and Taiwan separated in 1949 but the communist Beijing government claims the island as part of its territory and has threatened repeatedly to attack. The United States is Taiwan's main arms supplier, though Beijing vehemently objects to such sales.

Taiwan is trying to buy 218 AMRAAM medium range air-to-air missiles and another 235 Maverick missiles at an estimated cost of $421 million.

"China is improving its military power and we treat that as a threat," Rear Adm. Wu Chi-fang, a Taiwanese Defense Ministry spokesman, said Saturday.

A statement on the proposed sale issued earlier this week said it would improve Taiwan's security and promote "political stability, military balance and economic progress in the region."

Negroponte met with Chinese Foreign Ministers Yang Jiechi and Dai Bingguo after arriving Saturday from Tokyo. He was due to meet later with Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan.

The sides did not discuss Iran or North Korea but might later, Qin said.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry said earlier that the proposed missile sale would "seriously violate" previous commitments made by Washington to reduce arms sales to Taiwan and be a "rude interference into China's internal affairs."

DOJ_NMG_0139888

"The Chinese side hopes that the United States can definitively keep its promise to work with the Chinese side together and fight and contain Taiwan independence in order to maintain peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait," Qin said.

Negroponte's tour of Japan, China and South Korea is his first foreign trip since being confirmed last month as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy.

A focus of the trip is relations with China, a major U.S. trading partner and key player on such diplomatic issues as North Korea, Iran and Sudan.

___

Associated Press Writer Eric Talmadge contributed to this report from Taipei, Taiwan.

China Warns Negroponte On Taiwan Arms Sales (AFP)

By Dan Martin

AFP, March 4, 2007

China warned visiting US Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte that plans to sell American missiles to Taiwan threatened to harm Sino-US ties, a Chinese spokesman said Saturday.

Negroponte arrived Saturday for a three-day visit and met with Deputy Foreign Minister Dai Bingguo for talks the US State Department had said would touch on a range of issues including Iran, Iraq, the North Korean nuclear pact and trade.

But they spent Saturday explaining their positions on touchy bilateral topics such as the perceived threat of China's military rise and US plans to sell 450 air and ground missiles to Taiwan, Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang told reporters.

The planned purchase by democratic Taiwan has upset the leaders of China's Communist Party, which views the island as a renegade province to be reunited with the motherland.

"In order to ensure the healthy development of China-US relations, China resolutely opposes US weapons sales to Taiwan," Qin quoted Dai as telling Negroponte during their two-hour meeting.

Ties had already cooled somewhat after US Vice President Dick Cheney's comments, on a trip to Australia, that China's military growth and recent test of a satellite-killer missile did not jibe with its stated peaceful aims.

Qin said Dai told Negroponte that China was not to be feared.

"China will always adhere to the path of peaceful development. In international affairs it will continue to be a constructive and cooperative participant. China's development is peaceful and poses no threat to the United States or to the world," Qin said.

Negroponte's stop in Beijing is the second leg of a trip that has already taken him to Japan and will include a stop next week in South Korea.

All three are US partners in the six-nation effort to get North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons and part of his trip is expected to focus on how to make sure Pyongyang holds up its end of the deal.

After exhaustive negotiations, the United States and North Korea signed a new six-nation agreement last month under which Pyongyang agreed to give up its nuclear weapons programmes in exchange for economic and energy aid.

Negroponte, formerly the top US spy chief and installed last month as number two to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, told the Senate during his confirmation hearings that the US should pursue a policy of engagement with China "on all levels," rather than one of confrontation.

China and the US had worked closely together on hammering out the North Korea nuclear deal.

China To Increase Its Military Budget (AP)

AP, March 4, 2007

China's military spending, a point of contention with the United States, will jump 17.8 percent this year, the spokesman for the National People's Congress said Sunday.

Jiang Enzhu told a news conference on the eve of the annual meeting of China's legislature that military spending would hit $44.94 billion in 2007 — an increase of $6.84 billion over last year, though experts believe the true figure of China's military spending could be several times the amount that it reports.

Jiang said most of the money would be spent on boosting wages and living allowances for the 2.5 million-member People's Liberation Army, and on upgrading armaments. He did not give any other details.

DOJ_NMG_0139889

The announcement of the increased budget comes as China's leaders display renewed confidence in their ability to control divisive political debate, putting to a vote a toughly contested bill on property rights at this year's session of the national legislature.

The proposed property rights law and an uncontroversial corporate tax bill are the only pieces of legislation before the congress in its 12-day session which opens Monday. The two measures are all but certain to pass, legal scholars and Chinese political watchers said.

Such certainty says much about change in a political system in which the Communist Party tightly controls the reins of power but ordinary Chinese, emboldened by economic and social changes, feel increasingly free to voice opinions.

Dominated by the party, the congress is largely powerless. Still, a year ago an angry campaign by conservative communists that portrayed the property bill as a sellout of popular interests to a corrupt business elite — and that was amplified by fiery Internet postings — forced leaders to scuttle plans to put the measure before the congress.

Now, "the central leadership is quite comfortable with the debate because they can control it," said Cheng Li, a Chinese politics specialist at Washington's Brookings Institute. At the congress session, "they want to create a kind of atmosphere. They want to show there's some openness."

In power for nearly five years, ever-cautious party chief Hu Jintao, Premier Wen Jiabao and other leaders are coming into their own, putting their stamp on policies to spread the benefits of economic growth more evenly across a society with a large rich-poor gap. The initiatives, though still works in progress, have proven popular.

Heavy politicking is always the main agenda at the congress, which is comprised of nearly 3,000 members drawn mainly from provincial political notables and military commanders. This year's session is more so, with Hu and his allies seeking support for a renewed mandate at a pivotal once-in-five-years party conclave to be held later this year.

Congress deputies are to pass the government's budget, including the hefty increase in military spending, and endorse policies to keep the economy humming along at a slightly moderated pace from its double-digit growth of the past four years.

China's increased military spending has drawn comments from the United States, most recently from Vice President Dick Cheney, who on a swing through Asia last month said some of Beijing's actions were at odds with its words about its military expansion being peaceful.

In smaller groups, the deputies are also expected to discuss pressing social issues — extending health care insurance to rural Chinese, avoiding volatility in the high-flying stock markets, and excising the rampant corruption that excites public anger.

Hu and his colleagues have in the past year launched a robust anti-corruption campaign, cashiering a handful of top officials and tens of thousands of lower-level ones.

Jiang said Sunday that former Shanghai party chief Chen Liangyu, who is under arrest for a pension scandal in China's financial capital, would not be attending the legislature.

The pending property law, drafted and redrafted over eight years, could also set off passions. The lack of clear ownership rights and protections is a crucial impediment to further market reforms, complicating business mergers and leaving ordinary Chinese at risk of land seizures by local governments.

But Jiang rejected criticism the property law went against China's Constitution, saying it gave equal protection to public and private property. He said that "under a socialist market economy," state, collective and private property should be entitled to equal rights.

China's Quirky Stock Market Finally Matters (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Its Problems Become the World's

SHANGHAI -- Looking at the facts, the past year seems to have been disastrous for Worldbest Pharmaceutical. First, there were reports of accounting irregularities and exaggerated profit. Half the managers were fired. Then, in the summer, six people died and at least 80 fell ill after receiving an antibiotic injection manufactured by a subsidiary. Most recently, the company warned investors that it was likely to report its third consecutive year of losses.

DOJ_NMG_0139890

None of that cooled the enthusiasm of investors on China's Shanghai Stock Exchange, who since the end of March 2006 have driven the value of Worldbest's shares up 44 percent.

The Shanghai exchange and its smaller counterpart in Shenzhen, near the country's extreme southern border, have long been viewed skeptically by global capitalists, even those enthusiastic about the broader Chinese economy. The markets were considered too new, too small, too closed and too quirky to matter.

That attitude was put to a test last week when, for the first time, a big drop in the Chinese markets helped spark a global stock sell-off. Suddenly, it seemed, the views of Chinese investors mattered to the rest of the world.

And as the Chinese government takes steps to clean up market practices and allow more foreign investments, the rest of the world's markets are likely to continue to feel its growing pains.

Though China's is one of the fastest-growing economies in the world, it remains heavily influenced by the Communist state. The stock markets are not the main source of capital in China -- that role is played by banks, all of them controlled or heavily influenced by the Chinese government. Many analysts also see the stock markets as subject to more government manipulation than is the norm in capitalist countries.

It remains murky exactly what role the Chinese government played last week, when the Shanghai composite index fell 9 percent, either in setting off the panic by talking about new regulations or in countering it after it started by buying securities.

"There were some reports of state buying -- I don't know how reliable those are. But it's also possible people may have decided 9 percent in one day was too much and they are still bullish on stocks," said Stephen Green, senior economist at Standard Chartered Bank in Shanghai. "I don't think anyone really knows where we go from here."

The Chinese markets made up half of Tuesday's losses in Wednesday's rebound. The Shanghai composite index ended the week down about 4 percent, at 2831.53. Global markets also stabilized after Tuesday's drop and then rose modestly. But the fall left investors wondering whether China's new influence over stock markets adds fresh risks to a global financial picture already plagued by huge trade imbalances and bubbles in the prices of many assets.

China's strict capital controls -- the fact that it is hard to convert the yuan into other currencies and vice versa -- for years insulated its stock markets from outside tremors. Concerns about transparency and corruption have also kept some investors away. Although foreign institutional investors have increased the number of shares of Chinese-listed companies they own in recent years, they still hold less than 4 percent in the Shanghai and Shenzhen markets.

"When you think of the Shanghai market, it's best to think of it as another continent or even another planet," said Jonathan Anderson, UBS chief economist for Asia.

Concerned that isolation would stall its economic transformation, China has introduced a number of reforms in recent years. As a result, China's equity market is becoming increasingly integrated into the rest of the world's. Dual listings of Chinese companies have meant that rumors that start on the mainland can jump to Hong Kong. London companies with large shares in public Chinese companies mean that their bottom line could fluctuate based on what happens in the Shanghai market. Hedge funds, lightly regulated investment pools that specialize in risky investments, hold stocks in China as well as New York. That has meant that an automatic sell-off of one fund could affect more than one market.

Economic success in China and other Asian countries has given the region large foreign reserves, producing a global money glut that has driven down interest rates and driven up the price of assets from San Francisco to Sydney to Shanghai, creating worries of an asset bubble in China and elsewhere. The Chinese government has been trying to address those imbalances, but it is unclear whether that can happen in an orderly way in an economy so heavily controlled by a Communist government.

An announcement by the Chinese government that it was cracking down on illegal trading contributed to the Shanghai stock exchange's dramatic slide on Tuesday.

Established in 1990, the Shanghai market has for most of its existence has been considered one of the world's worst stock exchanges.

From 2002 until the beginning of 2006, even as the Chinese economy grew 10 percent a year, the stock market fell. And as late as mid-2006, large Chinese companies would not list their stocks on the mainland markets as a matter of course. But

DOJ_NMG_0139891

Chinese policymakers pushed changes to improve the credibility of the market. Instead of requiring only annual or semiannual reports, for example, companies now have to release quarterly reports.

Three years ago, Chinese officials took control of five brokerages that had engaged in illegal trading. Last year, securities regulators freed the more than 1,300 listed companies to sell their state-owned shares over time, in effect putting $270 billion in government-controlled assets into the public sphere.

Analysts think that was at least partially responsible for setting off the recent stock market boom. Another factor was the increasing number of Chinese consumers borrowing against real estate and investing in stocks. State-owned enterprises and large Chinese investment firms control 40 to 50 percent of shares, with the rest owned by individual Chinese shareholders. This differs from the United States and other more mature markets, where institutions control 80 or more percent of shares.

As of the end of 2006, 842 companies were listed on the Shanghai Stock Exchange. Its composite index was up 130 percent from the previous year, far outperforming the Dow Jones industrial average, which was up 16 percent.

In recent months, the Shanghai and Shenzhen exchanges have had a combined market capitalization of roughly $1.4 trillion, compared with the New York Stock Exchange's $20 trillion.

There are other indicators that the government influence on the markets is starting to recede.

Ninety to 95 percent of the companies listed, such as China Telecom, Baoshan Iron & Steel and the Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, remain state-owned. But in recent months, "we're finally seeing for the first time, good, big companies listing rather than heading straight for Hong Kong," said Peter Alexander, founder and principal of Z-Ben Advisors, an investment consultancy in Shanghai.

Many challenges to achieving a fully transparent and fair stock exchange remain, however.

Part of the difficulty is that the typical structure of Chinese companies listed on the exchanges differs from those of the United States in that most have state-owned parent companies that are not listed.

"There is a degree of interconnectedness among companies and parent companies and stockbrokers and securities companies that really is pretty much without parallel. There is a possibility for insider transactions is much greater in China than most places," said Barry J. Naughton, a professor of Chinese economy at the University of California at San Diego and a contributor to the Hoover Institution's China Leadership Monitor publication.

Still, UBS's Anderson said many investors stay in the stock market knowing full well that the system and companies may have some problems.

Take the case of Worldbest Pharmaceutical. Or that of Pudong Development Bank. In June, the bank announced that it was duped by a customer who used fake identity papers to apply for 126 million yuan in loans that he used to buy 91 luxury properties that had since fallen in value. Then, in September, it discovered that 12 bank employees from its wealth-management operations had misused 73 million yuan.

Share prices fell briefly after the two announcements but quickly rebounded. Today, the stock is up more than 140 percent from when first announcement was made, closing at 21.95 yuan a share on Friday.

Shanghai-listed Sichuan Mingxing Electric Power has been informing shareholders that its biggest shareholder, Zhou Yiming, had been effectively embezzling hundreds of millions of yuan in company assets by pledging them against loans. But the company's stock has soared 81 percent from 3.66 yuan a share since January 2006, when the company warned the scandal would affect its bottom line, forcing it into the red.

On Internet bulletin boards for the three stocks, investors dissect the companies' troubles but then say they will hold or buy anyway. One reason is optimism that China is growing so fast that any stock whose value depends on Chinese consumers -- medicine, banking services, or energy -- can only go up. Then there's a sense among some investors that if things go wrong the state will bail them out.

For example, Worldbest was flagged for "special treatment" by the stock exchange in April 2006. That is usually bad news, that trading may be suspended or that the stock may be delisted. But Worldbest investors figured that it meant the state had become aware of the company's problems and was preparing to step in. They took it as a buy signal.

DOJ_NMG_0139892

"It's a recognition of reality that the Chinese government has the ability to move these markets. Nobody doubts that," Naughton said. But faith that the Chinese government, despite its deep pockets, will always be around to help is misplaced, he said. "They may have the ability to make the markets go up. But they don't have the ability to make them go up forever."

Shanghai What-If: How A Shock Can Become A Shock Wave (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

COULD this be the global financial meltdown? Less than a week ago, it might have seemed preposterous to suggest that a 9 percent fall in the Shanghai stock exchange could jolt markets across the world, triggering declines in everything from European stocks to American corporate bonds.

Yet such unlikely chains of events have been known to occur. Less than 10 years ago, the devaluation of the Thai baht on July 2, 1997, triggered a wave of currency collapses across East Asia and beyond.

By December of that year, the currencies of Indonesia, Korea, Malaysia and the Philippines had depreciated by about 75 percent, on average. Then the ruble fell. The Russian government defaulted on its domestic debt. By the time the dust settled, Brazil had devalued the real, Turkey had devalued the lira and the Argentine peso had collapsed.

Economies contracted from Ecuador to Singapore. And the high-flying hedge fund Long Term Capital Management, which had borrowed heaps of money to make risky bets across the globe, was only saved from the brink through a bailout organized by the Federal Reserve.

“These panics can be set off by any number of things and spread in many wondrous ways,” said Alan Blinder, an economist at Princeton University who was vice chairman of the Federal Reserve from 1994 to 1996. “Every one of these is different.”

The world, of course, is a different place than it was in the late 1990s. Developing countries are in much better shape, mostly growing fast and running trade surpluses rather than deficits. Many have repaid much of their foreign debt. And they have piled up humongous reserves.

Moreover, despite a slowdown in the United States, the global economy appears to be doing swimmingly. Growth in Europe and Japan has picked up. The International Monetary Fund expects the world economy to grow around 5 percent in 2007, about the same pace as last year.

Even so, there are some dangers lurking, notably America’s enormous trade deficit. But decisions by investors last week to dump risky assets like stocks in China or Brazil and instead buy safer bets like United States Treasury bonds actually makes it easier to finance America’s shortfall.

Still, the financial commotion last week underscored the extent to which financial markets everywhere are propped up by the same shaky crutch that has played a prominent role in the events leading up to crises in the past: overconfidence. “It was a bit of a wake-up call to investors about the risks out there,” said Kristin J. Forbes, an economist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who was on President Bush’s Council of Economic Advisers from 2003 to 2005. “Up to now investors had become too complacent about risk.”

Facing paltry yields on high quality assets like United States Treasury bonds, and diminishing returns on more stocks in industrial countries, investors have delved farther afield in pursuit of higher returns.

They rushed again into developing countries — pouring more than $500 billion into “emerging markets” last year and a similar amount in 2005. At its peak on Feb. 8, the Bombay stock market index was 49 percent higher than a year earlier. The Mexican market index was up about 55 percent in the year at its peak on Feb. 21. Even after the crack on Tuesday, the Shanghai stock market index is still twice as high as it was a year ago.

Investors have also rushed to buy dicey assets closer to home, like corporate bonds with a relatively high risk of default.

Last year, even as the housing market started tottering, investors snapped up $483 billion in bonds backed by sub-prime mortgages issued to the riskiest borrowers. The year before they bought over $500 billion worth of the shaky paper.

And many large investors, from pension funds to hedge funds, have doubled up their risk-taking not only by making these bets with borrowed money, but by borrowing it in Japan, where short-term interest rates have been exceptionally low. This could expose them to abrupt losses were the dollar to fall against the yen.

DOJ_NMG_0139893

The question is, how does this all unwind?

According to the benign scenario, which most economists are betting on, including Ms. Forbes and Mr. Blinder, last week's financial troubles will be short-lived — merely an instance of investors recovering their sense of risk and pulling back from some of their crazier investments, but doing no harm to the real economy.

"So far the betting is this is more a healthy correction rather than a plunge," said William Cline, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics.

Still, crises move in mysterious ways. And there are plausible paths for the financial turbulence to worsen. As Ms. Forbes acknowledged, "The crisis of the future never looks like the crisis of the past."

Let's imagine, for instance, that one unlucky hedge fund borrowed oodles of yen to invest in sub-prime mortgage-backed bonds and Turkish debt.

Let's also say that the yen continued to rise, as it did last week, as more investors caught by the financial crunch sold their losing investments to buy yen in order to repay their Japanese borrowings.

Meanwhile, mortgage-backed bonds and Turkish debt continued to fall.

This could mean trouble for the hedge fund, which would find itself owing yen that were rising in value but owning assets that were falling in value.

That might mean trouble for the banks that lent it money. And if the hedge fund were forced into a fire sale of Turkish bonds, say because it needs more collateral to back up a loan, it could be a problem for Turkey, because the sudden flood of its bonds on the market would cause their prices to drop. And if the price of its bonds fell, Turkey would have a tougher time trying to raise the cash it needs to finance its current deficit.

If Turkey were to go ...

As Mr. Cline put it, "these things are so predictable in hindsight."

The Nuclear Threat From China (WP)

By Mark Helprin

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Before rejoicing over detente with Kim Jong Il, it might be useful to remember that although agreements were reached in the past, his countrymen later built a number of nuclear weapons and carried out a test. Also, North Korea, with a rich chemical and biological arsenal having long ago neutralized American tactical nuclear weapons on the Korean Peninsula, has embarked solely on a program of survival by extortion and will gladly forfeit a power it does not need in exchange for recognition and some essential commodities. The Asian nuclear power of which we must take account is not North Korea but China.

The forerunners of China's government were able to defeat Chiang Kai-shek, fight the United States to a draw in Korea and, merely by means of their country's looming potential, help defeat America in Vietnam. This they did in chaos, poverty and without modern arms, but with strategy bred in the bone. Since 1978, using their extraordinary and sustained economic and technical growth to build military capacity, the Chinese have deliberately modeled themselves on the Meiji (who rapidly transformed feudal Japan into an industrial state able to vanquish the Russian fleet at Tsushima).

In altering their position relative to that of the United States, the Chinese have received generous assistance from the past two American presidents, who have accomplished first a carefree diminution of our orders of battle and then the incompetent deployment of what was left, in a campaign analogous to losing a protracted struggle with Portugal. China advances and we decline because, among other things, its vision is disciplined and clear, while ours is burdened by fear, decadence and officials who understand neither Chinese grand strategy nor its nuclear component.

This has led the United States unwittingly to encourage China to move toward nuclear parity. In the next five years, as we reduce our arsenal from 10,000 strategic warheads to 1,700, China's MIRV'd silo-based missiles and imminent generations of MIRV'd mobile and sea-based ICBMs will easily allow a breakout from warhead numbers now variously estimated to range from 80 to 1,800.

Once, the vast imbalance (in 1987, 500:1) might have discouraged China from such augmentation, but no longer. Our reductions and their growth provide fewer targets for more missiles and will create the possibility and therefore the temptation, however remote, of a first strike. As we have cut the stable sea-based leg of our nuclear deterrent from 37 ballistic missile submarines to 14, China works to build its own and a fleet that can provide protected bastions at sea as well as hunt down the small number of American boats on station.

DOJ_NMG_0139894

Nuclear competition between mature and newly emerging powers is neither unprecedented nor unexpected, but the rule has always been that if nuclear potential exists it must be countered. Although we may no longer subscribe to this, China does. Aware that the United States planned to use nuclear weapons had China violated the Korean armistice, China would understandably seek nuclear balance, if not preponderance.

The danger lies not solely in quantitative instabilities but in potential nuclear strategies that technical evolution has elevated above Cold War paradigms. It is one thing for a few experts to foresee these strategies but quite another to obtain from a people no longer confident of its right to self-defense the political consensus, appropriations and authority to counter them. Consider just one scenario, highlighted by the recent successful test of China's anti-satellite weapon, part of a strategy to exploit technological asymmetries.

Given China's appetites and our alliances and interests, a war is not inconceivable in Taiwan, or in Korea. To remove American nuclear escalation from the equation, China would need not parity but only a deterrent such as it has long possessed. The Chinese, however, whose nuclear thresholds are dissimilar to ours, would have other options.

They know that every facet of America's economy, military and society depends on individual and networked electronic devices. Were these to fail all at once and irreparably, the nation would seize up, perhaps for years.

Faced with victory, or with loss, they might choose to -- and who would venture to guarantee that they would not? -- detonate half a dozen high-megatonnage nuclear charges in the mesosphere, in an electro-magnetic pulse (EMP) strike perhaps not even in American airspace, cooking almost every circuit and semiconductor, rendering the American government blind, deaf and dumber than it is already and the country unable to resist the inroads that would surely follow.

Though we would undoubtedly respond in kind, China is not as technically dependent as are we. Nor, given China's sufficiency for a counterstrike, could we deter an EMP attack with the prospect of massive retaliation, especially because an EMP strike, with no immediate casualties, would seem as peaceful as snow in still air.

The trick in nuclear strategy is to maintain stability by balancing potentials and thus to discourage events from converting the hypothetical to the actual. Required in this case -- only one of many -- is the electronic hardening, redundancy and redesign of essential systems and networks; and missile defense, which would not only close the first-strike window by shielding our second-strike capacity from destruction but protect against an EMP strike directly and dissuade China in the first place by making its deterrent less certain.

Were we to proceed along these lines, we could diminish the chances that China might in the not-so-distant future be tempted to win a nuclear war without fighting a nuclear war. But given that we have ignored explicit warnings of the congressionally chartered EMP commission, what are the chances that we will act on an opinion we dare not even form? In regard to war and the sometimes counterintuitive actions for avoiding it, we are no longer either confident or clearsighted. What a pity to have come so far to find that our rivals and enemies all over the world can run rings around us because half of our politicians have lost their intelligence and the other half have lost their nerve.

Mark Helprin, a novelist, is a senior fellow at the Claremont Institute and a distinguished visiting fellow at Hillsdale College. This article will also appear in the Claremont Review of Books.

Russian Police Beat Democracy Activists (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Dozens Detained During March in St. Petersburg

ST. PETERSBURG, March 3 -- Police clubbed protesters and dragged them into waiting buses Saturday in response to a defiant demonstration against the Kremlin in the heart of President Vladimir Putin's home town.

Several thousand people chanted "Shame!" as they marched down St. Petersburg's main avenue to protest what they said was Russia's rollback from democracy. The demonstration, called the "march of those who disagree," was a rare gathering of the country's often fractious opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0139895

St. Petersburg authorities had prohibited the march, granting permission only for a rally far from the city center, but the activists defied the ban and marched down Nevsky Prospekt, St. Petersburg's main street.

Riot police beat dozens of protesters with truncheons, but several thousand broke through police cordons. They marched toward the city center and rallied for about 40 minutes until police moved in again, detaining people and dragging them into buses.

Several activists attacked a law enforcement officer. Between 20 and 30 people were detained, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported, citing police officials.

Former world chess champion Garry Kasparov, who helped organize the event, said on Echo Moskvy radio that as many as 6,000 people participated, though the crowd appeared to be about half that number.

"The authorities are destroying . . . the constitutional structure, rights and freedoms," said former prime minister Mikhail Kasyanov, who now heads an opposition movement. "Unfortunately, we are going through a very difficult time in our country, but we will continue to fight for our rights."

The activists accused Putin's government of cracking down on the opposition, stifling freedom of speech and hampering democratic institutions by abolishing direct election of provincial governors and creating an obedient parliament.

Mayor Valentina Matviyenko, a close ally of Putin's, called the protesters "guest stars from Moscow" and "youths of extremist persuasion," accusing them of stirring turmoil ahead of elections for the city legislature this month.

The campaign has been marred by allegations of intimidation and harassment after the Yabloko party, one of the country's two main liberal parties, was eliminated from the ballot for what it called groundless technical reasons.

Police And Protesters Clash In St. Petersburg (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

ST. PETERSBURG, Russia, March 3 — An unusually large and unruly protest against the government of President Vladimir V. Putin ended here Saturday in clashes with the police and the arrest of opposition leaders. Rally organizers and the police said more than 100 people were arrested after a midafternoon scuffle between marchers and riot police on the main street, Nevsky Prospekt, in the heart of the city's tourist district. St. Petersburg, Russia's second-largest city, is Mr. Putin's hometown.

The rally was held in advance of local elections scheduled for March 11. Opposition events typically draw no more than several hundred people, but several thousand gathered for the rally in Vosstaniya Square.

Two leaders of what is left of Russia's liberal opposition, Garry Kasparov, the former chess grandmaster, and Mikhail A. Kasyanov, a former prime minister, spoke to the crowd. Then the protesters, accompanied by Mr. Kasparov, marched most of the length of the street, pushing through three police cordons as sirens wailed and Interior Ministry riot police scrambled to block their path.

The rally marked one of the higher-profile actions by Mr. Kasparov since he retired from professional chess to dedicate himself to opposition politics.

"This is our first real victory," Mr. Kasparov, speaking over a bullhorn, told the crowd on the muddy street, surrounded by rows of police. "I congratulate you for overcoming your fear. We will have victory when we get our Russia back. We have 364 days before the election in 2008."

Minutes after Mr. Kasparov spoke and left the area, the police broke up the crowd, first arresting the speaker who had taken Mr. Kasparov's place.

Mr. Kasparov had handed the bullhorn to Sergey V. Gulayev, a member of an opposition faction in the local legislature in St. Petersburg.

"The government is afraid of the slightest wind," Mr. Gulayev he told the crowd. "The government is fragile, and afraid, and will collapse with one push."

DOJ_NMG_0139896

As he spoke, riot police shoved through the crowd and grabbed the bullhorn from his hands, smashing it against the wall of a building. A policeman put Mr. Gulayev, grimacing, in a headlock and dragged him into a police vehicle as members of the crowd yelled "Shame! Shame!"

A wedge of police officers swinging nightsticks then divided the crowd and pushed it toward the sidewalks. Some protesters fought back and a melee erupted, lasting about a minute.

At one point, a black plastic riot helmet torn from a police officer was flung into the air and clanged onto the muddy pavement, as news photographers and other protesters scrambled away from the swirling fight.

On Friday, Mr. Kasparov, Mr. Kasyanov and Eduard Limonov, head of the National Bolshevik party, led a meeting of the United Civil Front opposition group in St. Petersburg. Mr. Limonov, whose party is aligned with the main liberal opposition, was arrested Saturday morning before the march. He said the group was close to nominating Mr. Kasyanov as its candidate for president in the 2008 elections.

A Russian Plea For Collaboration (WP)

By Sergey Rogov

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

My generation arrived in this world when Russia and America were engaged in a Cold War confrontation. I've spent 40 years -- all my adult life -- studying the United States and Russian-American relations, and now I'm afraid that when my generation leaves this world, America and Russia will be adversaries again. The Cold War ended nearly two decades ago. When communism collapsed, the expectations were high that former enemies would become strategic partners. But it never happened. Why?

Many people in Russia blame America. Many people in America blame Russia. Unfortunately, both are right. Nice but empty declarations cannot substitute for a clear strategy. Personal chemistry between presidents cannot substitute for institutionalized cooperation and common policies. Predictably, the backlash against the unfulfilled hopes and promises is strong today in both countries.

The 1990s were a very difficult time for Russia. Some in the United States saw the beginning of a golden age of democracy, but Russians saw and felt the disintegration of a former superpower. President Boris Yeltsin brought out tanks to fire on the parliament to impose his policy of speedy privatization of industry, business and natural resources, so a few became super-rich and many were pushed into poverty. My country nearly became a failed state. But the worst-case scenario was avoided. With a lot of help from high oil prices, Russia has managed to begin an economic revival. Today the standard of living is going up, and the threat of a civil war is gone. We still face a long and difficult path to a mature democracy and a modern market economy, of course. New mistakes can still be made, but Russia is on its way to recovery.

Meanwhile the United States has enjoyed the fruits of "victory" in the Cold War. Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, Washington's strategy has been to prevent the emergence of a new peer competitor and to extend "the unipolar moment" as long as possible into the 21st century. America has failed to resist the temptation of unilateralism and preemption. A new surge of the arrogance of power brought the United States into Iraq.

The relationship with Russia no longer dominates America's foreign policy. Washington has stopped treating Moscow as an equal player. Instead, Russians have been lectured on the need for domestic reforms, and sometimes given assistance when it directly served U.S. interests. But with the exception of the Nunn-Lugar program to help the former Soviet republics dismantle nuclear weapons, there has been no substantial assistance, no Marshall Plan for Russia.

In fact, Russia has had to repay all the Soviet sovereign debt plus International Monetary Fund and World Bank credits. The flow of capital from Russia (including official transfers and the much bigger illegal and unofficial flight of capital) has exceeded by many times all Western assistance and private investment in Russia. Even today, Russia helps to finance the U.S. federal budget deficit, holding hundreds of billions of dollars in foreign currency reserves (though not as much as China).

Ironically, while some Russian oligarchs make huge investments in America, the U.S. Congress has never repealed the 35-year-old Jackson-Vanik amendment, which treats Russia as a centrally planned economy undeserving of most-favored-nation trading status. This still stings in Moscow.

DOJ_NMG_0139897

On issues of international security, Russia has been treated as a second-rate power whose complaints can be ignored. At the end of the Cold War, President George H.W. Bush proposed a new security system "from Vancouver to Vladivostok," but this idea was quickly forgotten. So was NATO's promise not to expand its military infrastructure eastward beyond West Germany.

"The winner takes all" -- so despite Russia's objections, all former Soviet clients in Eastern Europe have been admitted into NATO, including three former republics of the Soviet Union. And two more former republics -- Georgia and Ukraine -- could be next. Russia's objections were also ignored when NATO started its first war in Kosovo.

At the same time, the old arms-control regime is half-dead. The two strategic arms-limitation agreements on the books will expire in 2009 and 2012. Today there are no serious negotiations between Russia and America about any new arms-control arrangements, and the Bush administration says that there is no more need for legally binding treaties. To demonstrate its point, the administration unilaterally withdrew from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, ignoring Russian objections.

Now the United States wants to deploy the components of missile defenses (interceptors and a radar) in Poland and the Czech Republic. Now Russians are complaining that the deployment of American missile defense systems so close to Russia could undermine Russian nuclear deterrence.

Many in Russia say that the United States violates a commitment to avoid a "substantial deployment of forces" in Eastern Europe, which America and the West made, when the Russia-NATO Founding Act was signed in 1997. The perception of violated promises and mistrust of American intentions produced calls in Moscow to deploy nuclear and conventional medium-range missiles. This could lead to new tensions.

Unfortunately, Russia and America have never fully escaped from the Cold War doctrine of "mutual assured destruction." Both pretend that they may someday confront each other with nuclear weapons. Meanwhile, the nuclear club continues to grow ominously. It now has five official and three "de facto" members. North Korea and Iran could also join, if diplomatic efforts fail. A new wave of proliferators would surely follow. What used to be primarily a bilateral Soviet-American nuclear arms race during the Cold War already looks like a multilateral competition that might make a real nuclear war more possible. And with China's recent anti-satellite test, we are threatened with a new arms race in outer space.

After Iraq, the United States will not be able to act as the world's policeman. The American public does not want to play that role. To avoid chaos, there must be a workable, multipolar international system based on multilateral rules of the game that are accepted by all major players.

America and Russia have unique responsibilities here. If they revert to confrontation, we cannot expect, say, China or France to lead efforts to create a new world order and control the proliferation of nuclear weapons. Only Americans and Russians can lead the world away from the biggest dangers. To do so effectively, they must begin serious cooperation in three areas:

First, a real effort to reinvent arms control. I'm not suggesting the restoration of old treaties. Both countries should make a commitment to take seriously each other's security concerns and avoid actions that the other side might perceive as a threat. The dispute over anti-missile equipment in Eastern Europe should be resolved through a compromise, not a confrontation.

Even more important are Russian-American initiatives to invite other nuclear countries to demonstrate self-restraint and abstain from the unnecessary buildup of their nuclear arsenals. Joint brainstorming is needed to prevent the collapse of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which is at serious risk.

Second, Russia and the United States must cooperate on bilateral and multilateral efforts to manage regional conflicts. The success of the six-party negotiations on North Korea proves that when the United States gives priority to non-proliferation instead of a regime change, solutions are possible. The same approach should be applied to Iran.

Multilateral efforts must be expanded to prevent the Taliban from restoring its grip on Afghanistan. Russia, China and India can help NATO politically and economically, and even militarily, if Russia can overcome its "Afghanistan syndrome."

If the United States agrees that the way out of the Iraq quagmire requires multilateral arrangements, Russia also can help. And it can share responsibility for implementing the "road map" to an Israeli-Palestinian peace settlement.

Third are the problems of democracy and values. Russia and the United States face serious problems related to terrorist threats. It is premature to claim that either has found the best ways to expand human rights and democratic freedoms. America hardly occupies the high moral ground that would enable it to lecture others. Neither does Russia, which is debating a vague concept of "sovereign democracy," trying to understand how to apply universal standards of human rights and democratic procedures.

DOJ_NMG_0139898

It would be a great blunder to revive the spirit of the ideological crusade that gave us the Cold War. Propagandistic campaigns should belong to history. While there are heated debates on these issues in each country, we need a Russian-American dialogue instead of mutual accusations.

Russia is back as an international player. While it is not a superpower (except in the number of its nuclear weapons) and is still amid a difficult internal transformation, no one should be surprised that Russia wants to protect its national interests. Russia should be treated as a responsible player, sharing the rights and the duties of membership in the community of democratic market economies in a globalized world. That was President Vladimir Putin's message in the speech he gave last month in Munich. And Russia, if necessary, should be criticized for her mistakes, as should America, or China, or other members of the international community. But the goal should be a new cooperation, not a new Cold War.

Sergey Rogov is the director of the Institute of USA and Canada Studies of the Russian Academy of Sciences in Moscow.

American Troops In Kosovo May Lose Their Combat Status (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Top Defense Department officials are considering a proposal to downgrade the combat status of U.S. forces who are part of the NATO peacekeeping mission in Kosovo, a decision that could cause the 1,500 U.S. soldiers currently deployed there to lose hundreds or even thousands of dollars each month in tax benefits and combat pay.

Such a decision, expected within the next month, would indicate that Pentagon officials do not believe Kosovo is still a combat zone, despite rising tensions in the Balkans over Kosovo's ongoing bid for independence and frequent U.S. missions that involve dangerous interdictions of smuggling rings, raids on armed extremist groups and encounters with improvised bombs.

It would also mean that hundreds of National Guardsmen and Reservists -- many from Virginia and Massachusetts who are on lengthy deployments away from their families and careers -- would lose a coveted tax exclusion that allows them to earn their pay tax-free while tacking on hundreds more in combat pay. They would also lose government-funded flights back to the United States when they take leave.

The issue puts a spotlight on soldiers who are part of a U.S. mission that began in 1999 but now receives little attention amid the worsening wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. In recent interviews, soldiers and officers with the Virginia Army National Guard there said they put their lives on the line every day as part of the Kosovo Force, or KFOR -- and believe they deserve the benefits of combat pay.

"I stand to lose a decent chunk of money, and it's hard to believe that if that came through we'd get paid the same amount as someone who gets to go home to their wife and kids every day, gets to have a beer with dinner, and we're away for a year and a half," said Cpl. Will Larsen, 22, of Fairfax.

Larsen, an assistant infantry squad leader, put his senior year at Virginia Tech on hold to deploy. "It's a very important time here, and it's a big deal. The extremist ends on both sides are angry. . . . There are a lot of people back home who don't even know we're here. I just don't want them to forget about us."

Defense officials said all areas designated as combat zones are under a periodic review and that early policy recommendations from the Pentagon are that all areas in the Balkans -- designated as a combat zone under presidential order since March 24, 1999 -- be downgraded because of improved security there. Top military officers in Europe have officially disagreed, but they have been told the change could come as early as April 1.

"Combat Zone Tax Exclusion and Imminent Danger Pay are both under review for all designated areas," Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman, said in an e-mail. "The Department will not comment beyond that until the reviews are complete."

John W. Warner (R-Va.), a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, on Friday sent a letter to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates urging him not to change the status of the more than 500 soldiers from Virginia who are deployed in Kosovo. Warner wrote that he thinks the soldiers "are performing dangerous missions on a daily basis."

DOJ_NMG_0139899

"I respectfully request that you carefully consider the ramifications of any proposals that would adjust the combat zone designation for KFOR," Warner wrote, according to a copy of the letter provided to The Washington Post. "I am sure you agree that our soldiers and their families must receive appropriate compensation for their service."

The soldiers in Kosovo understand their work is not as dangerous as that of U.S. troops in Iraq, but they operate in a region where the government is shaky and where criminal enterprises use violence as a means of intimidation. Strife between Albanians and Serbs in Kosovo has calmed, but military commanders are concerned about the possibility for increased tension as a plan for Kosovo's statehood and separation from Serbia is scheduled to go before the U.N. Security Council next weekend.

[Yesterday, several thousand ethnic Albanians marched through Pristina, Kosovo's capital, and protested the proposed plan, saying it falls short of full independence, the Associated Press reported. No incidents were reported during the march, but last month a similar protest sparked a clash in which two demonstrators were killed by U.N. police.]

Brig. Gen. Douglas Earhart, commander of the 29th Infantry Division and leader of the Kosovo Multinational Task Force East, said that since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, the Kosovo mission has gone from a major military operation to one out of the limelight. But Earhart sees his region as vulnerable to radical Islamists because of high unemployment and porous borders, combined with reports of armed extremist ethic groups forming camps in rural outposts.

"This mission is absolutely critical now," Earhart said. "We stopped ethnic cleansing effectively. We started a peace-enforcement mission. We're doing now what we'd like to be doing in Iraq and Afghanistan."

His soldiers do daily patrols in local communities, seeking to get out in front of potential violence and to help foster tolerance between ethnic groups. Some soldiers have adopted a local school, organized ski trips for Serbian and Albanian youth, and helped fix crumbling infrastructure. They also conduct armed raids on smuggling hideouts and go after masked men who attack drivers at night.

Sgt. James Gerlinger, 22, of Lynchburg, Va., frequently works with children in Kosovo to help them set aside ethnic differences. Previously deployed for a year to the U.S. military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, he was told he was going into a combat zone for his deployment to Kosovo and is relying on the combat pay.

"We don't do this job for the money, and it's always mission first," Gerlinger said, adding that he is concerned about morale in his unit if the combat-tax exclusion is revoked. "I think a lot of times, any other mission than Iraq and Afghanistan is long forgotten. While it may not be as dangerous, the sacrifice here is still the same."

The Enlisted Association of the National Guard has contacted members of Congress because it is concerned that soldiers deployed to Kosovo could suffer financial hardship if they were to lose significant amounts of pay. "The families are counting on this every month to pay their bills," said Frank Yoakum, the group's legislative director. "And it's a morale killer. It says that what they were doing was important yesterday, but today not so much."

Should a status change occur, Staff Sgt. Stanley Britton, 34, of South Boston, Va., would probably lose about $1,000 of his monthly salary -- money he uses to support his wife and two daughters while he is away from his job as a sheriff's deputy in Halifax County. After a 2005 tour in Iraq, he said he enjoys helping the people in Kosovo because they trust U.S. forces and come to them for help. "It's an honor and a great opportunity to be a part of a team and to help people who are in dire need of assistance," Britton said. "And yes, I do think it's a combat zone here."

Again, Kosovar Albanians Demonstrate Against U.N. (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

PRISTINA, Kosovo, March 3 — For the second time in less than a month, thousands of ethnic Albanians took to the streets of this city on Saturday to protest a United Nations proposal for Kosovo's future — a plan that they say falls far short of their desire for an independent state.

Amid shouts of "U.N. out," the crowd, mainly young men, filed peacefully through the city, led by an advocacy group that seems to be emerging as the focal point for ethnic Albanian frustrations in this province, which is still officially part of Serbia.

The group, Vetevendosje, whose name means self-determination, has been gathering growing numbers during the continuing uncertainty over the future of the region.

DOJ_NMG_0139900

According to a proposal announced in January by Martti Ahtisaari, the United Nations chief negotiator for the region, Kosovo would gain de facto nationhood — an army, a constitution and a flag — but still be overseen by the international community to provide protection for the province's ethnic Serbs, who are the minority. Officials in Mr. Ahtisaari's office said he would present his proposal to the United Nations Security Council this month for a vote, but the vote has not been scheduled.

The leaders of the protests on Saturday complain that Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal is merely a ruse to sustain foreign domination and give unacceptable rights to the province's Serbs.

"We are hostages of Serbia," said Glauk Konsjufca, one of Vetevendosje's leaders, addressing supporters gathered around a truck decked with loudspeakers. "We are hostages of just 5 percent of the population."

Local analysts say that Vetevendosje, while not a political party, has given voice to many ethnic Albanians tired of international supervision.

"I am fed up with the way the international community is treating us," said Perparim Rama, a 31-year-old architect who took part in the demonstration. "Initially the United Nations did a great job, but the whole process has been prolonged."

"U.N. employees sit on a different level," Mr. Rama said. "You see that in salary differences. They basically are not in touch with the population. Here, the economy is going down, and United Nations employees are traveling to Greece every weekend for breaks."

Kosovo, although still formally part of Serbia, has been administered by the United Nations since 1999. Serbian security forces, accused of committing widespread atrocities during a conflict with ethnic Albanian guerrillas, were forced to leave the region in June 1999 after a 78-day bombing campaign led by NATO.

Most of Kosovo's ethnic Albanian politicians say they support the United Nations' plan. However, the continued uncertainty surrounding the settlement — Russia has suggested it might not support the proposal once it reaches the United Nations Security Council — has caused growing tensions in Kosovo. Russia is an ally to Serbia, which wants to retain Kosovo.

Last month, United Nations police officers using rubber bullets killed two protesters at an ethnic Albanian demonstration.

Some feared that Saturday's demonstration could turn violent, but protesters and heavily armed ethnic Albanian riot police officers kept their distance from each other.

Traffickers Re-route Drugs Through Central America (LAT)

By Hector Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Central America has become a crucial way station in the billion-dollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies, U.S. and regional sources say.

The recent killings of three Salvadoran legislators in Guatemala underscored the shift, intelligence sources say. The lawmakers were shot and their bodies set ablaze last month, allegedly by a group of Guatemalan policemen working on behalf of Mexican drug traffickers.

Everyone from impoverished fishermen and small-town mayors to legislators and high-ranking police officials has been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico.

Although it remains unclear whether the dead Salvadorans were tied to traffickers, other lawmakers from the country have been linked to the trade. And Guatemalan officials have said the killings point to widespread infiltration of the country's police force by organized crime.

The four police officers charged in the killings, including the head of the country's organized-crime unit, later were slain in their prison cells, in a stunning raid by armed men who might have entered the facility with the aid of guards and prison officials.

An intelligence official working in the region said the slain police officers worked for a Mexican cartel that ships drugs along the Pacific coast of Central America. The officers were enforcers dedicated to "knocking down" rival traffickers, the source said.

DOJ_NMG_0139901

"This is a crime that can best be understood as part of the dynamic that sees drugs flow between Mexico and Colombia," said a second intelligence official, referring to the killing of the legislators. The officials asked not to be named, given the sensitive political nature of the crime -- one of the victims was Eduardo Jose D'Aubuisson, the son of the founder of El Salvador's ruling party.

Although drug trafficking has long been common in remote areas of the region, such as the Caribbean coast of Nicaragua, the growing power of the Mexican cartels has increased the importance of Central America as a transshipment point.

Smuggling routes across the Caribbean have fallen out of fashion thanks to U.S. interdiction efforts there, and Colombian drug producers have ceded the bulk of the transportation business to Mexicans.

About 90 percent of the estimated 780 tons of cocaine entering the United States annually passes through the hands of Mexican drug traffickers, according to U.S. studies. Mexican traffickers see Central America as a natural hub between their Colombian suppliers and the smuggling routes the Mexicans control on the U.S. border.

The "Mexico-Central America corridor is ... the predominant transit route for cocaine destined for the United States," U.S. officials wrote in the 2007 National Drug Threat Assessment.

Michael A. Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said in a recent congressional hearing that, "The corrupting power of illicit drug trafficking organizations on the governmental institutions of Central America significantly increases the difficulty of successful drug interdiction efforts."

Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs "for the foreseeable future," Braun added.

The growing trade has reached areas of Central America where drug trafficking was rare just a few years back. Police and military forces there are often undermanned and outgunned.

Nicaragua's small navy, for example, has only enough boats to patrol its coastline 12 days each month, officials say, a fact that helps shape the traffickers' strategy. "They know what our limitations are," said Capt. Roger Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy.

On the Pacific coast, the Nicaraguan navy has no craft larger than 40-foot-long "go fast" boats with outboard motors, vessels nearly identical to those the drug traffickers use. In fact, many of the craft used by the navy are boats that were discarded by smugglers, Gonzalez Diaz said.

Operatives of Mexico's Sinaloa cartel arrived on the Pacific coast two years ago, according to officials with Nicaragua's National Police.

With their Mexican accents, the men stood out. They were eager to buy old, abandoned farms along the beach. They didn't look like farmers, but they bought several tractors. They collected boats, too, but they didn't look like fishermen.

"The tractors were to build new airstrips and also to rehabilitate old ones," said one Nicaraguan police officer who specializes in drug intelligence.

One of the men was Samuel "Sammy" Gutierrez, a Colombian with Mexican identity documents, police said. He and two brothers from Mazatlan, Jorge and Roberto Garcia Villasenor, were air and sea "transportation specialists," police said.

The cartel operatives soon found themselves in a cat-and-mouse game with police that included a plane crash on a rural highway and the arrest of a Mexican couple at a Managua airport with nearly $300,000 in cash.

"We confiscated three tons of cocaine," said an intelligence official with Nicaragua's national police. "We hit them hard."

Nearly all of the cocaine that enters the United States is produced in Colombia, according to studies by U.S. officials. Most of the cocaine enters the U.S. through a two-stage process in which it is off-loaded and stored at least once in Mexico or Central America.

Cocaine is shipped out of Colombia by sea and air, usually in amounts of a ton or more, through what U.S. officials call "the transit zone" -- the stretch of ocean between Colombia and Mexico. Sometimes the traffickers hopscotch up the coast from Colombia to Panama, Costa Rica and other countries in the "go fast" boats. Or they might take a more circuitous route that involves a larger ship that will travel around the Galapagos Islands in the Pacific southwest of the Colombian coast and later off-load to smaller vessels.

DOJ_NMG_0139902

Once in Mexico, the drug traffickers benefit from well-traveled smuggling routes protected by corrupt state and local officials as their shipments move northward overland to the U.S. border. A war among competing cartels to control those routes, known as "plazas" in Mexico, led to more than 2,000 killings last year.

The various routes through the "transit zone" pass through the beaches of Belize, seaside villages in Honduras and ports along the Pacific coast of Mexico and many other places, according to data from the U.S. Government's Joint Interagency Task Force South, based in Florida.

U.S. officials said that Central American organized-crime groups, working with the Mexican and Colombian cartels under a subcontracting system, are reaping huge profits. That money, in turn, is fueling a crime wave, especially in Guatemala and El Salvador.

In El Salvador, sources pointed to a key killing that went largely unnoticed in the local media: the 2005 shooting death of Jose "El Cranky" Cortes outside a San Salvador nightclub.

According to a Salvadoran academic who has studied the drug trade, Cortes controlled the retail drug trade in an urban region of El Salvador and was assassinated for trying to make connections with Colombian suppliers without the permission of other gang leaders.

It was the first time officials had documented contacts between high-level Salvadoran gang leaders and Colombian traffickers, the source said.

Along the impoverished Pacific coast of El Salvador and Guatemala, mayors and other low-level officials in seaside towns find that the sums of money offered by the traffickers are often too tempting to resist.

"This guy tells you that you can make $60,000 easily, very quietly," said one intelligence official who asked not to be named because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

The same networks that smuggle drugs northward are responsible for shipping several billion dollars in cash southward, usually in $20 bills, according to DEA officials. So vast is the money flow that arrests of couriers carrying $1 million in cash or more have become routine in Central America.

The astronomical sums of money involved in the drug trade have ensnared top officials in El Salvador.

Last year, William Eliu Martinez, a Salvadoran congressman, received a 29-year prison sentence from a U.S. judge after being convicted in Washington, D.C., of smuggling more than 30 tons of cocaine into the United States.

If the privileged can be drawn into the drug trade, then what hope is there that a poorly paid policeman, soldier or sailor can resist the temptation?

Capt. Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy asks himself that question often.

"It's a constant struggle with our personnel," he said. "We tell them, 'Anyone would be tempted if they offered you $500 or $5,000. But for that, you're disgraced. . . . And if you owe them anything, they'll come after you or your wife and kids.'"

Mexico's No. 2 Party Gets A New Leader (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez, Cecilia Sánchez

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Beatriz Paredes aims to steer the PRI toward the left and back to glory.

MEXICO CITY — Former governor and federal lawmaker Beatriz Paredes today assumes leadership of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which in the span of a decade sank from Mexico's greatest political force to third-place finisher in last year's presidential election.

Paredes takes over a party that still holds a majority of local and state offices, but is fractured by competing interest groups and politicians, and broad discontent among its formerly loyal base, Mexico's 50 million poor.

Paredes, 53, said in an interview that she would lead a new, more democratic PRI, the initials the party is known by. She said she wanted to steer the PRI to the left, where presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador of the Democratic Revolution Party mined votes to come within a hair of winning the July election.

"You can't judge the PRI of the past against the PRI of today," she said. "My objective is to build a PRI of the 21st century."

DOJ_NMG_0139903

Her promises of consensus and unity, analysts say, are more pragmatic than ideological: Neither she nor any other Mexican leader has the power to select presidents and governors with the pointing of a finger, once the PRI's prerogative.

The party began crumbling 10 years ago, when the PRI first lost its majority in Congress' lower house. In 2000, the party lost its first presidential election in seven decades to former President Vicente Fox and the National Action Party, or PAN.

But the party still matters. Mexican President Felipe Calderon, who completes his first 100 days in office Saturday, will need cooperation from PRI lawmakers to pass legislative reforms such as creating a new national energy policy before Mexico's oil runs dry, and figuring out how to get people to pay income taxes.

Mexico's Congress is roughly split three ways among the PRI, Calderon's PAN and Lopez Obrador's left-leaning PRD. Calderon and Paredes were both lower-house party leaders during the first half of the Fox administration, and she said she expected a cooperative relationship with him now.

"We've always had a good dialogue," she said.

During Fox's six-year term, the PRI sometimes used its congressional votes to block reform proposals. Other times, Fox lacked the political will or skill to complete them. Paredes focuses on the latter. "Fox never took responsibility for his failures," she said.

The PRI's obstructionist policy in parliament is credited to Roberto Madrazo, who took over as party president in 2002 and essentially spent the next four years running for office. He lost badly in the presidential race.

Madrazo failed largely because voters found him untrustworthy. He also played hardball with rivals, alienating some party leaders who responded with tepid support for his campaign. Madrazo accused one would-be PRI candidate of corruption, a charge that evaporated days after the man dropped out of the party's presidential primary.

"We've learned that a divided PRI is an electoral loser," said Mariano Palacios Alcocer, the outgoing interim party president.

Madrazo defeated Paredes for the PRI leadership in 2002. This time, she won easily with the help of many old-line party leaders in a vote last month.

In the aftermath of PRI's 2006 presidential trouncing, she's seen by many party loyalists as a negotiator skillful enough to steer the PRI to the center-left. They hope her skills will give the party a shot at picking up seats during the 2009 midterm congressional elections and finding a polished contender for the 2012 presidential race.

A party activist since age 20, she studied sociology at Mexico's National Autonomous University. She was governor of Tlaxcala from 1987 to 1992. Paredes served four terms in the lower house and one term in the Senate.

Among the groups she'll have to win over are the party's 17 governors, the most of any party. They hold much greater authority and influence than their U.S. counterparts. She also will have to build support in the party's congressional bloc, which is divided among regional, union and ideological interests. And Mexico's poor are angry about the country's move from an economy of price-controlled staples and government-subsidized enterprises to a more freewheeling, open-market system.

"The party presidency of Beatriz Paredes is not going to be easy," said Alfonso Zarate, a political analyst. "She's going to have to maintain a fragile equilibrium among these distinct political forces, as well as those who helped her win."

Sudan President: No Handover Of Citizens (AP)

By Mohamed Osman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 4, 2007

Sudan's president said again on Saturday that his country would not hand over for trial any citizen sought by international courts for crimes against humanity.

The International Criminal Court at The Hague, Netherlands this week accused a junior Sudanese Cabinet minister and a member of the security forces of war crimes and crimes against humanity for atrocities committed in Darfur, the conflict-ridden region in western Sudan. Sudan has denied the accusations.

"(The) Sudanese judiciary is honest and qualified to try any Sudanese" who commit crimes against humanity, President Omar al-Bashir was quoted as saying by the official SUNA news agency. "The government will not hand over any citizen for trial outside the country."

DOJ_NMG_0139904

In Sudan, "anyone who makes a mistake will be held responsible for it, but we are not going to take any dictates from abroad," the agency quoted al-Bashir as saying.

The ICC prosecutor accused a minister and a member of the security forces of a combined 51 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their actions in Darfur. Sudan's government has rejected the allegations and said it would not hand over the two men for trial.

The Darfur conflict began in February 2003 when ethnic African tribesmen took up arms against what they saw as decades of neglect and discrimination by the Arab government in Khartoum. The government responded with a counterinsurgency campaign.

Arab militias known as the janjaweed committed widespread rape, looting and killing. An International Criminal Court prosecutor said the janjaweed was armed and financed by the Sudanese government, a charge Khartoum has always denied.

More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million people have been displaced in four years of Darfur fighting.

Al-Bashir focused instead on the U.S. occupation of Iraq, saying he wanted people who "committed crimes against the Iraqi people — who are being killed, displaced and their infrastructure destroyed at the hands of the alliance forces ... to be brought before courts of law and find prompt justice."

The Sudanese leader's comments come a day after U.S. envoy to Sudan Andrew Natsios arrived in Khartoum for talks with officials on the Darfur crisis and how to draw into negotiations rebel factions who did not sign a peace deal last year in Abuja, Nigeria.

SUNA described Natsios' meeting Saturday with the No. 2 in the ruling National Congress Party, Nafie Ali Nafie, as reflecting "rapprochement of viewpoints between the two sides" to speed up the political process.

Nastios is expected to visit Darfur, as well as Juba, the southern capital, during his seven-day trip.

Despair In Darfur (WT)

By Bill Frist

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

I have just returned from a medical mission trip to Sudan's Darfur region and I've found the world's effort to stop genocide there has run into serious trouble.

In the last few months, an all-out war has begun against the 13,000 foreign aid workers in Darfur. This has dried up humanitarian assistance flows on which Darfur depends. As many as 400,000 noncombatants have already died in Darfur. These new attacks could easily bring the toll above a million. Based on what I have seen and heard on the ground, I believe it's time for the United States and the rest of the developed world to take serious action and ensure the aid flow continues.

Even before the attacks on aid workers began, Darfur faced a grim situation. Since the conflict began four years ago this month, Sudan's government in Khartoum and its allied Janjaweed militias have massacred Fur, Masalit, and Zaghawa ethnic groups in Darfur. As a senator, I played a role in highlighting the genocide.

Subsequently, the State Department, our president and most nations in the developed world roundly condemned it and sent aid. Time and again (most recently in January) the Sudanese government has promised to stop the killing and Darfur-based rebel groups have sworn to lay down their arms. This has never happened.

But the very presence of international aid operations has made a truly awful disaster a tad less terrible. In every recorded genocide from the Nazi Holocaust to Rwanda, enormous numbers died due to starvation, disease, exposure and lack of sanitation. The risks in Darfur are particularly grave: Because of Darfur's climate, even a brief disruption of water supplies alone can kill children and any who already are sick.

While overall conditions for displaced Darfurians never became comfortable, the international aid flows largely deprived the Khartoum regime of the opportunity to carry out a silent genocide. Mortality and malnutrition rates in camps for displaced people in Darfur declined steadily from the beginning of major aid operations in 2004 until the attacks on aid workers began late last year.

But now, the perpetrators of the genocide appear intent on launching a systematic campaign of violence against humanitarian aid workers. Just last month in Nyala, South Darfur, government police beat five U.N. staffers and raped one of them. Late last year, a single day saw six targeted, violent attacks on humanitarian compounds. Hundreds of aid workers had to flee and more than 130,000 Darfurians went without aid. On another day in December, 30 civilians died when fighters attacked an aid-carrying truck with rocket-propelled grenades.

DOJ_NMG_0139905

The last six months have seen more attacks on aid workers than the previous two years. At least one organization has withdrawn and more may follow. Aid workers I met said they live in fear. Rebel groups fighting the government launch some of the attacks, but all have the same consequence: increased deaths for all Darfur.

New reports pour in all the time and, in the end, attacks on aid workers will only stop when both the government and all rebel forces lay down their arms. Because it provides more than all other nations combined, the United States needs to take a leadership role ending the attacks on aid workers and getting all factions to reach a peaceful, political settlement of their differences.

To move toward such a peace agreement, the United States needs to act resolutely and make Darfur a priority. To begin with, the current African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur needs more people and resources and a crystal-clear mandate to protect civilian aid workers. The Bush administration should lead efforts to provide this force what it needs through increased in-kind and monetary aid coupled with a management review. In particular, the U.S. should help the AU add Rwandan and other African troops to the peacekeeping force.

At the same time, the United States should push for deployment of the stronger, larger United Nations peacekeeping force that the Sudanese government has resisted. Such a force would integrate with that of the AU and might include additional support troops from outside Africa. Finally, the U.S. should work with its allies to establish a controlled no-fly zone over Darfur.

Quite simply, the attacks on aid workers in Darfur have made an already terrible situation even worse. If they do not stop, an already gruesome death toll will grow even higher. The United States needs to help.

Bill Frist, a Nashville surgeon, is former U.S. Senate majority leader from Tennessee. He has traveled to Africa yearly as a medical missionary.

Stricter Law Fails To Diminish The Demand For Child Laborers In India (NYT)

By Amelia Gentleman

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

CALCUTTA, India — Seven days a week, 8-year-old Jasmina K. rises before dawn to fetch water for the household where she works as a maid. She washes, sweeps and hauls until about 11 at night, when she lies down to sleep on the floor by the bathroom door.

Her employers have little patience with her exhaustion.

"I get tired and forget things, so they hit me," she said, her eyes cast down. "They want the shoes polished. If I don't do it fast enough, they hit me with a cooking spoon. They want to go to the toilet. If I don't get the water fast enough, I get a beating."

Jasmina has been a member of India's child labor force for more than a year now. After her father died, she said, her mother sent her and her sister from their West Bengal village to work as maids here. Each month, she is paid 100 rupees, or about $2.25.

India has no outright ban on child labor and had long allowed the employment of children under 14 in all but what are deemed "hazardous" occupations. But last October a stricter law took effect; it prohibits the employment of children under 14 in hotels and restaurants, and as domestic servants.

Five months later, children's rights advocates say, the law has had little effect. Under-age children, mostly girls, are as in demand as ever to be maids and nannies.

"Because of the booming economy and the spread of the nuclear family, we've seen a rise in demand for domestic help at a time when it's becoming more expensive to employ people," said Surina Rajan of the International Labor Organization. "So families are looking for a cheaper option."

Hiring an obedient 8-year-old, fresh from India's rural heartland, is a simple matter. Impoverished villagers willingly turn their children over to middlemen who promise a better life in the cities, children's advocacy groups say.

DOJ_NMG_0139906

"Placement agencies in Delhi and Mumbai are growing like mushrooms," said Manabendra Nath Ray of Save the Children U.K. "It is an extremely lucrative business. This is a slave trade. Parents are, directly or indirectly, selling their children."

The Indian government estimates that 12 million children under 14 are employed; children's advocates say the figure could be closer to 60 million. It is unclear how many of these children work as maids.

Children's rights advocates fault the government for not cracking down hard enough on the recruiters of children and not helping parents to keep their children at home. They have called for more educational and job opportunities in the struggling countryside of West Bengal and the neighboring states of Bihar and Jharkhand, the source of most of the children in domestic service. "We are disappointed," Mr. Ray said.

Officials with the Ministry of Labor and Employment said it would take time before the effects of the law were evident. Shahid Meezan, director of the ministry's child labor division, said that dealing with under-age domestic servants was harder than, say, with under-age factory workers. "You can't just start raiding people's private homes," he said. "You have to tread carefully."

Because the government is moving so slowly to require compliance with the law, advocacy groups have tried to at least encourage employers to treat the children they have illegally hired better. One program, for instance, demands that children be given time off for education.

Save the Children has also set up several antitrafficking committees in West Bengal to disrupt the supply network through grass-roots action, including educating parents about the risks to their children and urging the police to enforce the law.

At the weekly meeting of a committee in Rajbati, a hamlet of mud huts two hours' drive southwest of Calcutta, a dozen teachers, parents and village officials said they were fighting a three-tier system, made up of child recruiters, middlemen and placement agencies in the cities.

Charts on the walls showed how nearby villages had been stripped of children. In Sankda, with 150 families, 70 children had been sent away to work; in Ajgara, home to 300 families, 105 children had left.

The recruiters who comb the villages, they said, are usually women whose extensive personal contacts in the region help them identify vulnerable targets: families with six or more children, single mothers, recently widowed fathers, the permanently unemployed and alcoholics.

They list the advantages of sending a girl into service: the child, they promise, will send back monthly earnings, do a bit of light housework and learn city ways, which will enhance her marriage prospects.

Often the recruiters are met with gratitude, children's advocates say. Despite reports of abuse of children by employers and the failure of agents to send back the children's wages, parents remain susceptible to the agents' main argument that sending the child away to work will guarantee him or her a better life than staying in the village.

Karuna Mondal, a Rajbati resident who sent her teenage daughter, Soma, to Calcutta to work in a lawyer's house, said it had not been a difficult decision. "I thought it would be a good opportunity for her," she said. "She had dropped out of school. What was there for her to do here?" she asked, looking around at the family home, a bare, thatched shack without running water or electricity.

In the end, her daughter returned home with the help of a local charity, because the girl said she had been badly treated.

Even if a child does not send money, the family can be better off, said Asha Iyer of Save the Children. "It's one less mouth to feed," she said.

The recruiter also stands to profit, earning 3,000 to 10,000 rupees, about $65 to $225, per child, as well as a percentage of the child's wages.

"The rate varies depending on the quality of the child," Mr. Ray, of Save the Children, said. "Is she good looking? Does she have some basic education? Can she communicate well? They are treated as commodities. The really nice-looking girls get diverted into prostitution, which means a higher fee for the agent."

Hemlata Mondal, a homemaker who lives near Rajbati and who used to scour villages for candidates, said she got into the business when she realized how lucrative it could be.

"No one has shunned me for the work I did," she said. "I felt I was doing something good for the families."

She stopped work last year after the police, under pressure from the activists, threatened her with arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0139907

So far, the government's focus has been on the employers rather than the suppliers.

"This is typically a middle-class issue," said Sudha Pillai, a senior bureaucrat in the Ministry of Labor and Employment. "It is important to reach out to the newspaper-reading middle classes to make sure that they know that this is not innocuous."

"A lot of euphemisms are used," she said in an interview, adding that girls were sometimes called "playmates" for babies or household helpers. "We have to repeat the message that this is a crime," she said.

Mohammad Ashraf Ali of Right Track, a charity based in Calcutta that combats children's domestic work, said the government was not doing enough to get that message out. He said many employers were still unaware of the law or believed that it did not apply to them.

"Most argue that they are doing something noble by helping feed and clothe poor village children," he said. "But the maids are usually badly dressed and hungry."

Jasmina, the 8-year-old maid, knows nothing of the legislation that has made her job illegal and sees little prospect of respite from her drudgery. Interviewed on a rare free afternoon, granted by her employers under pressure from Right Track, she said she dreamed of another life. "I'd like to be at school," she said with a crooked smile, swinging her spindly legs. "I want to be a teacher."

Our Brit Poodle, Off His Leash (WP)

By Malcolm Rifkind

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

The British have been puzzled about Tony Blair for some time. Americans, particularly the one who lives in the White House, must be beginning to share the same feelings.

Recently the prime minister announced the first major reduction of British troops in Iraq. He chose to do so at precisely the same time that President Bush, his close friend, is trying to convince Congress and the American people of the wisdom of a substantial increase in the U.S. troop commitment to the same country.

Not surprisingly, this has been a gift to Democrats and other critics of the president, and has made a difficult task all the more complicated. What happened to the idea of a friend in need?

The prime minister has, characteristically, tried to minimize the damage. He pointed out that Basra, where the British are based, is quite different than Baghdad. There are no Shiite-Sunni sectarian conflicts, as the region is overwhelmingly Shiite. Al-Qaeda and other international jihadists have made little impact. The bulk of British troops will, in any event, remain at least for another year.

These claims are justified but they conceal as much as they reveal. Basra and the south of Iraq is a serious mess despite the impressive and professional work of British forces over the past three years. The writ of the Iraqi government is weak. The reason there is little sectarian conflict is that most of the Sunni minority have been driven out through ethnic cleansing. The militias in Basra are all-powerful. The two main ones may both be Shiite but they spend most of the time battling each other for power in the region. They have regularly attacked British forces to show their prowess and because of their hostility to the presence of foreign troops. Blair himself told Parliament that British troops would not be leaving Basra in the condition in which they would like.

It is the timing of Blair's announcement of the British withdrawal that is most revealing. He could have delayed it for weeks if his interest had been to help the president. But his own domestic weakness dictated this timetable. As his prime ministership draws to a less-than-illustrious end, he has had to find a way to reassure the British public that his Iraq adventure will indeed end, too. There is now a widespread belief in the United Kingdom that Iraq has been the worst disaster in British foreign policy since 1956, when Britain and France invaded Egypt with Israeli help after Gamal Abdel Nasser nationalized the Suez Canal. British voters of all parties tend to agree that the prime minister must shoulder the blame for insisting on British support for the invasion of Iraq.

But in British eyes, the problem is far wider than the merits of the Iraq war. Much of the criticism that Blair has faced has been for the apparent unconditional support he has given Bush. That is not because of any serious anti-Americanism. The British are, traditionally, among the most pro-American groups in the world. They expect their prime ministers to be close to the U.S. president, and that has rarely been controversial.

DOJ_NMG_0139908

Blair is, however, accused of being different than his predecessors, from both the Labor and Conservative parties, in appearing to support the White House through hell or high water. There is considerable truth in this charge. Winston Churchill often disagreed with Franklin D. Roosevelt over Soviet Union policy. Harold Wilson declined to send British troops to Vietnam despite Lyndon B. Johnson's repeated requests. John Major and Bill Clinton had severe disagreements over Bosnia.

Even Margaret Thatcher, who was close to Ronald Reagan, did not hesitate to say so publicly when she thought that U.S. policy was unwise. This happened when the United States invaded Grenada without informing Queen Elizabeth II, who happens to be Grenada's head of state. It also occurred when the United States put pressure on Britain not to trade with the Soviets over a proposed gas pipeline in the 1980s. Thatcher, politely but firmly, told Reagan that she would decide with whom Britain would trade.

Blair, in contrast, has been viewed as so loyal to the White House that he is regularly lampooned in the media as Bush's poodle. The charge may be unfair, but it has done him severe political damage in his own Labor Party and with the public.

Sir Christopher Meyer, a former British ambassador to Washington, has said that Blair has rarely used his relationship with Bush to press for substantial changes in U.S. policy. This was not just true on Iraq. When the president unexpectedly indicated that the United States was willing to support changes in Israel's frontiers to include some of the settlements on the West Bank, Blair announced his own support for the proposal without any discussion in the House of Commons or with Britain's partners in the European Union.

Bringing some of our troops back home has been one of the few welcome statements that he has been able to make on Iraq since the invasion almost four years ago. If it appeared to be at odds with U.S. policy, that will not have done him any harm. Blair will soon be a figure of the past, as he has promised to step down as prime minister by June at the latest. His successor is almost certain to be Gordon Brown, the chancellor of the Exchequer or finance minister, who has been the second-most-powerful member of the government for the past 10 years.

Brown is well disposed to the United States, but most of his close friends have been in the Federal Reserve Bank, the Finance Department and other economic institutions. Alan Greenspan has been an admirer, as have other important Americans.

Brown has had little involvement or interest in foreign affairs and has made little contribution to these highly charged debates over the past 10 years. That has partly been because he was content to submerge himself in financial and economic policy. However, it reflects the deal he made with Blair when the latter became leader of the Labor Party in 1994. Brown had expected to become leader, but when it became clear that Blair had far more support, Brown offered to stand down if he was recognized as the number two in the land.

The result has made him as powerful in relation to Blair as Vice President Cheney has been to Bush. He has been very quiet on Iraq, in part because foreign policy was not his brief but also because he was highly sensitive to the unpopularity of the government's policy with his Labor colleagues.

If Brown becomes prime minister, he will have no intention of clashing with Bush or of pursuing an anti-American foreign policy. But there is little doubt that he will neither wish, nor be able, to replicate the umbilical link that appears to exist been Bush and Blair.

Brown is considerably brighter than Blair but he does not begin to have Blair's political skills or his ability to win the enthusiasm or affection of those who are not his natural allies. He has little charm, can be abrasive and demands total loyalty. To describe him as a cross between Cheney and Donald H. Rumsfeld might be appropriate, though it would probably offend all three of them.

Brown admires the United States and likes Americans. But his political survival in Britain will require him to have a correct rather than a warm relationship with Bush. Britain, under him, will continue to draw down its forces in Iraq while giving diplomatic support to Washington even if the president continues to fight on. This may not seem logical, but it will meet the political imperative. It will suit both the president and the new prime minister to stand shoulder to shoulder even if the body language is cool and the empathy less obvious than it has been in recent times.

DOJ_NMG_0139909

The same will apply if the opposition Conservative Party, under new leader David Cameron, comes to power in the next general election. It is not due for two to three years. By that time, the United States will have a new president and Iraq will either be improving or have already collapsed into a vicious civil war. Whatever the controversies of the past, both a Brown and a Cameron government would recognize the need to rebuild stability and good governance in Iraq, and would recognize the need for American leadership in that endeavor.

The Conservatives, who originally supported the invasion of Iraq in 2003, have been distancing themselves from Blair since it emerged that there were no weapons of mass destruction, and as Iraq has slid into anarchy. (Some Conservatives, myself included, opposed the war from the beginning.) But the Conservatives, unlike some elements of the Labor Party, have no history of anti-Americanism and will want to work closely with either a Republican or Democratic administration. They already have close links with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and will be wishing to develop them with other presidential candidates. A handshake, however, with the current incumbent of the White House is, I'm afraid, no longer seen as an automatic vote-winner back home.

It would be wrong to ignore the fact that the Iraq war and the unilateral, Manichaean foreign policy of the Bush presidency has had a profound impact on British opinion. I represent Kensington and Chelsea in the House of Commons. They are the two wealthiest districts in the United Kingdom. Most of their residents are high-earners. Overwhelmingly they vote Conservative. By a margin of about 3 to 1, these instinctive pro-Americans have been highly critical of U.S. foreign policy over the past five years.

That mood is far from irreversible. The basic empathy with the United States remains. There is little evidence of British public opinion turning to the European Union as an alternative to the United States in its affections.

Many years ago, Churchill remarked that you can always rely on the United States to do the right thing -- after it has tried every other option. There is much hope, and some evidence, that that is where we may now be heading.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind is a former foreign secretary and a former defense secretary of the United Kingdom. He is member of Parliament for Kensington and Chelsea.

Aid Workers With Guns (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

CAMP LEMONIER, Djibouti

The U.S. has built a little-known military base here that represents one of our best strategies to fight terrorism in the coming years: The aim is to build things rather than blow them up.

This base in Africa, established in 2003, sits at the entrance to the Red Sea in the small Muslim country of Djibouti, next to Somalia. Security is as tight as the sun is hot, with lots of bomb shelters, but the most apparent threats are distinctly, well, African.

"We've got two hyenas out there," said Cmdr. Darryl Centanni of the Navy, executive officer of Camp Lemonier, pointing to a jogging trail on which troops were running through the semidesert. "So the running gets pretty interesting."

He added that a pack of wild dogs also speeds up joggers but that the dogs mostly get food by catching fish in the sea. (I'm not sure I trust military intelligence on that one.)

After 9/11, the focus of America's response to terrorism has been mostly on using military force to destroy possible threats in places like Iraq and intimidate just about everyone. The ethos was borrowed from the ancient Romans: "Oderint, dum metuant" — "Let them hate, so long as they fear."

Yet all in all, that strategy has backfired catastrophically, particularly in Iraq, and turned us into Al Qaeda's best recruiter.

So that's why the softer touch in Centcom's strategy here is so welcome. It aims to help bring stability to northeastern Africa and to address humanitarian needs — knowing that humanitarian involvement will make us safer as well.

"The U.S. started to realize that there's more to counterterrorism than capture-kill kinetics," said Capt. Patrick Myers of the Navy, director of plans and policy here. "Our mission is 95 percent at least civil affairs. ... It's trying to get at the root causes of why people want to take on the U.S."

One humanitarian mission for which the U.S. military is superbly prepared is responding to natural disasters. While the U.S. has spent vast sums broadcasting propaganda to the Muslim world, the two most successful efforts at winning good will both involved the military. One was the dispatch of soldiers to help Indonesia after the 2004 tsunami, and the other was the use of U.S. forces to help Pakistan after the Kashmir earthquake.

DOJ_NMG_0139910

The 1,800 troops here do serve a traditional military purpose, for the base was used to support operations against terrorists in Somalia recently and is available to reach Sudan, Yemen or other hot spots. But the forces here spend much of their time drilling wells or building hospitals; they rushed to respond when a building collapsed in Kenya and when a passenger ferry capsized in Djibouti.

Rear Adm. James Hart, commander of the task force at Camp Lemonier, suggested that if people in nearby countries feel they have opportunities to improve their lives, then "the chance of extremism being welcomed greatly, if not completely, diminishes."

The U.S. announced last month that it would form a new Africa Command, aimed partly at blocking the rise of ungoverned spaces that nurture terrorism. The new command offers tremendous humanitarian potential as well, for in some poor countries the most useful "aid workers" are the ones in camouflage carrying guns.

In the Central African Republic in September I visited a town with a lovely new hospital built as a foreign aid project. But the hospital was an empty shell, gutted by militias rampaging through the area. In places like that, there's no point in building schools or clinics unless you also help with security.

Some of the most successful aid projects in Africa have been the dispatch of armed peacekeepers to Mozambique and British troops to Sierra Leone. In both places, troops brought what the besieged population most desperately needed — order — and laid the groundwork for recovery. We should be far more aggressive about dispatching small numbers of troops to impose a no-fly zone over Darfur or to destroy Sudanese militias that invade Chad and the Central African Republic.

We can also do far more to train armies in Africa. The deal we offer African presidents should be along these lines: You run a country cleanly and tolerate dissent, and we'll help ensure that no brutal rebel force comes out of the jungle to create chaos and overthrow you.

Helping fragile countries with security is just as important as helping them with education and medical care. So let's hope that this new base in Africa is the start of a broad new policy that doesn't aim to make us hated or feared, but respected.

While Australia Burns (NYT)

By Iain McCalman

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

Canberra, Australia

THIS summer, Australia feels like a war zone. Cities and towns across the country are enveloped in a perpetual smoke haze, and the braying of fire sirens is as commonplace as birdsong. Every evening television commentators deliver grim-faced reports from the front lines. Tired farmers look dazedly into the camera. Firemen with soot-smeared clothes and chili-red eyes shake their heads and mumble that they have never known anything like it. As with every modern war report, helicopters make a ubiquitous backdrop. They dip down in front of shrinking reservoirs, then stagger toward the fire front, their water pouches swaying marsupial-like underneath their bellies.

''Why? Why, Kamarrang?" asks a tall, slightly stooped Aboriginal man from western Arnhem Land in the far north of Australia. He is Bardayal Nadjamerrek, an elder of the Mok clan, and he is talking to a grizzled "white fellah" named Peter Cook, an ecological scientist. They are discussing the disappearance of whole groups of animals from the plateau of Mr. Nadjamerrek's youth. He repeats the question, this time looking upward to address the "Old People" — his ever-present ancestors — with whom he habitually discusses such issues.

This scene opens a nearly completed film, "Fire in the Land of Honey," of which I'm a producer. The work of the filmmaker Kim McKenzie, it is one of a trilogy of documentaries about Mr. Nadjamerrek and his native land, which his people call Ankung Djang. Collectively, the films will tell how some 50 years ago the Aboriginal people left this vast plateau, the size of Belgium, drawn by the lure of money, tobacco and other novelties offered by distant buffalo camps, mines, stock stations and missions. Today it is a lost world, emptied of people but filled with rock paintings so intricate, ancient and beautiful they take your breath away. He is among the last people to grow up on the plateau, to know its lore and habitat, and to speak its languages.

DOJ_NMG_0139911

He has returned to Ankung Djang with his wife, Kalkiwarra, because he has a task. It is to show his own grandchildren, as well as Peter Cook and other scientists, how his people used to look after the country long ago. He is also telling Mr. McKenzie, the filmmaker, all that he remembers of the history and culture of this ancient place. They are recording his knowledge because otherwise Ankung Djang will cease to have a history. Mr. Nadjamerrek is over 80 and his memory is getting shaky; names and places are starting to fade like the old trails he traveled as a young man to gather spear-making materials.

But his most urgent quest is to find out why his country is out of kilter. Since his people left half a century ago, fire — a staple tool of Aboriginal life — has turned into an uncontrollable monster, careering across the landscape, devouring the plateau's trees, plants, birds, animals and insects (including Mr. Nadjamerrek's beloved native bees).

In truth, none of us can really answer his question: "Why?" We do know the controlled-fire regimens that Aboriginal people practiced for millenniums to nurture the land must be reinstated. But, like Mr. Nadjamerrek, we also suspect something larger is going on — we fear that Australia's soaring heat, vanishing water and rampant fires are connected to larger global patterns of climate change. Thankfully, we Australians at least have Bardayal Nadjamerrek and the Old People to advise us; the rest of the globe is not so lucky.

Losing Bangladesh, By Degrees (NYT)

By Tahmima Anam

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

Dhaka, Bangladesh

IMAGINE, if you will, a country marooned between a snowy mountain range and a churning sea. The country is small, a thumbprint on a vast continent. It holds the youngest and largest delta in the world. This means the landscape is fickle, the rivers often shifting and swallowing giant swaths of land.

It is cleaved by two of the world's mightiest rivers, the Ganges and the Brahmaputra. They perform vanishing acts and conjuring tricks. One day your house is dry and the chilis are airing in the courtyard. The next it has disappeared altogether. You do not want to rebuild so close to the river, but you do: there is no space; the country is full.

For whatever else it strains to hold, it is the crush of humanity that makes Bangladesh what it is: a calamitous country, a country so full of people that every slight shift in circumstance has dire consequences. The weather does not have to be extreme. It has only to be intemperate, and the country does the rest.

How does such a small place hold so much? You worry that it will burst. But your worry is misplaced. You should worry that it will sink. For as the sea level rises, its waters will flow upward like fingers into a glove, turning the sweet river water into salt. The salt will destroy the crops and kill the fish and raze the forests. At the same time, the Himalayan peaks will melt, and they, too, will flow into the country. The rising sea and the melting mountains will meet on this tiny patch of the world, and the people who strain at its seams will drown with it, or be blown away to distant shores, casualties and refugees by the millions.

Here in the capital, winter is a festive season. The cool weather allows women to wear their heaviest saris and wrap thick twists of gold around their necks. There is little rain, the ground is solid — good for high heels. Buildings across the city are draped with strings of lights. You can buy hot, crunchy jilapis by the roadside; the markets are full of winter vegetables.

One day this winter, I landed at Dhaka airport just before dawn. The fog that had delayed my flight clung to the ground and looked like snow; as it lifted, a milky haze took its place. On the way home I saw groups of men huddled over coal fires by the side of the road. They wore puffy jackets and acrylic sweaters, castoffs from the sweatshops that dot the highways between the airport and the city. When they blew on their hands, I saw clouds whistling out of their mouths. Their heads were wrapped in shawls and towels and mosquito nets. The sun did not make an appearance until noon that day, and even then it was only a heatless, watery orb.

In the evening I went to the other side of town, where my uncles live by the long, pencil-shaped Dhanmondi Lake. I watched from the window as the lake appeared to go still, as though deciding whether it was cold enough to freeze over, and there were tiny dots of fish moving toward the shore, not swimming but belly up, drowned.

DOJ_NMG_0139912

According to the United Nations, the temperatures this winter in some parts of Bangladesh were the coldest in 38 years. The last time it was this cold, Bangladesh was called East Pakistan. Looked at another way, however, the mean temperature was only two degrees below the average for January.

Yet in a country so precariously balanced, two degrees meant the difference between life and death. In the districts of Rajshahi, Nilphamari, Srimangal and Gaibandha, people died of the cold because they had no protection against the weather, no walls between them and the elements — not a long sleeve or a sock. Only two degrees, but instead of enjoying their jilapis and weddings and cauliflower, 134 people died. A mere two-degree rise in the global climate will cause large tracts of the delta to disappear, and two degrees after that, the rivers will be wider than the plains, and two degrees after that, the water will have swallowed Bangladesh.

Two degrees either way for this country is not two degrees: it is catastrophe itself, borne on the waves of our warming world.

Memories Of A Colder Iceland (NYT)

By Kristin Steinsdottir

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

Reykjavik, Iceland

WOULD it be possible to go skiing over the weekend? This was her first thought when she pulled the curtains in the morning. Last weekend had been unusual. It shimmered like a beam of light in her memory and sent warmth into every nerve of her body. White ski slopes, sunshine, laughter and joyful shouting. Wasn't it a bit like being a child again?

Such a weekend wouldn't have been unusual at all 30 years ago, but in the vicinity of Reykjavik, the skiing areas had been shut down one by one during the previous winters, and the little snow that actually fell was always blown away. Now she looked at the snow in the trees, vaguely remembering crawling through an upper-story window a long time ago to watch her father dig his way down to the front door. Or was it perhaps only a lapse of memory? After all, she had been a little girl at that time and in memory everything becomes larger than life.

After a mild and rainy fall in 2006 no one in the city expected snow. The rain had poured from the sky and run down the streets, gathering into large puddles, reminding her of lakes. This past October she felt that the rain was more frequent and heavier than the years before. Some people missed the old windy rain, spoke of "foreign rain," said the rain wasn't behaving as it used to, and that they needed to get an umbrella. Using an umbrella in Iceland is actually just a joke since the wind usually blows from all directions, flips over the umbrella and destroys it. No one uses an umbrella in Iceland except foreigners.

The fall went by and it started getting colder, but it was on and off, as it often is in Iceland. There is an old saying that people never know what to put on when they leave the house. The sun may be shining when you go out, but you return in the rain or even a storm — and vice versa. It is said that this is due to the shifting weather conditions. But weren't the weather conditions shifting even more now? Wasn't there more of everything this winter?

She furrowed her brow, looked over the garden and tried to answer herself: blocked roads, snowstorms and sudden snowfall in the city after many winters with hardly any snow at all ... rainfall above average in the same city ... an unusual surging of rivers all over the country just before Christmas. These days she also felt more often as if the roof of her house might get blown off in passing storms. Rescue teams were constantly being sent out; air travel was interrupted more and more.

People wondered. Were these interruptions the result of stepped-up safety measures? Was the roof just getting older? But what about the temperatures? Although January was cold, the last 10 years in Reykjavik were the warmest on record, at least since records have been kept.

She looked at the glacier through the window. It appeared in full view across the bay in the morning sun and reminded her of an old pyramid. The glacier Snaefellsjokull is supposed to be one of the seven sources of spiritual energy in the world. Many tap into its energy. Once the glacier had an even snow cap on all sides. Now the cap was uneven and here and there rocks were visible through the ice.

The glacier is melting like others of its kind in Iceland. When looking at it she was reminded of another glacier, Vatnajokull, one of the largest in Europe. It would be gone within the next 200 years, it was said.

When she drew the curtains in the evening it had started to rain.

DOJ_NMG_0139913

DOJ_NMG_0139914

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Job Lured Alleged Al-Qaida Trainee To Houston (HC) 3
Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists (LAT) 4
Extend Legal Rights To Guantanamo (WP) 6
The Must-Do List (NYT) 7

Homeland Response:
Bush Tours Tornado-Damaged Areas In South (WP/AP) 9
Bush Consoles Victims Of Tornadoes In The South (NYT) 9
Bush To Americans: 'Help The Folks Down Here' (CNN) 10
Mayor: New Orleans 'Piled It On' For $77 Billion Lawsuit (AP) ... 11
After Dubai Ports World (WP) 11
Naked Came The Passenger (WP) 12
Editorial: Everyone Not As Confident As AG On Supermax (CCDR) 13

War News:
Airstrikes Kill Insurgents, U.S. Says (WP) 14
U.S. Airstrikes Hit Qaeda Post In Iraq (NYT) 14
British Trace Missile In Copter Strike To Iran (WT) 15
Agreement Allows U.S. Presence In Sadr City (KCS/MCT) 16
Iran War Weapons Fuel Iraq Insurgency (AP) 17
Iraq Violence Takes Toll On Aid Groups (LAT) 18
Desperation Helps Out In Baghdad (WP) 20
Walter Reed Changes Planned (WP) 20
Iraq PM Vows Cabinet Shakeup In 2 Weeks (AP) 21
Sunnis Slain Over Talks With Shi'ites (WT/AP) 22
Iraq Terror Group Posts Tape Of Killings (AP) 23
In Baghdad, Sectarian Lines Too Deadly To Cross (NYT) 25
Marriages Between Sects Come Under Siege In Iraq (WP) 27
In Iraq, 'Dating' Happens Online (LAT) 29
Choosing A Sect (NYT) 31
Military Faces Growing Ranks Of Bereaved (AP) 32
A Teenage Soldier's Goodbyes On The Road To Over There (NYT) 34
A Hero Who Didn't Save Himself (WP) 35
Soldier Convicted Of Negligent Homicide In Iraq Shooting (AP). 39
The Warden Of Fallouja (LAT) 39
In Wartime, Who Has The Power? (NYT) 42
Antiwar Caucus Wants To Be Heard Now (NYT) 43
Pakistan Denies U.S. Claim Of Having Authority To Target Militants Inside Pakistan (AP) 44
Returning, Safe, After A Year's Service In Afghanistan (NYT) 45

DOJ:
A New Mystery To Prosecutors: Their Lost Jobs (NYT) 46
JOHN L. SMITH: Patriot Act Lets Politics Trump Professionalism With U.S. Attorney's Firing (LVRJ) 48

Criminal Law:
Doubts Rise As States Hold Sex Offenders After Prison Terms (NYT) 49
Crime's 'Mr. Untouchable' Emerges From Shadows (NYT) 54

Civil Rights:
FBI To Look At Deaths From Jim Crow Era (RNO) 56
Prosecutor Sees Virtue In Failure To Try Emmett Till Case (AP) 57
Editorial: A Welcome Partnership To Right Old Injustices (SACBEE) 57
Primary On Mardi Gras Day Illegal? (MR) 58
Investigations Multiplying In Juvenile Abuse Scandal (NYT) 59
N.Y. Suburb Scraps Election After Suit (AP) 60

Antitrust:
Report: Private Equity Firm Blackstone Considering Chrysler Bid (AP) 61
Feds, State Probe TUSD Tech Mess (AZDS) 61
The Karmazin Way: Build It, Sell It, Run It, Repeat (NYT) 64

Indian Affairs:
Tracking Crime On Tribal Lands (AP) 65

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Judge To Decide Validity Of Case On Marijuana (NYT) 66
ATF Computers Help Police Track Guns (WCFC) 67
Man With A Million Bullets In Home Charged (RPE) 68

Immigration:
Bush In A Quandary Over Border Agents' Case (HC) 68
Prosecutor Stands In Political Storm (SAEN) 70
Inmates Will Replace Wary Migrants In Colorado Fields (NYT).. 72
Americans Selling Personal Identity To Illegal Aliens (WT/AP)... 73
Hope For Amends To Filipino Immigrants (WP) 73
Immigration Reform, Take 2 (WP) 75
Illegal Immigrants -- They're Money (LAT) 76

Tax:
The Untaxed Rich, Found And Then Lost (NYT) 77

Congress-Administration:

Children's Health Care On Agenda (WP) 78
A Boy's Death (WP) 79
Nuclear Warhead Plan Draws Opposition (WP)..... 80
FDA Rules Override Warnings About Drug (WP)..... 81
Public Health Agency Linked To Chemical Industry (LAT)..... 83
Why They Fight (NYT) 85

Other News:

The Return Of Volatility (LAT)..... 86
Romney Wins Conservatives' Straw Poll (WP) 87
Conservatives Pick Romney In Straw Poll (LAT) 87
Not In Race, Gingrich Still Has Right Stuff (WT) 88
Romney Favored Among Conservatives In Straw Poll (AP) 89
G.O.P. Candidates Criticize Slur By Conservative Author (NYT) 90
Coulter Drops F-bomb Onto Political Battlefield (CNN)..... 90
Ann Coulter, You're No Sister Souljah (POL) 91
Giuliani Has No Real Chance With GOP Voters... Or Does He? (WP)..... 92
Romney Values Old Time Religion (NHUL)..... 93
Auditor Kicked Off Campaign (TSSC) 95
Former Wisconsin Governor Campaigns In Iowa (AP) 95
Recalling Civil Rights, Democrats Seek Black Votes (NYT)..... 95
The Bridge From Selma, 42 Years Down The Road (WP)..... 97
Clinton Courts Black Support Amid Obama Surge (NSDY) 98
Hillary's Snipe At Obama Erodes Standing In Polls (WT) 99
Geffen, Clinton Were Often At Odds (LAT) 99
Tripping Over The Inevitable (WP) 102
Bring Back The Politics Of Personal Destruction (NYT)..... 103
Politics Means Sometimes Having To Say You're Sorry (NYT) 104
Obama Headlines Labor Rally (CHIT) 106
Obama: Senate Will Pass Labor Union-backed Measure (AP). 107
Richardson Vows To Outwork Rivals (DMR)..... 107
Neither Clinton, Nor Obama (NYT)..... 108
Kucinich Outlines Plan For Iraq Withdrawal (NHUL) 109
Ex-GOP Candidates Turn Attacks Back On National Panel (BOS) 109
The Power Player (WP) 111
Your Tax Dollars At Work: Buckytubes And RedOwls (WP)..... 116
Bush Shows New Willingness To Reverse Course (WP)..... 117
Chavez's Influence Hovers Over Bush Trip To Latin America (HC)..... 118
Iran President Meets Saudi To Discuss Mideast Issues (NYT). 120
Iran's Ahmadinejad Visits Saudi Amid Regional Crises (AFP) .. 120
Mid-East Vow To Curb Sectarianism (BBC)..... 121
North Korea Inspections Will Put U.S. To The Test Too (LAT) . 122
N. Korea Talks May Lead To New Era (MCT)..... 123
U.S. Urged To Reject Taiwan Missile Sale (AP)..... 124
China Warns Negroponte On Taiwan Arms Sales (AFP)..... 125
China To Increase Its Military Budget (AP)..... 125
China's Quirky Stock Market Finally Matters (WP)..... 126
Shanghai What-If: How A Shock Can Become A Shock Wave (NYT) 128
The Nuclear Threat From China (WP)..... 129
Russian Police Beat Democracy Activists (WP/AP)..... 131
Police And Protesters Clash In St. Petersburg (NYT) 131
A Russian Plea For Collaboration (WP) 132
American Troops In Kosovo May Lose Their Combat Status (WP)..... 134
Again, Kosovar Albanians Demonstrate Against U.N. (NYT).... 135
Traffickers Re-route Drugs Through Central America (LAT)..... 136
Mexico's No. 2 Party Gets A New Leader (LAT) 137
Sudan President: No Handover Of Citizens (AP) 138
Despair In Darfur (WT)..... 139
Stricter Law Fails To Diminish The Demand For Child Laborers In India (NYT)..... 140
Our Brit Poodle, Off His Leash (WP) 141
Aid Workers With Guns (NYT)..... 143
While Australia Burns (NYT)..... 144
Losing Bangladesh, By Degrees (NYT)..... 145
Memories Of A Colder Iceland (NYT)..... 146

DOJ_NMG_0139916

TERRORISM NEWS:

Job Lured Alleged Al-Qaida Trainee To Houston (HC)

By Robert Crowe

Houston Chronicle, March 4, 2007

Daniel Maldonado, the American accused of training with al-Qaida and waging jihad in Somalia, came to Houston two years ago to work for a 24-year-old Web designer linked to Internet sites frequented by terrorism suspects.

That man, Sarfaraz Jamal, a former BMX enthusiast and "Seinfeld" fan from suburban Columbus, Ohio, is emerging as an unlikely yet intriguing figure in the Maldonado saga. And his story helps explain how Maldonado wound up in Houston, where he now awaits trial.

Jamal denies any wrongdoing and the FBI is mum, refusing to say even whether he's under investigation.

But Jamal acknowledges a connection to Maldonado, saying in an e-mail to the Houston Chronicle that he had hired him to do odd jobs on the Houston-based IslamicNetwork.com.

"A small kind of job, answering e-mails, etc." is how he described it.

Jamal said he continued to pay him after Maldonado moved to Egypt.

"I had no idea he was going anywhere but Egypt," said Jamal, who is now living in Jordan so he, his wife and their children can study Islam. "Had I known, I would not have probably risked the whole guilt-by-association thing. ... I would have tried to stop him had I known of his motivation to go there."

Others who knew Jamal in Houston say he wasn't always so interested in Islam.

"According to what I've heard from him, (Jamal) was not a practicing Muslim," said Shaikh Isam Rajab of Masjid Hamza, a mosque in far southwest Houston, who arranged for Jamal to design the Web site for the Arees Institute, an Islamic school. "So he was considering himself a bad person, and then he started practicing. And maybe that's what got to him, and he became so enthusiastic."

Married and convertedMaldonado, 28, accused of training with al-Qaida from September to January and studying bomb-making with a man who produced explosives in Somalia, faces up to life in prison if convicted. He awaits trial here because his last U.S. address was an apartment in a sprawling complex off Beltway 8 in southwest Houston.

Maldonado, the son of Puerto Rican immigrants, grew up in New Hampshire, where he met and later married Tamekia Cunningham. After their marriage, they converted to Islam. In August 2005, they moved to Houston, and Jamal helped them settle in.

Jamal grew up in a family that regularly attended mosque — his parents were from Pakistan — but he took more interest in his Hoffman BMX bike and the Internet before discovering Islam. His passions for computers and religion would soon converge.

While living in his parents' Ohio home in 2001, the teenager started ClearGuidance.com, an online discussion site for young Muslims. According to a profile in The Globe and Mail, a Canadian newspaper, the Web site began with 172 members but its audience quickly grew to thousands, "from the suburbs of Detroit to the suburbs of London."

ClearGuidance made the news after Canadian authorities thwarted a plot to bomb the Toronto Stock Exchange and Canadian Parliament last June, and the newspaper disclosed that some of the suspects had been on the site discussing using weapons and killing infidels.

Jamal, also known as Sas, shut down the site in 2004.

"It was a bit too distracting. I got bored of it," he told the Chronicle. "And it was overrun by people who spent more time on it than I did."

Helped Maldonado relocateInternet relationships played a key role in Jamal's move to Houston from his parents' house in Ohio. He met Fatima Hye, a Clear Lake High School graduate and daughter of a prominent Quran translator on AlMaghrib.com. They married in 2004.

For Hye, now 31, just divorced with three children and deep roots here, moving in with Jamal's parents in Ohio wasn't practical.

She and Jamal established a new Web site, Islamic Network, and ran it from their southwest Houston apartment.

"Even if we are radical, I don't think it's much different from what people see as 'Jesus freaks,'" Hye told the Chronicle by telephone. "We're just really into our religion."

DOJ_NMG_0139917

Jamal also stayed in touch with Maldonado, whom he had met at an Islamic conference, through mutual acquaintances and the Internet. After the Maldonados arrived in Houston in the fall of 2005, Jamal realized he couldn't afford to cover their expenses and pay his own family's bills. Islamic Network does not generate revenue, Hye said, adding that Jamal earns a living through contract computer programming, graphics and Web design.

Because Maldonado had expressed an interest in living in a Muslim country, Jamal and Hye helped the family relocate to Egypt, where Maldonado could still work for Islamic Network via the Internet, Hye said.

But living in Egypt was more difficult than expected. Maldonado didn't speak Arabic, the $270 a month Jamal paid him didn't cover expenses, Internet connectivity was spotty at best and Tamekia was pregnant.

"We just lost touch," said Hye, explaining that she heard the news of Daniel's arrest and Tamekia's death from malaria "when the world did."

Of Tamekia's death, she said, "it just broke my heart because she was my sister."

Mentoring JamalAlso in the fall of 2005, Jamal met Shaikh Rajab, who had recently moved to Houston to work at Masjid Hamza. The tech-savvy Jamal asked him if he would answer questions on Islamic Network.

"He's an amazing person with very weird stuff sometimes, but that's what attracted me," said Rajab. "Some of his ideas, they're really great."

Though he was warned about Jamal, Rajab thought he could be a mentor to the young man.

"Some people came to me and told me, 'Be careful, this guy, uh, he has a past,'" Rajab said. "So I asked him what happened. He said, 'No. No. Nothing. There was just a Web site with some problems, and it was just closed.'"

Rajab added, "Youth can get overzealous. They can do some crazy stuff. But I believe Sas has finally bypassed that stage. He is finally weighing things."

Uncensored dialogueThe FBI warned Congress in September about violent extremism on the Internet, and the possibility of radicalizing a small group of American Muslims.

"These online activities further their indoctrination, create links between extremists located around the world and may serve as a springboard for future terrorist activities," said Donald Van Duyn, deputy assistant director of the FBI's counterterrorism division.

Jamal and Hye say Islamic Network — as ClearGuidance once did — encourages uncensored dialogue about such controversial topics as polygamy, jihad and U.S. foreign policy — " ... which is why I guess 'extremists' will talk more on some of the sites I am a part of versus talking less on sites which censor people," Jamal told the Chronicle by e-mail.

Under the user name Daniel Aljughaifi, Maldonado was a paid message board moderator for Islamic Network. Before his capture in January while fleeing Somalia, he was one of many members to discuss attempts to establish Islamic law in that African nation.

He's now the first American to be charged with joining Islamic extremists in Somalia.

Arab Bank Accused Of Funding Terrorists (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, March 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A three-year investigation into the activities of one of the Middle East's largest and most influential banks is producing extensive evidence of how tens of millions of dollars have flowed from wealthy Saudi Arabians to Palestinian groups that allegedly used some of the money to pay off suicide bombers and their survivors.

The information being turned up by government inquiries and lawyers suing Arab Bank "will give people a better understanding of the way money moves in that part of the world to support Hamas" and other militant groups in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, said Stephen Kroll, a terrorism finance specialist and until recently counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs.

"It's important in focusing the public's attention on the issue of what is and what is not acceptable for banks to be involved in," Kroll said.

The Justice Department is conducting a criminal investigation into the New York branch of Arab Bank, which is based in Jordan, and its financial links to organizations and individuals accused of terrorism, according to three former U.S. counter-terrorism officials.

In 2005, the bank agreed to pay the federal government $24 million in fines for violating U.S. laws aimed at preventing terrorist financing, including failing to report suspicious transactions.

The bank is also being sued in federal court in Brooklyn by Americans and Israelis injured in suicide bombings or other fighting in Israel and the occupied territories, and by the relatives of others who were killed. No trial date has been set, but assuming the cases go to trial, they could establish ground rules for what obligations banks have in handling money bound for militant groups. They could also provide an unusually detailed and public look at the flow of money from Saudi donors to Palestinian groups that the U.S. and Israel list as terrorist.

Lawyers suing Arab Bank accuse the firm of facilitating acts of terrorism by providing accounts and other financial services to Hamas, Islamic Jihad and similar groups. Arab Bank also acted as the administrator of a plan in which suicide bombers and others designated as "martyrs" by the Palestinian Authority and other organizations were compensated for their actions on a sliding scale, based on the extent of their injuries, according to documents filed in the cases. The lawsuits charge that the payments — and thus Arab Bank — provided an incentive for suicide bombings.

Arab Bank officials deny such charges and say they have never knowingly supported acts of terrorism. Bank officials say their agreement to pay the fine in 2005 was not an acknowledgment of any wrongdoing.

Bank officials say they provide an important financial service in the impoverished Palestinian territories and that they were merely acting as intermediaries between banks representing Saudi donors and Palestinian organizations and individuals who were being compensated for suffering at Israeli hands.

They also say that a "martyr" can mean almost any Palestinian killed or injured as part of the struggle with Israel, including innocent victims.

"Arab Bank had reason to believe these were humanitarian payments or social welfare payments, and there was certainly nothing in any of the public information that suggested to the bank at the time that these were in any way [meant] to induce terrorism or reward terrorism," said Robert Chlopak, a Washington-based spokesman for the bank.

Chlopak said the bank had checked out clients and transactions and that it did not process any payments to individuals or organizations that were designated as terrorist.

In one instance in which plaintiffs' lawyers allege that Arab Bank maintained an account for Hamas in Beirut, bank officials said that once they learned of the suspicious account, they froze it and reported it to authorities.

Arab Bank also said that it was primarily transferring funds sent to it from other banks on behalf of legitimate Saudi donors that have not been linked to terrorist activities. To win their case, the plaintiffs' lawyers would have to prove that Arab Bank knew that it was doing business with terrorist individuals or entities.

In 2005, the Treasury Department and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency found that Arab Bank's New York branch had transferred funds between 2001 and 2004 for organizations that were later designated by the U.S. as terrorist groups. The Treasury Department said the bank had "largely complied" with the requirement to stop the transfers after the groups were identified.

But the department said that after the government designated these groups as terrorist, the bank failed to go back and review its accounts to see what dealings it had had with them and report any suspicious activities.

Some of the initial allegations in the lawsuits, most of which were filed in 2004, were based on documents seized by the Israeli military during raids on charities, businesses and other locations in the West Bank and Gaza in 2002. Among the documents were records indicating that Arab Bank provided financial services for Hamas and at least 41 organizations and individuals allegedly related to it or to Islamic Jihad.

Plaintiffs' lawyers Gary Osen and Michael Elsner used those records as a jumping-off point for a wider investigation in which they have gained access to tens of thousands of financial records from Arab Bank.

The records detail financial transactions that began in 2000 with the start of the second Palestinian intifada, or uprising. Saudi government officials created two special fundraising committees to help Palestinians battle Israeli forces and otherwise resist the occupation, according to court documents.

One of them, the Saudi Committee for Aid to the Al Quds Intifada, decreed that the life of anyone who died as a "martyr" in the conflict with Israel was worth 20,000 Saudi riyals, about $5,300 at the time. The committee began wiring that sum into accounts that families were instructed to set up at Arab Bank branches, the lawsuits allege. The average Palestinian salary is about $3,000 a year.

In all, the Saudi Committee made about 200,000 wire transfers for the Palestinian cause, totaling more than $90 million, Shukry Bishara, Arab Bank's chief banking officer, said in a court declaration. Much of that money went to pay for hospitals and social welfare programs, or to compensate people injured or imprisoned — or the families of those killed — in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But the money also included an undetermined amount paid to the families of suicide bombers, and those injured or imprisoned by Israel, according to the lawsuits.

The plaintiffs allege that bank officials knew that those listed as "martyrs" included suicide bombers because it was publicly advertised. They cited a Feb. 10, 2001, edition of the Saudi newspaper Al Jazirah in which the Saudi Committee listed the names of Palestinian martyrs, including those killed in suicide bombings, whose families received payments.

DOJ_NMG_0139919

Several lawmakers and Bush administration officials involved in the investigation of Arab Bank have expressed concerns about its activities.

At one House Finance Committee hearing in May 2005, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said that during his visit to the West Bank city of Ramallah to discuss the issue, the Arab Bank manager for the Palestinian territories told him that he "had not filed a single suspicious activity report in the past two years across all the Arab Bank branches in the West Bank and in Gaza."

"It appears that such controls were indeed sorely lacking at Arab Bank across all of their global operation," Levey said.

Extend Legal Rights To Guantanamo (WP)

By Alberto J. Mora, Thomas R. Pickering

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

For more than 200 years, the courts have served as the ultimate safeguard for our civil liberties. A critical part of this role has been the judicial branch's ability to consider writs of habeas corpus, through which people who have been imprisoned can challenge the decision to hold them in government custody. In this way, habeas corpus has provided an important check on executive power. However, because of a provision of the Military Commissions Act passed last fall, this fundamental role of the courts has been seriously reduced.

Habeas corpus -- the Great Writ -- has been the preeminent safeguard of individual liberty for centuries by providing meaningful judicial review of executive action and ensuring that our government has complied with the Constitution and the laws of the United States. Habeas review has always been most critical in cases of executive detention without charge because it provides prisoners a meaningful opportunity to contest their detention before a neutral decision maker.

In 2004, the Supreme Court held that the protections of habeas corpus extend to detainees at Guantanamo Bay, who may rely on them to challenge the lawfulness of their indefinite detentions. The court noted that at its historical core, "the writ of habeas corpus has served as a means of reviewing the legality of Executive detention, and it is in that context that its protections have been strongest."

But the Military Commissions Act eliminates the federal courts' ability to hear habeas petitions filed by certain noncitizens detained by the United States at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere. Late last month the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld this provision and dismissed the lawsuits filed by many of the Guantanamo detainees.

We fully recognize that our government must have the power to detain suspected foreign terrorists to protect national security. But removing the federal courts' ability to hear habeas corpus claims does not serve that goal. On the contrary, habeas corpus is crucial to ensure that the government's power to detain is exercised wisely, lawfully and consistently with American values. That is why we have joined with the Constitution Project's broad and bipartisan group of judges, former members of Congress, executive branch officials, scholars and others to urge Congress to restore federal court jurisdiction to hear these habeas corpus petitions.

The unconventional nature of the "war on terrorism" makes habeas corpus more, not less, important. Unlike what is found in traditional conflicts, there is no clearly defined enemy, no identifiable battlefield and no foreseeable end to the fighting. The government claims the power to imprison individuals without charge indefinitely, potentially forever. It is essential that there be a meaningful process to ensure that the United States does not mistakenly deprive innocent people of their liberty. Habeas corpus provides that process.

We recognize that the Military Commissions Act still enables the Guantanamo detainees to have hearings before a Combatant Status Review Tribunal, which is charged with determining whether the detainee is in fact an "enemy combatant." But unlike court hearings, the tribunal hearings rely on secret evidence, deny detainees the chance to obtain and present their own evidence, and allow the government to use evidence obtained by coercive interrogation methods. While these tribunals have some utility, they cannot replace the critical role of habeas corpus.

The government has detained some Guantanamo prisoners for more than five years without giving them a meaningful opportunity to be heard. The United States cannot expect other nations to afford its citizens the basic guarantees provided by habeas corpus unless it provides those guarantees to others.

And in our constitutional system of checks and balances, it is unwise for the legislative branch to limit an established and traditional avenue of judicial review.

Americans should be proud of their commitment to the rule of law and not diminish the protections it provides. Our country's detention policy has undermined its reputation around the world and has weakened support for the fight against terrorism. Restoring habeas corpus rights would help repair the damage and demonstrate U.S. commitment to a counterterrorism policy that is tough but that also respects individual rights. Congress should restore the habeas corpus rights that were eliminated by the Military Commissions Act, and President Bush should sign that bill into law.

DOJ_NMG_0139920

Alberto J. Mora was general counsel of the Navy from 2001 to 2006. Thomas R. Pickering was undersecretary of state for political affairs from 1997 to 2000 and U.S. ambassador to the United Nations from 1989 to 1992.

The Must-Do List (NYT)

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

The Bush administration's assault on some of the founding principles of American democracy marches onward despite the Democratic victory in the 2006 elections. The new Democratic majorities in Congress can block the sort of noxious measures that the Republican majority rubber-stamped. But preventing new assaults on civil liberties is not nearly enough.

Five years of presidential overreaching and Congressional collaboration continue to exact a high toll in human lives, America's global reputation and the architecture of democracy. Brutality toward prisoners, and the denial of their human rights, have been institutionalized; unlawful spying on Americans continues; and the courts are being closed to legal challenges of these practices.

It will require forceful steps by this Congress to undo the damage. A few lawmakers are offering bills intended to do just that, but they are only a start. Taking on this task is a moral imperative that will show the world the United States can be tough on terrorism without sacrificing its humanity and the rule of law.

Today we're offering a list — which, sadly, is hardly exhaustive — of things that need to be done to reverse the unwise and lawless policies of President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Many will require a rewrite of the Military Commissions Act of 2006, an atrocious measure pushed through Congress with the help of three Republican senators, Arlen Specter, Lindsey Graham and John McCain; Senator McCain lent his moral authority to improving one part of the bill and thus obscured its many other problems.

.

Our list starts with three fundamental tasks:

Restore Habeas Corpus

One of the new act's most indecent provisions denies anyone Mr. Bush labels an "illegal enemy combatant" the ancient right to challenge his imprisonment in court. The arguments for doing this were specious. Habeas corpus is nothing remotely like a get-out-of-jail-free card for terrorists, as supporters would have you believe. It is a way to sort out those justly detained from those unjustly detained. It will not "clog the courts," as Senator Graham claims. Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the Democratic chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has a worthy bill that would restore habeas corpus. It is essential to bringing integrity to the detention system and reviving the United States' credibility.

Stop Illegal Spying

Mr. Bush's program of intercepting Americans' international calls and e-mail messages without a warrant has not ceased. The agreement announced recently — under which a secret court supposedly gave its blessing to the program — did nothing to restore judicial process or ensure that Americans' rights are preserved. Congress needs to pass a measure, like one proposed by Senator Dianne Feinstein, to force Mr. Bush to obey the law that requires warrants for electronic surveillance.

Ban Torture, Really

The provisions in the Military Commissions Act that Senator McCain trumpeted as a ban on torture are hardly that. It is still largely up to the president to decide what constitutes torture and abuse for the purpose of prosecuting anyone who breaks the rules. This amounts to rewriting the Geneva Conventions and puts every American soldier at far greater risk if captured. It allows the president to decide in secret what kinds of treatment he will permit at the Central Intelligence Agency's prisons. The law absolves American intelligence agents and their bosses of any acts of torture and abuse they have already committed.

.

Many of the tasks facing Congress involve the way the United States takes prisoners, and how it treats them. There are two sets of prisons in the war on terror. The military runs one set in Iraq, Afghanistan and Guantánamo Bay. The other is even more shadowy, run by the C.I.A. at secret places.

Close the C.I.A. Prisons

When the Military Commissions Act passed, Mr. Bush triumphantly announced that he now had the power to keep the secret prisons open. He cast this as a great victory for national security. It was a defeat for America's image around the world. The prisons should be closed.

Account for 'Ghost Prisoners'

The United States has to come clean on all of the "ghost prisoners" it has in the secret camps. Holding prisoners without any accounting violates human rights norms. Human Rights Watch says it has identified nearly 40 men and women who have disappeared into secret American-run prisons.

Ban Extraordinary Rendition

DOJ_NMG_0139921

This is the odious practice of abducting foreign citizens and secretly flying them to countries where everyone knows they will be tortured. It is already illegal to send a prisoner to a country if there is reason to believe he will be tortured. The administration's claim that it got "diplomatic assurances" that prisoners would not be abused is laughable.

A bill by Representative Edward Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, would require the executive branch to list countries known to abuse and torture prisoners. No prisoner could be sent to any of them unless the secretary of state certified that the country's government no longer abused its prisoners or offered a way to verify that a prisoner will not be mistreated. It says "diplomatic assurances" are not sufficient.

.

Congress needs to completely overhaul the military prisons for terrorist suspects, starting with the way prisoners are classified. Shortly after 9/11, Mr. Bush declared all members of Al Qaeda and the Taliban to be "illegal enemy combatants" not entitled to the protections of the Geneva Conventions or American justice. Over time, the designation was applied to anyone the administration chose, including some United States citizens and the entire detainee population of Gitmo.

To address this mess, the government must:

Tighten the Definition of Combatant

"Illegal enemy combatant" is assigned a dangerously broad definition in the Military Commissions Act. It allows Mr. Bush — or for that matter anyone he chooses to designate to do the job — to apply this label to virtually any foreigner anywhere, including those living legally in the United States.

Screen Prisoners Fairly and Effectively

When the administration began taking prisoners in Afghanistan, it did not much bother to screen them. Hundreds of innocent men were sent to Gitmo, where far too many remain to this day. The vast majority will never even be brought before tribunals and still face indefinite detention without charges.

Under legal pressure, Mr. Bush created "combatant status review tribunals," but they are a mockery of any civilized legal proceeding. They take place thousands of miles from the point of capture, and often years later. Evidence obtained by coercion and torture is permitted. The inmates do not get to challenge this evidence. They usually do not see it.

The Bush administration uses the hoary "fog of war" dodge to justify the failure to screen prisoners, saying it is not practical to do that on the battlefield. That's nonsense. It did not happen in Afghanistan, and often in Iraq, because Mr. Bush decided just to ship the prisoners off to Gitmo.

.

Prisoners designated as illegal combatants are subject to trial rules out of the Red Queen's playbook. The administration refuses to allow lawyers access to 14 terrorism suspects transferred in September from C.I.A. prisons to Guantánamo. It says that if they had a lawyer, they might say that they were tortured or abused at the C.I.A. prisons, and anything that happened at those prisons is secret.

At first, Mr. Bush provided no system of trial at the Guantánamo camp. Then he invented his own military tribunals, which were rightly overturned by the Supreme Court. Congress then passed the Military Commissions Act, which did not fix the problem. Some tasks now for Congress:

Ban Tainted Evidence

The Military Commissions Act and the regulations drawn up by the Pentagon to put it into action, are far too permissive on evidence obtained through physical abuse or coercion. This evidence is unreliable. The method of obtaining it is an affront.

Ban Secret Evidence

Under the Pentagon's new rules for military tribunals, judges are allowed to keep evidence secret from a prisoner's lawyer if the government persuades the judge it is classified. The information that may be withheld can include interrogation methods, which would make it hard, if not impossible, to prove torture or abuse.

Better Define 'Classified' Evidence

The military commission rules define this sort of secret evidence as "any information or material that has been determined by the United States government pursuant to statute, executive order or regulation to require protection against unauthorized disclosure for reasons of national security." This is too broad, even if a president can be trusted to exercise the power fairly and carefully. Mr. Bush has shown he cannot be trusted to do that.

Respect the Right to Counsel

Soon after 9/11, the Bush administration allowed the government to listen to conversations and intercept mail between some prisoners and their lawyers. This had the effect of suspending their right to effective legal representation. Since then, the administration has been unceasingly hostile to any lawyers who defend detainees. The right to legal counsel does not exist to coddle serial terrorists or snarl legal proceedings. It exists to protect innocent people from illegal imprisonment.

.

DOJ_NMG_0139922

Beyond all these huge tasks, Congress should halt the federal government's race to classify documents to avoid public scrutiny — 15.6 million in 2005, nearly double the 2001 number. It should also reverse the grievous harm this administration has done to the Freedom of Information Act by encouraging agencies to reject requests for documents whenever possible. Congress should curtail F.B.I. spying on nonviolent antiwar groups and revisit parts of the Patriot Act that allow this practice.

The United States should apologize to a Canadian citizen and a German citizen, both innocent, who were kidnapped and tortured by American agents.

Oh yes, and it is time to close the Guantánamo camp. It is a despicable symbol of the abuses committed by this administration (with Congress's complicity) in the name of fighting terrorism.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Tours Tornado-Damaged Areas In South (WP/AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

ENTERPRISE, Ala., March 3 -- President Bush handed out hugs Saturday to people in the South who survived killer tornadoes, and he mourned those who died in the storms, including eight high school students.

"Out of this rubble will emerge a better tomorrow," Bush said.

Bush climbed over piles of concrete, roofing, insulation, broken glass and textbooks at shattered Enterprise High School. Be strong and set an example for the other 1,200 students, he told the student government president and three others.

The president walked alone down a hallway lined by blue lockers, the corridor where the eight students succumbed and scores more were trapped in Thursday's storm. He also saw the school wing, now just rubble, where students had hunkered down -- and survived -- as the tornado approached.

"Today I have walked through devastation that is hard to describe," he said, standing with students, one of whom had a tear running down her face. "A hundred kids got out of here alive, which is a miracle."

During the visit, Bush designated Coffee County as a disaster area, releasing federal dollars for recovery and individual assistance. His disaster relief chief came along for a firsthand look at the damage so he could make quick recommendations to the White House on requests for help from Washington.

The trip, quickly put together Friday, was intended to highlight the Bush administration's stepped-up efforts, through the Federal Emergency Management Agency in particular, to help disaster victims. The White House came under withering criticism for its sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

In southeastern Alabama, a tornado injured 50 people and damaged or destroyed about 370 homes among the 22,000 residents.

Bush also toured Americus, Ga., about 120 miles south of Atlanta, where storms killed two people and destroyed dozens of homes and businesses.

Before visiting the Alabama school, he got a bird's-eye view of the scene as his Marine One helicopter followed the storm's extensive path. The town's white water tower -- with the words "Enterprise, City of Progress" -- still stood. But nearby, the high school looked like a wrecking ball had struck it.

R. David Paulison, the head of FEMA, said he was on the telephone with state emergency officials hours after the storms hit. Agency teams have nearly completed preliminary damage assessments in Alabama and planned to begin similar work in Georgia on Saturday.

He said FEMA moved in truckloads of water, ice, tarps, plastic sheeting and communications equipment to help states take care of residents -- a response he called "the new FEMA."

Bush Consoles Victims Of Tornadoes In The South (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

AMERICUS, Ga., March 3 — President Bush picked his way through the rubble of the tornado-stricken South on Saturday, promising federal aid for some Alabamians and turning up unexpectedly in a largely African-American neighborhood here in Georgia, where startled residents rushed out of their damaged houses, cell phone cameras in hand, to greet him.

The hastily arranged trip, following a massive storm system that produced at least 31 tornadoes from Minnesota to the Gulf of Mexico, was intended to send an image of a compassionate president leading a competent government response, in sharp contrast with the lingering images of federal indifference and ineptitude after Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0139923

The president's day began in Enterprise, Ala., where eight students were killed as a tornado on Thursday ripped apart Enterprise High School. Mr. Bush, accompanied by Mayor Kenneth Boswell and several student leaders, made his way through a destroyed wing of the school, stopping in the hallway, where raining chunks of metal and concrete cost the students their lives.

"Out of this rubble will emerge a better tomorrow," the president said afterward, his hands resting gently on the shoulders of the 17-year-old student government president, Megan Parks. He called the scene one of "devastation that's hard to believe," adding, "The biggest effect of the storm is the shattered lives."

Ms. Parks, clearly shaken, bit her lip and wiped away tears as Mr. Bush spoke. She had left school 30 minutes before the storm hit, stopping along the way to pick up her little brother from elementary school to take him home. Saturday was her first time back.

"It's so hard to see our school like this," she said.

The president declared Coffee County, which encompasses Enterprise, a federal disaster area. The designation allows affected households to receive up to $28,200 in aid, according to R. David Paulison, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, who accompanied Mr. Bush on the trip.

Mr. Paulison said he had worked through the night preparing paperwork for the disaster declaration, which Mr. Bush approved aboard Air Force One on Saturday morning. White House officials said a similar declaration for Georgia was being considered.

After the Enterprise visit, Mr. Bush took an hour-long helicopter ride to hard-hit Americus, south of Atlanta, where his published schedule listed only a briefing here by local officials in the parking lot of a damaged hospital. Instead, the president's motorcade drove straight to a modest neighborhood of faded clapboard homes, stopping at a duplex where two people had died seeking shelter from the storm.

As Mr. Bush made his way from house to house to shake hands, giddy residents thrust their cell phones at him, imploring him to stop for pictures and, in some cases, to talk to boyfriends or girlfriends on the other end of the line. Laughing, he obliged.

It was a striking post-Katrina image for a president whose standing among black voters — never very high to begin with — fell even lower after the hurricane.

"He's lifting spirits in a very difficult situation," said Senator Johnny Isakson, Republican of Georgia, who accompanied Mr. Bush.

One person whose spirits appeared lifted was Felicia Stafford, who said the tornado had blown the roof off her house and ruined its wood floors. "He's very nice, loving and warm," she said after meeting Mr. Bush. "He's got very soft hands."

Bush To Americans: 'Help The Folks Down Here' (CNN)

CNN.com, March 3, 2007

AMERICUS, Georgia (CNN) -- President Bush assured tornado victims Saturday that help is on the way as he toured towns in Alabama and Georgia that were among the hardest hit by Thursday's storms.

Bush called the devastation "hard to describe" as he visited with officials in Americus, Georgia, where the storms had claimed two lives and shut down Sumter Regional Hospital as doctors cared for victims.

Sumter is one of six Georgia counties that Gov. Sonny Perdue has declared in a state of emergency.

Earlier Saturday, Bush was in Enterprise, Alabama -- where nine people, including eight students in a high school, were killed. He told Gov. Bob Riley and Mayor Kenneth Boswell that Coffee County had been declared "a major disaster area." That designation means extra federal dollars for recovery.

"You can never heal a heart, but you can provide comfort knowing that the federal government will provide help for those whose houses were destroyed or automobiles were destroyed," the president said.

Bush also implored Americans to help out any way they can.

"Some people are going to need your help," he said. "I would ask you out of the generosity of your heart to help the folks down here."

Speaking to reporters on Air Force One en route to Alabama, Federal Emergency Management Agency Director David Paulison said Bush's visit was indicative of "the new FEMA."

Before Paulison's tenure, the agency drew fierce criticism for its handling of the Hurricane Katrina aftermath. Paulison told reporters that in the past FEMA didn't intervene in disaster recovery until the state and local community became overwhelmed.

That system doesn't work, Paulison said. After Thursday's storms, FEMA immediately sent 14 teams armed with food, water, ice, tarps, plastic sheeting and communications equipment.

"We have to go in as partners, so that's what we're going to be doing," Paulison told reporters.

In all, Thursday's storms killed 20 people: 10 in Alabama, nine in Georgia and a 7-year-old girl in Missouri.

DOJ_NMG_0139924

Bush attended a morning briefing at the Enterprise Municipal Airport before embarking on a tour of the town's storm damage and later meeting with families.

Bush's visit to Enterprise came on the heels of a tour by Riley, who declared a state of emergency for the area and ordered the National Guard to send troops, medics and roving security patrols to the southern portion of the state.

The president visited Enterprise High School, where eight 16- and 17-year-olds were killed while seeking shelter in the school auditorium.

Thinking the Thursday tornado warnings constituted a standard drill, students were joking around in the auditorium as they waited out the storm. That is, until the school went black and glass from a skylight crashed to the ground.

"Everyone got really quiet -- we knew it was serious. No more than five seconds later, it was just like a big explosion and everything -- debris started hitting us," said Mitchell Mock, who was injured during the tornado.

Students were huddled in the building's interior, away from all windows, but no place was safe when the school took a direct hit from a tornado shortly after 1 p.m. The school's roof partially collapsed, trapping students in an avalanche of rubble.

"I had a wall fall on top of me, and the roof fell on top of us," student Brent Smith said.

"There was just hundreds of kids coming down the hallway, and a lot of them were covered with blood," said Kim Lewis, Mitchell's mother.

Dylan Lewis was trapped under rubble after the twister passed. When he emerged, "there were no more people -- it was just cement and air-conditioning parts," he said.

His collarbone was broken, but Dylan and his brothers helped rescue others before going to the emergency room themselves.

Four juniors, two sophomores and two seniors were killed. The Enterprise School Board identified the dead as Michael J. Bowen, 16; Peter James Dunn II, 16; Andrew Joel Jackson, 16; Ryan Andrew Mohler, 17; Kathryn Madora Strunk, 16; Michael D. Tompkins, 17; Jamie Ann Vidensek, 17; and Alice Michelle Wilson, 16.

Officials said the storms killed at least two others in Alabama, one of them in Enterprise and one in Wilcox County.

After delivering havoc to south Alabama, the storms moved into Georgia where nine people were killed -- six in Baker County, two in Americus and one in Taylor County -- spokesman Buzz Weiss of the Georgia Emergency Management Agency said.

In Americus, a tornado slammed into the Sumter Regional Hospital, shutting it down as health workers were treating victims coming in from the storm, Weiss said.

The patients, none of whom was killed, were transferred to other hospitals, Weiss said.

The twister also destroyed the local headquarters of the Red Cross, its generators and three of its disaster trailers, an official said.

Mayor: New Orleans 'Piled It On' For $77 Billion Lawsuit (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Louisiana (AP) -- Only $1 billion of the $77 billion the city is seeking from the Army Corps of Engineers is for infrastructure damages it says it suffered because of levee breaches during Hurricane Katrina. The rest is for such things as the city's tarnished image and tourist industry losses.

The city "looked at everything and just kind of piled it on," Mayor Ray Nagin said.

"We got some advice from some attorneys to be aggressive with the number, and we'll see what happens," he said.

New Orleans has joined big business and thousands of homeowners in filing claims seeking compensation from the corps for damages sustained when the levees broke during the 2005 storm, flooding 80 percent of the city.

The claims allege poor design and negligence by the corps led to the failure of flood walls and levees.

The city attorney's office also considered such things as "decreases in the city's image, tourist industry activity and potential business industry, losses in the tax base and generated revenue, and a decrease in the city's overall population," in making the assessment, according to a statement from City Hall.

A spokeswoman for the mayor could not explain how the city quantified losses not tied to infrastructure. A 43-page form filed with the corps, reserving the city's right to sue for $77 billion, also provides little insight. It does not quantify "loss of tax revenue," for example, and supporting documents for city-owned properties, such as a police crime lab and libraries, omit any estimates of property values or flood-related damages, The Times-Picayune newspaper reported Saturday.

After Dubai Ports World (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Investing in the United States should be easier.

DOJ_NMG_0139925

KEEPING AMERICA a magnet for foreign investment should be an obvious national priority. Flows of foreign cash provide the U.S. economy with valuable capital and access to innovation, and they help mitigate the country's large trade deficit. U.S. policymakers aggressively hawk the benefits of a liberal investment climate to other countries.

But since the hysteria of a year ago over Dubai Ports World proposing to manage some U.S. seaports, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), the federal panel responsible for ensuring that national security interests are not harmed by foreign acquisition of U.S. assets, seems to have slid in the opposite direction. A recent study by David Marchick, a former Clinton State Department official, concluded that the CFIUS approval process has become overly difficult and increasingly uncertain, making it riskier for non-Americans to invest in the country.

In 2006, Mr. Marchick found, voluntary filings of paperwork with the committee were up dramatically, indicating that foreign investors are increasingly worried about possible CFIUS scrutiny. The committee opted to conduct many more time-consuming second-stage investigations of proposed transactions than in years past, leading to more investors withdrawing during the approval process. And the Financial Times reported last week that CFIUS is threatening to impose enormous penalties on companies that violate even minor points in agreements brokered by the panel. These are bad signs.

Enter the House of Representatives, which unanimously passed a bill Wednesday designed to revamp the CFIUS approval process. By making the committee's procedures explicit in statute, the bill would usefully allow foreign investors to plan with some assurance. Especially given its provenance in the Dubai Ports World controversy, the bill, introduced by Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.) and shepherded through the House by Finance Committee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.), represents sensible middle ground.

Now the action moves to the Senate, which last year passed a needlessly and harmfully stringent reform bill sponsored by Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.). This year we hope that the Senate emulates the House in finding a better balance between security and economic freedom. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), the new chairman of the Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee, has said that he will introduce CFIUS legislation. He should do so soon; Americans cannot let their fears continue to scare off valuable investment.

Naked Came The Passenger (WP)

By William Saletan

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Psssst. Want to see Susan Hallowell naked? Look at the Feb. 24 New York Times. She's on page A10.

Hallowell runs the Transportation Security Administration's research lab. Four years ago, she volunteered to be scanned by a backscatter X-ray machine, which sees through clothing. She was wearing a skirt and a blazer. But in the picture, she's as good as naked.

Last week, TSA began using backscatters to screen airline passengers for weapons. The first machine is up and running in Phoenix. The next ones will be in New York and Los Angeles. The machines have been modified with a "privacy algorithm" to clean up what they show. But even the more cartoon-like images they now display tell you more than you need to know about the people seated next to you.

Are you up for this? Are you ready to get naked for your country?

This is no joke. The government needs to look under your clothes. Ceramic knives, plastic guns and liquid explosives have made metal detectors obsolete. Carry-on bags are X-rayed, so the safest place to hide a weapon is on your body. Puffer machines can detect explosives, but only if you're sloppy. Backscatters are different. They can scan your whole surface, locating and identifying anything of unusual density -- not just metals, which have high atomic numbers, but drugs and explosives, which have low ones.

Why isn't this technology in lots of airports already? One reason is fear of radiation. That's a needless worry. You get less radiation from a scan than from sitting on a plane for two minutes. If that's too much for you, don't fly.

The main stumbling block has been privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union and the Electronic Privacy Information Center have fought backscatters, calling them a "virtual strip search." But the purpose of a strip search is the search. Stripping is just a means. Virtual inspections achieve the same end by other means. They don't extend the practice of strip-searching. They abolish it.

When American Science and Engineering, which makes the backscatter machines, introduced the technology in prisons nine years ago, the point was to replace strip searches. "The scan requires no physical contact between the operator and the subject, thus vastly reducing the threat of assault against law enforcement personnel and the spread of communicable diseases," the company argued. The rationale, like the machine, conveyed not an ounce of human warmth. The inmates preferred to be seen rather than touched. Better to be depersonalized than degraded.

DOJ_NMG_0139926

Because of terrorism, the rest of us now face the same choice. Under TSA policy, if you set off an airport metal detector or are chosen for secondary screening, you're subject to a pat-down inspection that "may include sensitive areas of the body," such as your chest and thighs. Unless, that is, you're lucky enough to be in Phoenix, where you can choose a backscatter instead.

The impersonality of machines can also filter out racism. Five years ago, the ACLU objected to body scans because they were administered selectively, "based on profiles that are racially discriminatory." But the best way to remove selection bias would be to scan everyone. In Phoenix, the TSA has put the backscatter monitors in a room 50 feet from the security checkpoint, so the officers who staff them can't see you. All they can see are X-ray images, which capture density, not pigment.

The key to reconciling airport security with privacy is that the officer who sees you on the monitor never sees you in the flesh -- never sees your face, never knows who you are. In Phoenix, the TSA hasn't just put the monitors in a separate room. It's laying cables to put them in an entirely different terminal. Likewise, the officer who sees you in the flesh never sees you on the monitor. It's like the blind men and the elephant: Nobody has the whole picture.

That brings us back to Susan Hallowell. The Times did not name the naked woman in its Feb. 24 photo. It did, however, mention that the machines were made by ASE. On the company's Web site, I found a news release complaining that pictures circulating in the media were obsolete, because they had been taken in 2003. Then I ran across a 2004 article that said Hallowell had demonstrated the technology the previous year. I typed her name into a search engine, and up came a 2003 wire story with a photo of her, fully clothed, next to a monitor showing her essentially naked except for a bomb and gun she had hidden under outfit. It is the same image that appeared in the Times.

Hallowell volunteered for this publicity. But this sort of easy identification is exactly what must not happen to others. In the age of body scans, privacy means keeping your name, your face and your nude image apart. That job doesn't end at the security gate; it begins there. Will your scan leak? "Images will not be printed, stored or transmitted," TSA swears on its Web site. Directly above that assurance, the agency has posted four nude pictures -- "actual images shown to the Transportation Security Officer during the backscatter process." And you thought airport screeners had no sense of humor.

Enough with the fairy tales. We lost our innocence when the planes hit the twin towers. Now we're losing our modesty. If we're going to be ogled, at least protect us from being Googled.

Editorial: Everyone Not As Confident As AG On Supermax (CCDR)

Canon City Daily Record, March 4, 2007

When federal and state bigwigs toured Florence's Supermax prison Feb. 22, officials came away with different views on the safety of the facility.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was assertive as he said the United States Penitentiary Administrative Maximum Security prison, which houses many high-profile terrorists, was being well guarded and mail was being properly monitored.

"I am confident we are doing what we should be doing, monitoring communications in and out of the facility," he said.

Not everyone is brimming with Gonzales' confidence. And how much weight that opinion carries should be questioned after just one visit by the Attorney General.

John Gage, President of the American Federation of Government Employees also toured the Florence prison and as expected feels more should be done. Gage represents 600,000 federal union workers across the country, including Bureau of Prisons employees.

"There have been cuts in correctional officers," Gage said. "There have been cuts in service. The number of assaults on guards are up. We want something done about this."

Supermax has 208 employees, short of the 240 it had when the prison opened in 1994. Nationwide, the Bureau of Prisons has pledged to reduce its 35,000-strong workforce by 3,118 correction officers. That's cause for concern for not only the Florence prison but other high-profile correction facilities across the United States.

In the absence of more guards, technology is being touted as a sufficient replacement. Bureau Director Harley Lappin said the addition of a number of cameras around the complex have created a safer environment.

But Gage and some others aren't buying that argument.

"The thing that really irritates me about this technology argument is they have cameras, but they're not manned," he said. "This is not replacement technology for a professional correctional officer."

While Gonzales' tour may not have answered concerns by critics, it certainly has brought more attention to the prison. Officials should continue to monitor security concerns as an obligation to the men and women who work at the prison and the surrounding communities.

An approach that includes continual monitoring of security conditions makes more sense than waiting for a tragic incident to occur, especially one that could have been prevented.

WAR NEWS:

Airstrikes Kill Insurgents, U.S. Says (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

First of Two Assaults Hits Area Where Helicopters Were Downed

BAGHDAD, March 3 -- Several al-Qaeda in Iraq insurgents who had targeted U.S. helicopters were killed in an airstrike north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said Saturday. A second strike killed members of another al-Qaeda cell that has orchestrated car bombings.

Meanwhile, three U.S. soldiers on patrol in central Baghdad were killed by a roadside bomb, the military said.

The first air assault, near Taji, north of Baghdad, destroyed trucks mounted with antiaircraft guns in an area where several American helicopters have been shot down in recent weeks.

"Coalition forces believe key terrorists were killed during the airstrike," the military said in a statement. "Results are still being assessed at this time."

Sunni insurgents say they have downed at least six U.S. helicopters since Jan. 20. After several helicopters crashed in the first weeks of this year, U.S. officials ordered a reevaluation of how troops are moved around in an increasingly hostile war zone. Helicopters are being used more frequently in Iraq because sophisticated roadside bombs have made ground travel more dangerous.

The second airstrike destroyed a car bomb factory in southern Baghdad, killing seven people inside, the U.S. military said, adding that "this cell is responsible for a large and devastating number" of attacks in the capital.

In Ramadi, 60 miles west of Baghdad, a car bomb apparently targeting an Iraqi police checkpoint exploded about noon near Anbar University. At least 12 people were killed, including two police officers, and 15 were injured, police said.

In Yusufiyah, about 15 miles south of Baghdad, gunmen killed six male members of a Sunni family after raiding their home. The attack apparently was in response to the family's efforts to reconcile with local Shiites, news services reported.

A senior adviser to Iraq's defense minister was kidnapped in western Baghdad, according to Iraqi television reports.

Meanwhile, a roadside bomb targeting the top police commander in Salahuddin province, Brig. Hamad al-Jubury, killed two of his bodyguards, police said.

U.S. Airstrikes Hit Qaeda Post In Iraq (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 3 — The United States military said Saturday that an airstrike north of Baghdad had killed several insurgents with Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia who were using heavy artillery and machine guns to fire at American helicopters.

The strike occurred Friday west of Taji, where several American helicopters were shot down in recent weeks, and the American assault destroyed at least two pickup trucks with mounted machine guns, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman in Baghdad.

He said the strike did not appear to eliminate the threat to American aircraft because other weapons had been used against helicopters in Falluja and other parts of the country.

“We have seen other systems,” he said. “When the other helicopters were shot down, it wasn’t always heavy machine guns that did that. Part of the assessment we’re doing now is trying to figure out where in the network these weapons fit in.”

Military authorities on Saturday night were still investigating the identities of the gunmen and how many men were killed. An American military statement said, “Coalition forces believe key terrorists were killed during the airstrike.”

The attack was the latest effort to eliminate an emerging threat to American troops. At least eight American helicopters have crashed or been shot down since January.

Military officials have said that Sunni insurgents might be especially motivated to shoot down helicopters as a way of discrediting the new American and Iraqi security plan and undermining military transportation.

Helicopters have also become ever more important over the past few years as ground convoys became increasingly vulnerable. Army helicopters logged 240,000 hours in 2005, 334,000 hours in 2006, and are projected to log 400,000 hours in 2007, the military said.

And in a sign of what officials have described as an increased use of offensive air power in Iraq, a second airstrike destroyed a car bomb factory on Saturday in southern Baghdad, the United States military said.

DOJ_NMG_0139928

Two precision-guided bombs destroyed a building and killed at least seven people suspected of being insurgents who had been firing at American troops in the area, an American military statement said.

Colonel Garver said that the announcement of two airstrikes on the same day did not necessarily mean that more bombs were being dropped, but that it did reflect a broadened presence of American air power over Iraq, with more jets in the air flying closer to American troops on the ground.

"The role has expanded to include other missions that we maybe have not used it for in the past, such as a show of force," he said.

Three American soldiers died Saturday after a roadside bomb exploded beside their vehicle in central Baghdad, the military said in a statement.

Witnesses in the Sunni Adhamiya section of Baghdad said that two roadside bombs hit an American convoy around 2:30 p.m. The first explosion burned the lead Humvee, and when the convoy tried to escape from the area, a second blast tore through another Humvee, rolling it onto its side as it slid into a small shack on the side of the road.

American reinforcements arrived about 15 minutes later to secure the area and search nearby homes alongside Iraqi Army soldiers. Residents said at least 15 people were detained, and that one resident might have been shot during the searches.

The military also said that an Iraqi detainee died Friday at an American-run prison from "injuries sustained after being assaulted from other detainees."

The detainee's death is under investigation, according to a military statement.

In Yusifiya, gunmen killed six Sunni men, including four brothers, at a family gathering, the local authorities said.

Wire services reported that insurgents had sent death threats to members of the family after they had met local Shiite leaders to pursue reconciliation.

But an official of the local security forces said that the killing appeared to have been motivated by an intratribal dispute over property. The attackers approached the family on foot and fled immediately after shooting.

Four separate roadside bombings against Baghdad police patrols killed at least one officer and wounded at least eight others, an Interior Ministry official said.

In the contested neighborhood of Ghazaliya in western Baghdad, a commander of a Baghdad police brigade was also shot and killed in what appeared to be an assassination, the official said.

In Ramadi, a suicide bomber killed at least 12 people, including a child and 5 policemen, when he blew up his car at an Iraqi police checkpoint near Anbar University, the Iraqi police said. At least 22 others were wounded.

Police officials in Saladin Province reported that a roadside bomb aimed at the province's top commander, Maj. Gen. Hamad al-Jubori, killed two of his guards. General Jubori survived.

British Trace Missile In Copter Strike To Iran (WT)

By Sean Rayment

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

LONDON -- A missile that brought down a Royal Air Force Lynx helicopter and killed five British service members was smuggled into Iraq by Iranian agents, an official inquiry into the attack will reveal.

The Sunday Telegraph has learned that a British Army Board of Inquiry (BOI) into the events surrounding the May attack will state that the weapon, a shoulder-launched surface-to-air missile known as an SA14 Strella, came from Iran.

The attack, which was responsible for the death of Flight Lt. Sarah Mulvihill, the first British servicewoman to be killed on active service since World War II, appears to provide further evidence of Iran's direct involvement in the deaths of British troops serving in Iraq.

A Defense Ministry spokesman declined to comment on the inquiry.

"The board of inquiry process has not yet been concluded. It would be wrong to speculate about the cause of the crash until this process has finished," a ministry spokesman said.

It is understood that the inquiry, which has assessed evidence from military engineers and scientists, will conclude that the aircraft was shot down with an Iranian SA14 missile. The inquiry, which is conducted by senior air force and army officers, will deliver its finding to defense chiefs next month.

The report also will reveal whether the helicopter's self-defense systems were working properly and whether they provided adequate protection from a missile fired from relatively short range.

Traditionally, the role of a military board of inquiry, which can examine everything from the loss of a piece of equipment to the deaths of servicemen, is not to attribute "blame" for a particular incident. Instead, senior officers make recommendations to prevent another similar incident.

DOJ_NMG_0139929

The Foreign Office is expected to use the findings to step up diplomatic pressure on the Iranian government, which has been asked to crack down on units within its defense and security services believed to be supplying weapons and bomb-making technology to insurgents in Iraq.

Dozens of British soldiers have been killed in Iraq by improvised explosive devices in the form of roadside bombs, thought to have either been manufactured in Iran or by insurgents trained by the Iranians.

Hundreds of thousands of Strellas were produced by the Soviet Union in the 1970s and were used to equip armies throughout the Warsaw Pact, Central Asia and the Middle East, including Syria and Iran. The same weapon system is also thought to have been responsible for bringing down several U.S. helicopters in Iraq.

Although the weapon is cheap to produce and easy to assemble, operators need some skill to use it effectively, suggesting that the missile was fired either by an Iranian agent or by someone who had been trained by a skilled soldier.

The attack also claimed the life of the most senior British officer to have been killed in the three-year conflict, Wing Cmdr. John Coxen, 46, who was about to take over command of the British helicopter fleet in southern Iraq.

The other three men killed were the pilot, Lt. Cmdr. Darren Chapman, 40; his co-pilot, Capt. David Dobson, 27; and the door gunner, Marine Paul Collins, 21.

The Lynx Mark 7 was traveling low over central Basra on a sortie to familiarize Cmdr. Coxen with the dangers his pilots might face. Although it was believed at first that the helicopter had been brought down by a "lucky hit" from a rocket-propelled grenade, British troops found discarded missile parts in a nearby building after the incident.

Agreement Allows U.S. Presence In Sadr City (KCS/MCT)

The Kansas City Star/McClatchy, March 4, 2007

The U.S. military has reached an agreement with representatives of the Shiite community in Baghdad's Sadr City enclave that will allow American forces to maintain a permanent presence in the militia stronghold for the first time since 2004, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saturday.

Under the agreement, the U.S. will open one of the joint security stations that are a prominent feature of the new Baghdad security plan, living alongside Iraqi forces in a police station just inside the impoverished neighborhood, said Rahim al-Daraji, one of Sadr City's two mayors.

But there is still some uncertainty about the degree to which U.S. forces at the combat outpost will be welcome to move freely around the neighborhood, the scene of two fierce battles in 2004 between the U.S. and the Mahdi Army militia headed by anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Al-Daraji said the deal means U.S. forces will man checkpoints, conduct raids and mount patrols in conjunction with Iraqi forces throughout Sadr City, just as they are doing elsewhere in Baghdad. It is expected they will move into the station by mid-March, said al-Daraji, an independent politician who has been negotiating with U.S. officials on ways to secure the entry of American forces into the neighborhood since late January.

"All movements and political tendencies are ready to welcome the multinational forces into Sadr City in order to make the security plan succeed," he said. "There will be multinational forces at every checkpoint alongside Iraqi forces."

However, Naim Kaabi, a Sadrist official and one of Baghdad's deputy mayors, said only a small number of U.S. troops would be based at the police station and they would not be permitted to move around Sadr City on a regular basis, only to act as emergency backup for Iraqi security forces.

"The Iraqi security forces are welcomed here, and there is no need to have any American forces," he said. "Americans will not get involved unless there is an emergency. They will not do operations, and this is part of the agreement."

Maj. Steven Lamb, a military spokesman in Baghdad, declined to discuss details of the upcoming deployment and said there are still some specifics to be worked out. The intention is to treat Sadr City just like any other Baghdad neighborhood, he said.

"Things are looking very favorable," he said. "I can say that the Sadr City people are very welcoming to us at this time."

He wouldn't say how many soldiers will eventually move into Sadr City, but according to a U.S. military statement, troops are preparing for a "significantly increased presence" in the 6-square-mile district of 2 million people.

The 2nd Brigade Combat Team of the 82nd Airborne Division, newly arrived in Baghdad, is expected to deploy at the joint security station, one of dozens of smaller military outposts being established across Baghdad in an effort to bring U.S. forces into closer contact with local communities.

The brigade is the first of five extra units due to be deployed as part of President Bush's troop escalation in support of the Baghdad security plan, the central plank in his revised Iraq strategy and the biggest effort yet to bring the capital under control.

Since the plan formally went into effect Feb. 14, U.S. troops have significantly intensified their presence on the streets, and U.S. officials have expressed cautious optimism as the level of violence appears to be falling.

DOJ_NMG_0139930

There were no reported bombings against Iraqi targets in Baghdad on Saturday, an unusually quiet day, but three U.S. soldiers were killed when a roadside bomb struck their convoy in Baghdad, the military said.

Though car bombings blamed on Sunni insurgents have continued, the sectarian killings for which Shiite militias were held largely responsible have dropped, suggesting the Mahdi Army is complying with orders from its leaders to stay off the streets.

Al-Sadr has also dropped out of sight and is reportedly in Iran. A week ago, a representative read a statement on al-Sadr's behalf to his followers in Sadr City in which he criticized U.S. involvement in the security plan but also said Iraqi security forces should be supported in their efforts to pacify the city.

The statement was widely interpreted as a gesture of support for the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, though it left uncertain the question of how the Mahdi Army will respond if U.S. troops extend their reach deep into Sadr City.

If American forces do deploy in the streets of the slum, the Mahdi Army will not confront them, predicted Sadr City's other mayor, Hassan Karim, an al-Sadr supporter. He said he has not been informed of the agreement and does not want to see U.S. forces based at the police station.

"But of course there will be no resistance," he said. "American forces are already everywhere on the ground in Iraq, and we do not welcome them anywhere."

Iran War Weapons Fuel Iraq Insurgency (AP)

By Lauren Frayer, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 4, 2007

Mud roads crisscross green hills between palm groves. Snowcapped mountains rise in the distance across the Iranian border. Donkeys stroll along footpaths, carrying the region's harvest — land mines.

Risking their lives, Iraqi shepherds are increasingly venturing into these deadly fields to dig up mines planted during the Iran-Iraq war two decades ago, according to U.S. soldiers, who say insurgents then use the mines to fashion roadside bombs that kill American troops.

With Iraq's economy still struggling, shepherds need the money. And the insurgents are looking for more sources of weapons and explosives as the war enters its fifth year.

"They're going out there and farming them," said Capt. Jesse Stewart of Seattle, Wash., who runs a training school for Iraqi border guards at this border station 90 miles northeast of Baghdad. "Shepherds are digging them up and selling them on the black market."

Old Iran-Iraq war era land mines were used in about 15 percent of the roadside bombs that exploded or were detected in northern Iraq during January, according to Navy Lt. Sarah Wilson, an explosives officer based in Tikrit.

Many of them were believed to have come from this border area.

"All of that unexploded ordnance, minefields and shrapnel — it's still out there," said Lt. Col. Ron Ward, 49, who helps train Iraqi guards.

The vast majority of harvested mines reach their insurgent buyers undetected.

In November, U.S. troops confiscated 53 anti-tank mines and a rocket strapped to the backs of six donkeys found wandering on a footpath outside Khanaqin, about five miles from Iran.

The mines were older Soviet and Italian models of the same type Saddam Hussein's army used along this border during the Iran-Iraq war, the U.S. military said.

And there's plenty more where that came from.

The International Campaign to Ban Landmines estimates that Saddam ordered between 12 and 16 million mines planted along the border with Iran during the war. A U.N. project cleared less than 10,000 mines between 1998 and 2002 before work was halted.

Attention has been focused on the porous, 900-mile border because U.S. military officials allege that Iranian weapons, including advanced roadside bombs, are being smuggled to Shiite extremists here. Iran has denied the allegation, but U.S. officials insist they have compelling evidence that components for "explosively formed projectiles" were manufactured in Iran.

American officials say the EPFs account for a relatively small percentage of the roadside bombs used in Iraq but have still killed more than 170 U.S. and coalition soldiers since mid-2004.

Despite the recent spotlight on Iran, U.S. officials say the majority of weapons used by Sunni and Shiite extremists have been in this country for years and were looted from Iraqi military arsenals after the fall of Saddam in April 2003.

About 30 percent of the insurgent weapons found here in Diyala province date back to the Iran-Iraq war, said Maj. Suzanne MacDonald, an intelligence officer with the 1st Cavalry Division's 3rd Brigade.

They include not only mines planted along the Iranian border but also weapons caches buried by the Iraqi military decades ago in a labyrinth of clay dunes and stone outcroppings, said MacDonald, 38, from Georgetown, Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0139931

"Terrorists go and collect those weapons — land mines and mortars — that are left from the Iran-Iraq war," said Gen. Nazim Shareef Muhamed, a former Kurdish guerrilla fighter who heads the Iraqi Department of Border Enforcement in Khanaqin.

It is easier for locals, who have farmed this difficult terrain for generations, to find the buried weaponry, said Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon, commander of U.S. forces in northern Iraq.

They "don't need night vision technology" to locate it, Mixon said. The Iraqis then presumably remove the detonators before transporting the mines for sale to insurgents.

Those recycled weapons have been used against U.S. and Iraqi forces across a wide area of eastern Iraq.

"In Balad Ruz, we got hit by 18 anti-tank mines that I'm 100 percent sure came from right here," Stewart said, referring to a town about 60 miles to the south.

The Red Cross said in 2001 that an average of 30 Iraqis per month were injured by land mines and unexploded ordnance in this region. But surveys have been impossible since then and many injuries are believed to go unreported. An Iraqi border guard lost his leg last year in an explosion from a land mine here.

U.S. officers believe economics is responsible for an increase in the harvesting of old mines and weapons — although they did not know how much an anti-tank or anti-personnel mine can fetch on the black market.

And with Iraq's economy faltering and unemployment in some areas as high as 60 percent, Iraqis who have no direct role in the insurgency are turning to small-scale arms deals for their livelihood.

"If you're working either for the bad guys or just to feed your family, you've just found a couple dollars that might take care of your family for the week if you sell it," said Wilson, the Navy lieutenant in Tikrit.

Human Rights Watch estimates than nearly 150,000 Iraqi families — or about 900,000 people — live in communities near mine fields. The area is mostly Kurdish but has substantial numbers of Arabs.

"Most folks here don't think there will be success in the Iraqi government," MacDonald said. "The less optimism they have for the future, the more they think of themselves and their clan or hometown."

Anti-tank mines are the safest to collect because they are not as sensitive as anti-personnel mines and are less likely to explode during harvesting, said Wilson, from Moon Township, Pa.

And, she added, "They're the easiest thing for the enemy to use against us, because they're already manufactured. It's simple: Drop and go."

Iraq Violence Takes Toll On Aid Groups (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

There are fewer than 10 organizations active in the country, but the number may fall after the killing of a worker.

BAGHDAD — First it was the curfew. Then the checkpoints and the car bombs. Later, it was the Iraqis' fear of being seen entering a compound occupied by foreigners.

Eventually, for the U.S. nonprofit organization training Iraqi healthcare workers, the risks outweighed the returns. Iraqis couldn't come to them. Americans couldn't go to the Iraqis.

So to avoid working in Baghdad, RTI International moved classes to Jordan and Egypt, flying trainees back and forth.

RTI trained hundreds of Iraqis, who in turn trained thousands more when they returned to Iraq. But the hurdles they encountered along the way are typical of the challenges facing the handful of international aid and development organizations still working in Iraq.

Most groups pulled out after the 2003 bombing of the United Nations headquarters in Baghdad. Fewer than 10 remain, a minuscule number given the level of need, say those in the aid community.

And there are concerns that the number could shrink further after the killing in January of an American woman working for the National Democratic Institute, a Washington-based group that since 2003 has been helping Iraqis build their new government.

The attack was a stark reminder of the perils of aid work in Iraq, be it building sewer systems, teaching fair polling practices or tending to people displaced by sectarian violence.

At least 82 foreign and Iraqi staffers of the U.N. and nonprofit organizations, known as NGOs, have been killed since the war began in March 2003, according to the umbrella group NGO Coordination Committee in Iraq. Scores of workers have been abducted.

For aid groups, which step in when governments cannot or will not care for their people, the decision to leave can be agonizing, particularly when the crisis is growing as clearly as it is in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0139932

After a decade of sanctions, a foreign invasion and now a civil war, Iraq is in need of everything from road repairs to security — just drive along Baghdad's gray and battered streets, past the concrete blast barriers, the sagging, bullet-pocked buildings and intersections guarded by gunmen.

Tens of thousands of people have been driven from their homes in the sectarian "cleansing" that followed the February 2006 bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, a revered Shiite shrine. The population shifts have disrupted schools and medical facilities, overwhelming them in areas suddenly flooded with newcomers.

People's fear of simply stepping outside has made it difficult for many to shop for food, send their children to school or visit doctors, which over time can lead to increased malnutrition, illiteracy and illness.

"If I look at how many NGOs are at work in Iraq, and I look at the violence and the threats of violence to the average Iraqis, all I can tell you is the need is huge," said David Holdridge of Mercy Corps, an international organization with headquarters in the U.S. and Britain that has remained in Iraq.

A group's decision to pull out usually comes after the death or abduction of an employee. Even then, aid workers wrestle with their consciences.

The New York-based International Rescue Committee left Iraq at the end of 2004 because of security concerns after an employee was kidnapped. George Biddle, the IRC's senior vice president, said it left in part also because the humanitarian crisis anticipated early in the war had not materialized by 2004. The assistance needed then was large-scale reconstruction, which the group does not provide.

The humanitarian needs have soared since then, but so have the security risks. Choosing to stay away is difficult, Biddle said, "but if NGOs don't feel they can go about their business, they spend all their time and resources focusing on security."

Security is such a major concern among organizations still in Iraq that most refuse even to acknowledge their presence.

Nearly all are U.S.-based groups, and, like the National Democratic Institute, they depend on U.S. government money to fund their projects. Because of that, even those that admit to being in Iraq refuse to say where their projects or their employees are based.

Holdridge says Mercy Corps has been able to work in Iraq by never launching projects without first winning the support of local tribal and religious leaders.

However, this can require altering programs to suit the leaders, many of them Shiite Muslim clerics who have objected to, among other things, women leading computer courses. "The message was clear: Don't cross the boundaries," Holdridge said.

An aid worker involved in the RTI project, who declined to be identified for security reasons, said the problems the North Carolina-based nonprofit group encountered grew after the Samarra mosque bombing.

A government-imposed curfew in Baghdad after the blast made it difficult for trainees to get to their sessions on time. As violence increased, Iraqis needed to leave for home earlier to get off the streets before dark.

The growing number of car bombs and militia checkpoints scared many of them off the road altogether, as did the risk of entering the compound where the training was taking place, said the aid worker. It became virtually impossible for trainees coming from outside Baghdad to reach the city safely.

"It became harder and harder to recruit people as the situation deteriorated," the aid worker said.

RTI says the 20-month program, which ended in December, nevertheless was a success and showed that by adjusting methods to suit the environment, aid organizations could continue their work. More than 4,600 Iraqis, from doctors to social workers, have been trained, most of them by other Iraqis who were taught by RTI.

But organizations such as the National Democratic Institute, which work closely with political groups and leaders, cannot necessarily achieve their goals from a distance.

Their ability to help Iraqis build democratic government institutions depends on regular face-to-face contact, even if that means visiting dangerous areas where the arrival of heavily guarded foreigners cannot be missed. The NDI workers were attacked after one such meeting.

A Western aid official working with another U.S. group, which has programs similar to NDI's but fears going public because of security issues, says the organization rarely has direct contact with Iraqis anymore.

Non-Iraqi staffers only leave their compound to visit the fortified Green Zone, where U.S. and Iraqi government and military headquarters are based. Even those trips are rare. Visiting staffers outside Baghdad is impossible, as is visiting programs to gauge their effectiveness.

None of this bodes well for success in Iraq, say aid workers, who emphasize the need for their organizations to form partnerships with Iraqi communities they are trying to assist.

That means being on the ground with them, having regular contact and, in essence, being "embedded in a community," said Sam Worthington, the president of InterAction, an alliance of U.S.-based aid organizations. "Without that being present, it makes it very difficult for reconstruction, let alone the building of a society."

DOJ_NMG_0139933

Desperation Helps Out In Baghdad (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

The Bush administration is tossing babies off the Iraq sled as the wolves of disintegration creep closer. Desperation runs through the flurry of initiatives that the White House and State Department have breathlessly wheeled out to deal with Iraq's war in recent weeks.

And so it should. Desperation is the right conclusion to reach, and to communicate, to an Iraq that totters on the edge of extinction as a nation-state. Desperation is Iraq's ground truth, a ground truth the administration has long sought to deny and evade.

The sense that even President Bush will be eyeing the exit if Iraq's chaos worsens has spurred Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take serious steps -- at long last -- to encourage Iraqis to look for compromise rather than endlessly pursue revenge against each other and to persuade Washington to give Iraq more room to deal with its neighbors in its own right.

The sobering effect that these steps are having may turn out to be more important than the immediate practical outcomes of the overlapping and in places contradictory initiatives that the administration has recently unveiled. These include Bush's military "surge," a regional political "realignment" and an international conference in Baghdad. Individually, none of these measures does much beyond buying time while the administration stalls critics and moves to define success in Iraq downward.

"The administration has been so focused on perception that it has frequently missed the point" of Iraq's complex realities, says Qubad Talabani, Washington representative of the Kurdistan Regional Government. "If how it looks in Washington becomes more important than how it works out in Baghdad, we all lose."

That is a caution that applies to war critics who insist on unrealistic benchmarks or deadlines as well as to war supporters who insist on Bush's freedom of action. Both tend to overestimate U.S. ability to manage withdrawal -- or escalation -- on its own terms, relegating Iraqis and others in the region to the status of bit players in an American political drama.

The addition of 17,500 troops into Baghdad that Bush announced Jan. 10 smacked initially of being another gimmick, of resembling an exit-covering escalation, as in an old Western where the gunslinger backs out the saloon door with guns blazing.

But the impression of impending crisis has either prompted or helped Maliki to develop a political initiative of his own to accompany the surge -- and has encouraged U.S. officials to give him more room to maneuver. Bypassing the dysfunctional " national unity" cabinet that U.S. officials helped force on him nearly a year ago, the prime minister has created four committees to work directly with Gen. David Petraeus in implementing the new Baghdad security plan.

"General Petraeus seems to agree that the prime minister's Baghdad security plan should not be seen as a crackdown but as a political effort that has important security aspects," Ahmed Chalabi, who heads the committee charged with building public support for the new effort, told me by telephone from Baghdad last week.

Maliki has turned to the energetic but controversial Chalabi -- once supported by key figures in the Bush administration and then dumped by the White House, allegedly because of his ties to Iran -- to work on the task of reconciliation between Shiites and Sunnis at the neighborhood level. "People are fed up with the violence" and may be ready to overcome old differences, says Chalabi, who seems to have noticeably softened his harsh judgments of the limited place ex-Baathists should occupy in Iraqi society.

Another sign of change: Washington settled last week for effective federalism in Iraq rather than clinging to unrealistic hopes for centralization of state power. U.S. officials prodded Maliki's cabinet into accepting a new petroleum law allowing the Kurdish regional government to let contracts for exploration and production in the north while promising Sunnis a fair share of all oil revenue.

Iraq-centered realism may also be at work on the diplomatic track. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's newly declared willingness to go to Baghdad to meet with Iranian, Syrian and other regional officials -- if a preparatory ambassadorial meeting to be held there Saturday makes progress -- rewards persistent efforts by Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari to host an international conference in the Iraqi capital. This looks like a more promising option than Rice's previously announced effort to exploit a diplomatic "realignment" that in effect would have pitted Sunnis against Shiites throughout the region.

These shifts amount to straws in a hurricane that still has to run its course. But in the Middle East, as elsewhere, desperation is frequently the mother of all progress.

Walter Reed Changes Planned (WP)

By Josh White, Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Nonmedical General To Be Named as Deputy Commander

DOJ_NMG_0139934

Army officials plan to revise the command structure at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, installing a nonmedical general officer as deputy commander to ensure that administrative operations run smoothly, in the wake of reports of serious problems with outpatient care at the facility, officials said yesterday.

A one-star general -- who has not yet been identified -- will work with Maj. Gen. Eric B. Schoomaker, a physician who was named on Friday to head Walter Reed, according to two defense officials. The new deputy will be a general who will bring a nonmedical eye to the operation to "make it run like it's supposed to run," said one Army official familiar with the decision.

Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, has also directed that an infantry officer -- one who recently served in Iraq -- assume the leadership of a new unit at Walter Reed called the "Wounded Warrior Transition Brigade," whose specific aim is to take care of outpatients. The brigade will address problems such as those identified in a series of Washington Post reports about substandard conditions and bureaucratic tangles that affected the care of injured soldiers who had returned from Iraq and Afghanistan.

"The changes will allow commanders to provide direct organizational leadership without any other distraction," said Brig. Gen. Anthony A. Cucolo III, the Army's top spokesman.

Since the problems at Walter Reed were made public, the Army has begun refurbishing Building 18, an off-campus facility where dozens of outpatients stay, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman was relieved as Walter Reed commander, and Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey resigned under pressure from Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

Congressional hearings on Walter Reed are scheduled to begin tomorrow. Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, the Army's surgeon general, is expected to face tough questioning about the facility. Kiley commanded Walter Reed until 2004, when he became the Army's top doctor.

Also yesterday, the Army released a statement indicating Weightman acted upon a warning last year from a subordinate about a shortage of workers at Walter Reed and resolved the critical issues that were raised. Col. Peter Garibaldi, the Walter Reed garrison commander, issued a statement through the Army to follow up on an internal memorandum he wrote in September.

In that memo, released publicly Friday by the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, Garibaldi warned that "patient care services are at risk of mission failure" because of staff shortages brought on by the privatization of the hospital's support workforce.

Garibaldi said yesterday that Weightman "evaluated the situation and recognized its importance. Consequently, all of three critical issues I highlighted were resolved."

On Friday, Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), who heads the panel's national security subcommittee, cited Garibaldi's memo as raising "a new dimension to the problems at Walter Reed."

Tierney said Friday that he intends to ask Army officials at tomorrow's hearing, about the memo and the reasons that the workforce was privatized.

Iraq PM Vows Cabinet Shakeup In 2 Weeks (AP)

By Robert H. Reid And Qassim Abdul-Zahra, Associated Press Writers

AP, March 4, 2007

Iraq's prime minister said Saturday he will reshuffle his Cabinet within two weeks and pursue criminal charges against political figures linked to extremists as a sign of his government's resolve to restore stability during the U.S.-led security crackdown in Baghdad.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki also told The Associated Press during an interview at his Green Zone office that Iraq will work hard to ensure the success of a regional security conference.

The conference in Baghdad, tentatively set for next weekend, is expected to bring together all of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, as well as the United States and Britain to find ways to ease this country's security crisis.

Iran has not announced whether it will attend, but Iraqi officials believe that Tehran will send a representative.

Al-Maliki has been under pressure from the U.S. to bring order into his factious government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds since it took office last May. Rumors of Cabinet changes have surfaced before, only to disappear because of pressure from coalition members seeking to keep power.

Nevertheless, al-Maliki said there would be a Cabinet reshuffle "either this week or next."

After the changes are announced, al-Maliki said he would undertake a "change in the ministerial structure," presumably consolidating and streamlining the 39-member Cabinet.

The prime minister did not say how many Cabinet members would be replaced. But some officials said about nine would lose their jobs, including all six Cabinet members loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an al-Maliki ally.

DOJ_NMG_0139935

Al-Sadr also controls 30 of the 275 parliament seats, and his support for al-Maliki has been responsible for the government's reluctance to crack down on the cleric's Mahdi Army militia, blamed for much of the Shiite-Sunni slaughter of the past year.

U.S. officials had been urging al-Maliki to cut his ties to al-Sadr and form a new alliance of mainstream Shiites, moderate Sunnis and Kurds. Al-Maliki had been stalling, presumably at the urging of the powerful Shiite clerical hierarchy that wants to maintain Shiite unity.

But pressure for change has mounted since President Bush ordered 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq last January despite widespread opposition in Congress and among the U.S. public — weary of the nearly four-year-long war.

Last month, U.S. and Iraqi troops arrested Deputy Health Minister Hakim al-Zamili, an al-Sadr ally, for allegedly diverting millions of dollars in government funds to the Mahdi Army and allowing death squads to use ambulances and government hospitals to carry out kidnappings and killings.

During the interview, al-Maliki said other top officials would face prosecution for ties to insurgents, sectarian militias and death squads — including members of parliament.

"There has been coordination between us and the Multinational Forces ... starting at the beginning of this year ... to determine who should arrested and the reasons behind arresting them," he said.

Al-Maliki did not elaborate on the U.S.-Iraqi coordination but said Iraqi judicial authorities were reviewing case files to decide which to refer to an Iraqi investigative judge, who must decide whether there is enough evidence to order a trial.

Al-Maliki said he was encouraged by Iraqi public response to the new Baghdad security operation — which has led to a sharp drop in violence in the capital.

He also defended his government, saying it managed to "achieve a lot of harmony and stability" despite attacks by al-Qaida and Saddam Hussein loyalists.

The prime minister did not say how many politicians and officials might be targeted for formal investigation, an Iraqi legal step that corresponds to a grand jury probe.

But five senior Iraqis — two of them generals and three from Shiite and Sunni parties — have told the AP that up to 100 prominent figures could face legal proceedings.

The five spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk about the subject to the media. All five had direct knowledge of the case review.

U.S. officials have said privately that a number of prominent Iraqis were believed to have ties to armed groups.

One Shiite parliament member, Jamal Jaafar Mohammed, is believed to have fled to Iran after U.S. authorities learned that he was convicted by a Kuwaiti court in absentia and sentenced to death in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. and French embassies in Kuwait.

Mohammed fled Kuwait for Iran before he could be arrested and returned after the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003. U.S. officials have alleged he was a conduit for Iranian weapons and supplies smuggled to Shiite militias.

U.S. military officials have expressed concern over alleged Iranian weapons shipments and financial support to Shiite parties allied with al-Maliki. The Shiite-led government hopes the upcoming regional conference will ease tensions between the U.S. and Shiite-dominated Iran — and allay Washington's fears of Tehran's influence here.

The U.S. also hopes the conference will encourage Syria and other Arab countries — most of them Sunni-led — to increase their support for Iraqi's leadership, despite regional unease over the Shiite-led government's ties to Iran.

"In fact the importance of the upcoming conference lies in the fact that the Iraqi government has the ability to serve as a proper venue for solving conflicts," al-Maliki said.

"So we will exert the utmost effort to find solutions to all pending questions, either among regional countries themselves or between them and Iraq, or between them and powers such as the U.S. and Britain and the international community."

Sunnis Slain Over Talks With Shi'ites (WT/AP)

By Brian Murphy

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Gunmen rounded up two Sunni families who had received death threats for joining U.S.-organized talks with local Shi'ites, hauling away the men and boys and killing all six yesterday in a campaign by suspected Sunni insurgents to keep opponents from cooperating with Iraq's government.

Also, the al Qaeda-affiliated group Islamic State of Iraq posted an online video of the execution of 18 Iraqi security troops, shot in the back of their heads while kneeling in a field.

DOJ_NMG_0139936

The three-minute video, posted on a Web site previously used by the Islamists, said the 18 kidnapped government security personnel were slain in retaliation for the purported rape of a Sunni woman by members of the Shi'ite-dominated police. The video's authenticity could not be immediately verified.

The group also claimed responsibility for the deaths of 14 policemen whose bodies were found Friday in the northeast province of Diyala.

Some of the victims were decapitated, according to an Associated Press photographer. Their remains were cleansed in Muslim tradition before burial in the Shi'ite city of Najaf, 100 miles south of Baghdad.

U.S. forces, meanwhile, reported air strikes and raids on what they described as Sunni militant bases linked to the group al Qaeda in Iraq.

A recent wave of Sunni reprisals appears linked to increasingly high-profile attempts to stir popular momentum against Sunni terrorists and militants who are trying to drive out the Shi'ite-led government and its American backers.

Those targeted include a range of Sunnis raising their voices against violence: imams, clan-based vigilantes and activists trying to bridge deep rifts with majority Shi'ites.

"We are seeing more people beginning to challenge the insurgents," said Marine Brig. Gen. John Allen, who oversees units in the militant heartland west of Baghdad.

The families gunned down at sunrise yesterday had received death threats for weeks after attending gatherings of Sunni and Shi'ite leaders, police said.

The first meeting, organized by U.S. military officials on Feb. 13, brought together leaders of prominent clans from both sides, said military spokesman Maj. Webster M. Wright III.

The clan chiefs held another round on their own about a week later and appointed a joint council "to discuss the terms of reconciliation" around Youssifiyah, a Sunni-dominated area about 12 miles south of Baghdad, Maj. Wright said.

At dawn, gunmen stormed the home of two families belonging to the influential Sunni Mashhada tribe, said police 1st Lt. Haider Satar. Two fathers and their four sons were separated from their wives and sisters. They were executed at point-blank range.

In the morgue in nearby Mahmoudiya, AP Television News footage showed at least two victims had their hands bound behind their backs.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, is under pressure from Washington to take a stronger stand against Sunni insurgents, as well as a Shi'ite militia that forms part of his power base.

In an interview with the Associated Press, Mr. al-Maliki said he will reshuffle his 39-seat Cabinet "either this week or next" and pursue criminal charges against political figures -- and even members of parliament -- linked to extremists.

He said there has been coordination between Iraqi and multinational forces from the beginning of the year "to determine who should be arrested and the reasons behind arresting them."

The prime minister did not say how many Cabinet members would be replaced, but some officials said about nine would lose their jobs, including all six Cabinet members loyal to radical anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who leads the powerful Mahdi's Army militia.

U.S. officials had been urging Mr. al-Maliki to cut his ties to Sheik al-Sadr and form a new alliance of mainstream Shi'ites, moderate Sunnis and Kurds.

Mr. al-Maliki has won some breathing room in recent days with a notable -- but perhaps temporary -- drop in bloodshed in Baghdad. It comes as a U.S.-led security crackdown concentrates on areas considered staging grounds for Sunni insurgent car bombs and mortar attacks.

The Mahdi's Army also was strong-armed by Mr. al-Maliki to pull back. Its suspected death squads once left dozens of Sunni victims around the city -- a figure that has fallen off significantly.

In western Baghdad, meanwhile, a top adviser to Iraq's Defense Ministry was kidnapped in western Baghdad, said an aide to Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the largest Sunni bloc in parliament.

In U.S. raids north of Baghdad, nine suspected insurgents were captured, including two thought to be responsible for recruiting and helping foreign militants in Baghdad, the U.S. military said. The suspects also were accused of harboring al Qaeda in Iraq leaders, it said, but gave no further details.

U.S. warplanes also struck a suspected car bomb factory in Arab Jabour, south of Baghdad, the military said. Seven suspected insurgents were killed when two precision-guided bombs destroyed the structure where they were hiding, the military said.

Iraq Terror Group Posts Tape Of Killings (AP)

By Brian Murphy

DOJ_NMG_0139937

AP, March 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) - An al-Qaida-affiliated group said Saturday it killed 18 kidnapped government security forces in retaliation for the alleged rape of a Sunni woman by members of the Shiite-dominated police, posting an online video of the officers being shot in the back of their heads while kneeling in a field.

The authenticity of the three-minute video, posted on a Web site previously used by the Islamic State of Iraq, could not be immediately verified.

The group also said it had killed 14 policemen, whose bodies were found Friday in the northeast province of Diyala, in retaliation for the alleged rape. Some of the victims were decapitated, according to an Associated Press photographer.

Meanwhile, gunmen rounded up two Sunni families that had received death threats for joining U.S.-organized talks with local Shiites, hauling away the men and boys and killing all six Saturday as suspected insurgents expanded a campaign of fear against opponents.

U.S. forces also reported airstrikes and raids on what it called Sunni militant bases linked to al-Qaida in Iraq.

A recent wave of Sunni reprisals appears linked to increasingly high-profile attempts to stir popular momentum against Sunni extremists trying to drive out the Shiite-led government and its American backers.

Among those targeted include a range of Sunnis raising their voices against violence: imams, clan-based vigilantes and activists trying to bridge deep rifts with majority Shiites.

The execution video released Saturday first depicts the 18 men, some in Iraqi military uniforms, blindfolded, hands tied behind their backs and lined up in three rows before a screen. The men in the front row are kneeling. Armed masked men were seen pointing machine guns at the captives.

Two masked militants, with checkered scarves on their heads, then fire from handguns at close range into the backs of the men's heads, while a third militant carries a black banner ahead of them. As they are shot, the victims fall, head forward to the ground. The shooting is accompanied by chants of "Allahu Akbar," or "God is the Greatest."

Male voices chant repeatedly in Arabic during the video: "At your service, sister" - a likely reference to the revenge for the allegedly raped Sunni woman.

Another male voice is heard reading from the Islamic State of Iraq's statement posted on the same Web site Friday, saying the group's court had ordered the 18 security troops executed because Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government had failed to meet the group's demands to hand over the officers who allegedly assaulted the Sunni woman in Baghdad last month, and to release all Sunni women detainees from Iraqi prisons.

A 20-year-old woman told Arab television stations that she was detained in a Sunni area of west Baghdad on Feb. 18, taken to a police garrison and assaulted by three officers. The woman gave a name which identified her as Sunni.

Al-Maliki, a Shiite, announced an investigation Feb. 19 but cleared the officers the following day, stirring outrage among Sunni politicians. Al-Maliki said the rape claim was fabricated to tarnish the reputation of the police and the security crackdown in Baghdad.

The two families gunned down at sunrise Saturday had received death threats for weeks after attending gatherings of Sunni and Shiite leaders, police said.

The first meeting, organized by U.S. military officials on Feb. 13, brought together leaders of prominent clans from both sides, said military spokesman Maj. Webster M. Wright III.

The clan chiefs held another round on their own about a week later and appointed a joint council "to discuss the terms of reconciliation" around Youssifiyah, a Sunni-dominated area about 12 miles south of Baghdad, Wright said.

At dawn, gunmen stormed the home of two families belonging to the influential Sunni Mashhada tribe, said police 1st Lt. Haider Satar. Two fathers and their four sons were separated from their wives and sisters. They were executed at point-blank range.

In the morgue in nearby Mahmoudiya, AP Television News footage showed at least two victims had their hands bound behind their backs.

Al-Maliki is under strong pressure from Washington to take a stronger hand against Sunni insurgents and the Shiite militia that forms part of his power base.

In an interview with the AP, he said he will reshuffle his 39-seat Cabinet "either this week or next" and pursue criminal charges against political figures - and even members of parliament - linked to extremists.

He said there has been coordination between Iraqi and multinational forces from the beginning of the year "to determine who should arrested and the reasons behind arresting them."

The prime minister did not say how many Cabinet members would be replaced. But some officials said about nine would lose their jobs, including all six Cabinet members loyal to radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who leads the powerful Mahdi Army militia.

DOJ_NMG_0139938

U.S. officials had been urging al-Maliki to cut his ties to al-Sadr and form a new alliance of mainstream Shiites, moderate Sunnis and Kurds.

Al-Maliki has won some breathing room in recent days with a notable - but perhaps temporary - drop in bloodshed in Baghdad. It comes as a U.S.-led security crackdown concentrates on areas considered staging grounds for Sunni insurgent car bombs and mortar attacks.

The Mahdi Army also was strong-armed by al-Maliki to pull back. Its suspected death squads once left dozens of Sunni victims around the city - a figure that has fallen off significantly.

For the second consecutive day, just one major explosion rocked the capital. The latest - a roadside bomb - killed three U.S. soldiers on patrol in central Baghdad, the military said.

In western Baghdad, meanwhile, a top adviser to Iraq's Defense Ministry was kidnapped in western Baghdad, said an aide to Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leader of the largest Sunni bloc in parliament.

Lt. Gen. Thamir Sultan hails from Saddam Hussein's tribe and had been mentioned as a possible defense minister when the current government was organized last year. The aide spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

In U.S. raids north of Baghdad, nine suspected insurgents were captured, including two believed to be responsible for recruiting and helping foreign militants in Baghdad, the U.S. military said. The suspects were also accused of harboring al-Qaida in Iraq leaders, it said, but gave no further details.

U.S. warplanes also struck a suspected car bomb factory in Arab Jabour, south of Baghdad, the military said. Seven suspected insurgents were killed when two precision-guided bombs destroyed the structure where they were hiding, the military said.

In Baghdad, Sectarian Lines Too Deadly To Cross (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, March 3 — After centuries full of vibrant interaction, of marrying, sharing and selling across sects and classes, Baghdad has become a capital of corrosive and violent borderlines. Streets never crossed. Conversations never started. Doors never entered.

Sunnis and Shiites in many professions now interact almost exclusively with colleagues of the same sect. Sunnis say they are afraid to visit hospitals because Shiites loyal to the cleric Moktada al-Sadr run the Health Ministry, while Shiite laborers who used to climb into the back of pickup trucks for work across the Tigris River in Sunni western Baghdad now take jobs only near home.

The goal of the new Baghdad security plan is to fix all of this — to fashion a peace that stitches the city's cleaved neighborhoods back together. After three weeks, there are a few signs of progress. The number of bodies found daily has decreased to 20 or fewer from 35 to 50. In some areas closely patrolled by American troops, a few of the families that fled the violence are said to be returning.

But even in neighborhoods that are improving or are relatively calm, borders loom. Streets once crossed without a thought are now bullet-riddled and abandoned, the front lines of a block-by-block war among Shiite militias, Sunni insurgents, competing criminal gangs and Iraqi and American troops.

Some Americans who have seen both Bosnia and Iraq say Baghdad has come to resemble Sarajevo as it began to unravel in the 1990s, latticed with boundaries that are never openly indicated but are passed on in fearful whispers among neighbors who have suffered horrific losses.

Like jagged wounds, the boundaries mark histories of brutal violence. And for Iraqis, they underscore a vital question at the heart of the new plan: can scarred neighborhoods ever heal?

Fadhil/Sadriya

Sybaa Street used to be wall-to-wall people: sidewalks were crammed with shoppers, and roads were snarled with cars. In the heart of central Baghdad, Sybaa was known as the road to get from the automotive shops on one side of the market district to the hardware stores on the other.

Back then — as recently as two years ago, residents said — no one seemed to care that it was the border between the mostly Sunni neighborhood of Fadhil and the largely Shiite areas to the south, Sadriya and Sheik Omar.

But that has all changed. After six months of fighting between Sunnis and Shiites, Sybaa Street is now deserted and forsaken. On a recent afternoon, the only sign of life was a lone mechanic working inside a dark garage, his efforts lighted by a single bulb. Bullets from earlier battles punctured nearly everything — buildings, utility poles, even rusted mufflers hanging outside shuttered shops.

DOJ_NMG_0139939

Um Shaima, 48, a garrulous Sunni widow who used to sell yogurt in the Sadriya market, lives just north of Sybaa Street in Fadhil. She said she used to visit the stores there for clothes. Her cousin Samir worked for years on the Sadriya side of Sybaa Street as a mechanic without any trouble.

Then a few months ago, Ms. Shaima said, he received a threat. "They told him, 'You are a Sunni, and all Sunnis are infidels and their women are prostitutes, so stop coming to Sadriya or you will be killed,' " she said.

"He didn't listen," she added.

The next day, he was kidnapped. Witnesses said Shiite militants yanked him off his motorcycle and threw him in the trunk of a sedan.

"They called his wife at 9 a.m. the next day," Ms. Shaima said, "telling her that they will kill all the Sunnis, and your husband is dead."

A Shiite nephew of Samir's later recovered his uncle's mutilated body from a trash pile east of Baghdad.

Ms. Shaima said her two sons now carried guns at night to protect her and her neighbors. The Shiite-led Iraqi government will not protect them because the Shiites "want to finish us," she said. "They will start breaking into our houses, raping us in front of our children, then killing us with our kids," she added. "They will let Iraq reach a point where Palestinian misery will seem like a picnic."

Across the border, in Sadriya, lies a mirror image of anger and fear. The response is similar, too: young men with guns who view themselves as protectors, who justify violence as the reasonable response to violence.

Nazar Sharif Abd Hussein, 35, a carpenter and a member of the Mahdi Army militia, said he did not hate all Sunnis; one of his sisters who lives outside of Baghdad just married one.

Mr. Hussein hardly looked fierce, at 5 feet 7 inches tall, wearing jeans and a gray sweater, with a short beard and sunken dark eyes. But he said he could be vicious when called upon because Sunni gangsters and insurgents in Fadhil had shown no respect for life.

Last May, he said, his 17-year-old best friend, Salar, was shot dead while they both guarded an area near the edge of Fadhil. He said Salar was wearing a flak jacket but a stream of .50-caliber bullets perforated his side and ripped through his chest.

"I still remember that night," Mr. Hussein said, adding, "He was standing in the middle of the street."

The sectarian border now seems to define him. He said he lived alone, worked near his apartment by day and was a guard for the Mahdi Army at night. Because the militia has shut down bars and other places where people socialize (he offered no opinion of the policy), he said his life remained stalled. He said he expected it to stay that way.

"I don't want to get married because maybe I'll be killed or tortured," he said. "I'm afraid to bring a wife into this."

Saydia/Dora

Baghdad's relentless violence has also created a deeper divide that may prove equally hard to eliminate: the line between the known and the stranger.

As the unfamiliar has become the dangerous, Iraqis have developed elaborate disguises to help them pass as members of the other sect: ruses like adopting identification cards with false family names or developing elaborate fictional histories.

Even then, being a member of the same sect or a relative is no guarantee of safety in a city, Iraqis say, where Shiites have killed Shiites and Sunnis have killed Sunnis out of uncertainty over whom to trust.

Ali Abu Zainab, 50, a mechanic and a journalist, said the border between his neighborhood, Saydia, and Dora had left him and his three young daughters cut off from his extended family. Both neighborhoods have historically been populated by a mixture of Sunnis, Shiites and Christians. But because Dora has been a battleground for various militant groups for at least a year, he said, crossing over is impossible.

The Hilla highway, a wide road heading south that separates the two areas, and the Dora highway — the main road into the neighborhood of the same name — are nearly empty except for gunmen. A relative who was forced to drive down the Dora highway three months ago because of a surprise checkpoint saw bodies littering the streets, Mr. Zainab said.

So even though his favorite aunts and cousins in Dora live less than two miles away, he has been unable to visit for more than a year. In the fall, he said, he missed a cousin's wedding. After another cousin was killed by Shiite militants, he missed the funeral.

"I used to go frequently to Dora just like everyone else in Saydia," he said.

Now, he shops near home. When he leaves, he exits from the opposite side of the neighborhood. Still, the border's dangers seep in. Because Saydia has remained less violent than Dora, fewer residents have fled and security is not as tight. Fighters pushed out of Dora consider Saydia a good place to hide because they can blend in with civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0139940

Three weeks ago, Mr. Zainab said, after American and Iraqi troops started an operation against insurgents in Dora, a battle broke out near his home. When the gunfire stopped, 10 people were dead. He said no one in the neighborhood seemed to know who had been fighting or what had set it off.

"Sectarian extremism is the reason for all of this," he said. "Iraqis are sentimental and their emotions lead them to follow those who pretend to be religious."

Noting that his neighborhood still contained both Sunnis and Shiites, he said that Iraqi politicians, with the help of the American-led invasion in 2003, seemed intent on stirring up hatred. "The problems are between them," he said. "Not between the people."

Kadhimiya/Huriya/Shuala

Some Iraqis draw the border at their own doorsteps.

Saadi Khazaal Jawad, 60, a Shiite former government worker and restaurateur, said his neighborhood was so dangerous, he was a virtual shut-in. He lives in Chikuk, a mixed area squeezed among the Sunni neighborhood of Huriya to the south and the Shiite Kadhimiya to the east and Shuala to the west.

As Shiites from the north and east have begun expanding their turf into Chikuk, Sunnis from Huriya have been fighting back, making every corner here a potential danger zone.

Mr. Jawad has a dusty blue Chevrolet Caprice that he almost never drives. He has two daughters and four sons whom he tries to keep home lest he lose them. He has forbidden his 16-year-old daughter to go to school.

On most days, Mr. Jawad said, he prays, eats, naps, reads newspapers and watches television. Oprah Winfrey and Rachael Ray are among his favorites.

He also escapes with his birds, a gaggle of passenger pigeons in cages on his roof. The birds come from places he used to visit on vacations, like Mosul and Basra. They offer a way, he said, to flee.

"I spend about two or three hours here," he said as he fed the birds. "I forget everything when I'm here. And besides, I can't go anywhere. It's dangerous to go out."

Even Mr. Jawad has not entirely lost hope; he said he was rooting for the Iraqi government's efforts to shore up security, which he considered sincere. Some residents in Fadhil and Sadriya also said the recent Iraqi-American operation there had given a few of their friends enough confidence to leave their apartments and return to work.

But Iraqis all across Baghdad said it could take years for men like Mr. Hussein, the Mahdi militant in Sadriya, to give up their weapons, and for residents to let go of their fears. With American helicopters overhead every day and gunfire and explosions as regular as morning alarm clocks, Iraqis' sense of being trapped has yet to recede.

"I try to kill time," Mr. Jawad said. "We try to busy ourselves because when I have nothing to do, it makes time last longer."

Marriages Between Sects Come Under Siege In Iraq (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Once a Sign of Tolerance, Unions Now Seen as Perilous Betrayals

BAGHDAD -- The note was slipped under the door of May Mahmoud's shop. Neatly typed on a computer, it read: "You must leave your home. We give you three days. Or we will kill you." It was addressed to her husband.

He was a Shiite Muslim. But she was a Sunni. Where would they go?

They fled from their mostly Sunni neighborhood to his mother's house in a nearby Shiite enclave. Within months, as Sunni insurgents pushed into that area, another death threat arrived at the shop. It was time to leave again. As she told the story, Mahmoud's voice shook, not out of anger, but despair.

"From that point on, our life became like hell," she said.

As U.S. and Iraqi forces attempt to pacify the capital, mixed couples who symbolize Iraq's once famous tolerance are increasingly entangled by hate. Forced by militias or insurgents to leave their homes because one partner is from the wrong sect, they find few havens because of the other partner's affiliation. These strains, fueled by displacement, separation and fear, are beginning to tear apart such families, weakening bonds that for many Iraqis hold the hope of sectarian reconciliation.

"In the absence of security, Iraqis are protecting themselves by turning to their sects and their tribes," said Zina Abdul Rasul, a U.N. human rights worker who herself is a product of a mixed marriage. "It is becoming normal to hear about mixed families breaking down."

Today, Mahmoud, a small woman with thin eyebrows curving over her almond-shaped eyes, lives with her relatives. Her husband lives in Cairo with his family. Her Sunni family is pressing her to divorce him because of his sect. His Shiite family is convinced all Sunnis are criminals. The couple have met twice since April.

DOJ_NMG_0139941

"We love each other a lot," said Mahmoud, 37, a faint smile appearing on her oval face, framed by a lime green head scarf. "That's what makes it worse. We're suffering because we cannot live together."

She requested that her husband's name not be used because he is well known in her neighborhood. Seated inside a hotel, her voice dropped to a whisper whenever someone passed nearby.'It's Better If You Go'

The question came long before the death threats, long before the separation. Mahmoud remembers the day clearly. It was 2002, a few days before her marriage.

"Don't you understand that he is a Shia?" her brother asked.

She was surprised he crossed that line. "Yes, I know. I am a Muslim. He is a Muslim. That is all that matters," she replied.

While there are no official statistics, sociologists estimate that nearly a third of Iraqi marriages are unions between members of different sectarian or ethnic communities. In the aftermath of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, many Iraqis argued that the prevalence of such unions showed that Iraqis cared more about their Arab or national identity than their sect, which would spare the country a civil war.

But Iraq's sectarian strife has risen sharply since the bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra by Sunni militants a year ago. Since then, more than 500,000 Iraqis have fled their homes, a number that is growing by 50,000 every month, according to the United Nations. The vast majority have left mixed areas, the main battlefields of the sectarian war.

For the past 23 years, Ahmad Shammari, 55, a Sunni, lived with his family in Baghdad's Hurriyah neighborhood. A few months ago, Shiite militias began to drive Sunnis from their homes. Still, he felt protected. The family of his Shiite wife had been in Hurriyah for 40 years. Then workers at a local Sunni mosque were killed, and more Sunnis fled.

One evening, Shammari and his wife had a conversation, he recalled.

"It's better if you go," she said.

Shammari refused. But a few days later, after more Sunni families left, he reconsidered. He worried that his wife might be seen as a collaborator for marrying a Sunni. He worried about Omar, his eldest son, who bears the most common of Sunni names. There was pressure from his wife's family, too.

"They felt a little scared that one of their women was married to a Sunni," Shammari said. "They were also scared that I would be killed. So they encouraged her to make me leave."

In late November, he told his three boys and two girls that he would be "gone for a short time." Later, Omar, 15, walked up to him and said: "I can't stay here. I feel scared." Shammari understood.

Early the next morning, they packed lightly. They didn't want to attract attention from the neighbors. At the door, Shammari cried. So did his wife.

Omar watched quietly. Father and son took a taxi to Shammari's parents' house in a majority-Sunni neighborhood. It is only seven miles away, but the violence, curfews and checkpoints have shackled his wife and children. They visit only occasionally. Always, his youngest children ask when he is returning home.

"I will be back soon, inshallah," he tells them, using the common Arabic expression for "God willing."Sorrow and Bitterness

Nowadays, even in a climate of deep suspicions, Iraqis of different sects mix when they can. But anecdotal evidence from interviews with social workers, U.N. officials and everyday Iraqis suggests that the strife is breeding mistrust within mixed families. Iraqis tell stories about family members being betrayed by relatives of a different sect.

Khaleel Ibrahim Fahad al-Janabi, 54, a former Iraqi army colonel, said his Sunni nephew, Ahmed, was shot dead by two brothers-in-law who were Shiite militiamen. Janabi now wishes one of his daughters, who is married to a Shiite, would divorce. He still has one unwed daughter.

"I would never ever give her in marriage to a Shia," Janabi said bitterly.

Samar Ahmed, a 25-year-old Iraqi government employee, remembered how her Sunni father turned against their family.

Ahmed's mother is Shiite. By 2005, her father had grown closer to his previous wife, a Sunni, and their children. When a son from that marriage was killed by Shiite militiamen, her father grew bitter, said Ahmed, who identifies herself as Shiite.

That's when he began pressuring Ahmed's mother to sign over to him the deed to a house in Baqubah, northeast of Baghdad, that her mother had inherited.

Ahmed, her sad voice quivering at times, said she still recalls her father's words when her maternal uncle went missing one day.

"He's just like the other Shia dogs, disappeared and killed like them," he said.

One day in October, her father came by the house. He carried a can of kerosene. As Ahmed and her younger brother watched helplessly, he poured it on his wife and threatened to set her on fire.

"He was beating her," Ahmed said. "He even pulled out a knife and said, 'I'll kill you.' " Her mother signed over the deed. Ahmed filed a complaint with the police, but they dismissed it as an internal family problem. A few weeks later, they learned that the house had been sold. She has not seen her father since that day.

DOJ_NMG_0139942

"In neighborhoods, the Sunni are displacing the Shia or the Shia are displacing the Sunnis," said Ahmed with disgust. "In my family, it is my father who displaced us."Loyalties Divided

After the second death threat, Mahmoud would lock her husband inside the house. They contemplated moving to the southern Shiite city of Najaf, but that made her uneasy.

"They may question why he married a Sunni," Mahmoud said.

So Mahmoud urged her husband to move to Cairo. "I gave him an ultimatum: 'You go to Egypt, or I will leave you. I cannot see you get killed,' " Mahmoud said. She would stay and work.

The day he left, she didn't tell anyone, not even her family. She was worried that someone might kidnap him on the way to the airport.

In May, a month after her husband moved to Egypt, his brother was kidnapped and has not been seen again. When Mahmoud visited her husband in October, she felt a change in his family.

"They began to refuse me because I am Sunni," Mahmoud said. "The person who kidnapped his brother was Sunni. It was not the same family as before. They talked about Sunnis as being criminals. They said Sunnis kill people."

Her husband, who is unemployed, wanted her to move to Cairo and live with his family. Mahmoud refused.

"I didn't feel comfortable," Mahmoud said.

She also had a good job in Baghdad. "If I go to Egypt, I will have to start from zero again," she said.

In Iraq, her family, too, had changed.

"They tell me not to go and live with his family. They say the situation is different now," Mahmoud said. "Now, I have become a problem to my family because they agreed to my marriage to a Shiite man. Some in my family are asking me to think about leaving my husband. They say: 'May, think of your life. Are you going to spend the rest of your life working and working and then traveling to see him?' "

Last month, Mahmoud tried to visit her husband. In a region growing weary of Iraq's refugees, the Egyptian government, she said, turned down her request for a visa.

In Iraq, 'Dating' Happens Online (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 3, 2007

Civil war leaves young people largely cut off from one another. Normal life is tantalizingly out of reach.

BAGHDAD — For Ali and Noura, love blossomed in an Internet chat room.

Both were young, educated, devout Sunni Muslims who shared a passion for Jim Carrey movies and Arabic love tunes. For months, they chatted online obsessively. As the friendship deepened, she shyly agreed to a webcam meeting.

But their relationship was doomed from the start: He lives in a quiet, middle-class neighborhood of east Baghdad; she is across the Tigris River in the city's war-torn west. It was out of the question that they should ever meet.

"It seemed like a pointless relationship," says Ali, who now refers to Noura as "my ex-Internet girlfriend." He stopped responding to her messages and she eventually stopped sending them.

"She must be angry," he says, looking slightly embarrassed as he leans forward to stub out a cigarette. "Maybe if we could have been alone together, it would have been different."

Young Iraqis, trapped in their homes in the mean streets of this bloodstained capital, are increasingly turning to the Internet to chat with relatives, hang out with friends and search for love.

Such virtual relationships offer a refuge of sorts from numbing isolation and fear during a time of staggering violence. But all too often they are mirages — a seductive reminder of a life now tantalizingly out of reach for most.

"They are like birds in a cage," says Anas Attar, 22, one of a growing number of businessmen cashing in on the demand by selling access to their satellite-based Internet connections.

In Iraq, like many other Muslim countries, it has always been difficult for young men and women to spend time together. Introductions were frequently arranged by families and closely chaperoned. Many couples from more privileged backgrounds met at university, which was often the first time they attended a coed school. But they were rarely allowed to be alone together unless they were engaged.

As Iraq's civil war has deepened, even close relatives and friends have found it hard to get together.

Reem, a striking 28-year-old with long dark hair, heavy makeup and lots of gold jewelry, used to meet regularly with a tight-knit group of college girlfriends. They would picnic in the park, go shopping and gossip at one another's homes.

She hasn't seen some of them for two years now. Many have fled the country. Those who remain venture outdoors only when they must.

DOJ_NMG_0139943

Depressed and with too much time on her hands, Reem started posting love poems on an Internet forum for young Iraqis. Soon she was getting inquiries from lonely young men, with whom she chats about current events and vacations outside Iraq.

A civil servant who was afraid to give her last name, Reem isn't interested in meeting any of them, but she enjoys the unfettered conversations that are possible only online.

"It's very interesting to get to know a man away from the constraints of culture and tradition," she says. "They console me and tell me there will be a day when this mess will end."

Across the Middle East, more and more young people are doing the same thing. In Iraq, there are few other ways for them to interact.

Universities are becoming increasingly conservative, frowning on too much contact between male and female students. Many of the old hangouts — restaurants, cafes, parks, social clubs — are closed. At the end of the workday, Baghdad residents hurry home to beat the curfews and the approaching darkness with its terrors.

Ali Azawi, a tall, polished medical student from a well-to-do Baghdad family, was beginning to despair of ever having a girlfriend when he started trawling Arabic-language chat rooms and found Noura.

He composed a brief introduction, which he copied and pasted over and over for hours before getting a response: "My name is Ali, age 23. I live in Baghdad. I am looking for a young, beautiful woman."

Noura first approached him under a pseudonym — "Abbas" — which he says conjured up images of a large, oafish man.

She wanted to know what he did for a living and to which Muslim sect he belonged. Reassured by his answers, she revealed that she was a 24-year-old woman who taught English at a primary school a few blocks from her home.

They chatted for months, swapping jokes and music downloads and sharing the details of their lives on opposite sides of Baghdad.

As a man living in a relatively safe, religiously mixed neighborhood, Azawi could still get out and go to college. But life was very different for Noura, a woman in a Sunni-dominated area that has seen repeated clashes with Shiite militiamen.

"She was trapped between her four walls and in front of her PC 24/7," says Azawi, who declined to provide Noura's last name because he says her parents would not approve of her chatting with men on the Internet. "Every time I logged on, she was there."

The first time he saw her on a webcam, he says, he found her a little "puffy." But "I felt very special, because it is not an easy thing for a woman to do that."

Six months later, they still hadn't met. And he had lost hope of ever bridging the few miles of real estate that divided them.

Azawi envies the ease of relationships in the United States.

"You have the bar, the streets, the freedom and no religion to judge you," he says. In Iraq, "it is a fight for the heart."

The Internet became available to Iraqis during the last years of Saddam Hussein's oppressive rule. Few knew how to use it, and access was tightly controlled.

After Hussein's fall, Internet cafes spread, bringing the Web to hundreds of thousands of Iraqis. Subscribers to the state-owned Internet provider, which has the monopoly on dial-up connections, jumped from about 75,000 in June 2004 to nearly 210,000 in May 2006, according to U.S. military figures.

Dozens of private providers also offer wireless connections to satellite-based hubs, bypassing Iraq's notorious phone lines.

In troubled parts of the capital, some cafes have received threats and closed. Militants accuse them of spreading pornography and providing a means to contact the U.S. military.

In Karada, a relatively safe neighborhood of east Baghdad, university students in jeans and baseball caps tap busily at dozens of computers in a converted house tiled in blue and white faux marble. Framed Koranic verses hang on the wall, and there are sodas in a fridge and a television set playing in the corner. But most of the overwhelmingly male customers stare intently at their screens.

"All they do is chat, chat, chat," says owner Yousef Abdulla, 25, a computer sciences major who opened the Shirifi Internet Cafe three years ago. "They have the opportunity to expand their horizons with this portal and get whatever information they want about anything, but all they are interested in is chatting — especially with girls."

Many hope to find a wife in another country who will help them flee Iraq.

Evan Bazi, 21, also a computer sciences major, comes to the cafe almost every day and chats for hours with friends in the United States, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Iraq, none of whom he has met. He describes these sessions as an "escape from a sad reality."

"I would like to find my mate," he says. But he has been disappointed by the girls he has met online.

"Most girls that I approached, or who have approached me, they're too materialistic and ask me what car I drive or how much money I have," he says glumly. "I want to find a girl who likes me and wants me for the person I am, not for the money that I have."

DOJ_NMG_0139944

A few women also come to the cafe, but most are accompanied by a male relative and stay only a short while, Abdulla says. Those who can afford the monthly fee of $30 to $50 prefer to subscribe to the Internet at home.

They include Dahlia Muayed, a gregarious 29-year-old who flashes a cheery smile in the photograph she sends by e-mail after declining to risk a meeting with a Western reporter.

The petite brunet, who refuses to cover her trendy bob with a scarf, used to divide her time between a mental health charity and a radio station. But the charity closed because it couldn't get funding, and she quit the station after two close colleagues were killed in a car bombing outside their house.

Now she mostly keeps to the family home in west Baghdad, reading, watching DVDs and helping a sister-in law tend to her child. Very occasionally, she risks a furtive visit to a friend.

But she says her main connection to family, friends and the life she once knew is the Internet. Through e-mail and instant messaging, she is able "to spend time, to make relationships with others, to feel that I am important."

"I thank God I have that," she says. "I am not alone."

Times staff writers Zeena Kareem, Said Rifai, Saif Hameed and Saif Rasheed contributed to this report.

Choosing A Sect (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times Magazine, March 4, 2007

As the Sunni-Shiite conflict in Iraq polarizes Muslims across the globe, the United States finds itself in the odd position of seeming to favor a Shiite government in Iraq and Sunni leaders everywhere else. As a result, there has been a lot of loose talk in policy circles recently about how the United States should finally choose sides. After all, the rift between the two denominations is almost as old as Islam itself — and so is unlikely to close soon. What began more than 1,300 years ago as an argument over whether the Prophet Muhammad should be succeeded by his cousin Ali or by an unrelated companion became a bloody civil war, then hardened over time into a theological split. As another civil war worsens in Iraq, the argument goes, America should pick a winner and back it to the hilt.

But who, exactly, is our natural ally in this historic conflict? Pro-Sunni analysts, sometimes reflecting the traditional realist (and Arabist) perspective of the foreign-policy establishment, tend to see a radical Shiite Iran and its subsidiary, Lebanese Hezbollah, as the most pressing threat to America's global interests. In their view, America's traditional policy — backing friendly Sunni powers like Saudi Arabia and Egypt — is the best way to contain Iran. Sunnis make up as much as 90 percent of the world's 1.3 billion Muslims. Our support for the Iranian-backed Shiite parties who run the government in Iraq hasn't exactly worked out so far. If we support Iraq's Shiites even when some are engaging in retaliatory massacres of Iraqi Sunnis, we risk alienating our traditional oil-producing Sunni allies while naïvely spilling American blood to serve the Iranians.

Those who support the party of Ali (as the Shiites were once known) tend to emphasize ideas and culture rather than geostrategy. Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini may have led Shiism down the garden path of anti-Americanism, they allow, but at its core, Shiite thought is extremely fertile and creative, open to synthesis with the ideals of liberal democracy. The mullahs in Qom study Western philosophy from Plato to Habermas, and important reformist intellectuals within Iran have been challenging Khomeinist orthodoxy using the cosmopolitan tools of modern and postmodern thought. Contemporary Iran, the most important Shiite base today, is still shaped by an ancient Persian civilization that predates Islam. Meanwhile, Sunni Islam is in a sorry state, dominated by a purist and anti-intellectual fundamentalism that has been bankrolled by Wahhabi Saudi Arabia. Lest it be forgotten, Osama bin Laden is a Sunni who condemns Shiite and American infidels in the same breath.

Yet both of these all-or-nothing approaches miss the reality of the Sunni-Shiite relationship — over the centuries and today. For most of Islamic history, the denominations have lived side by side in relative peace and harmony. Whole states have moved back and forth from one column to the other. Egypt's ruling dynasty belonged to the Ismaili branch of Shiism for a couple of centuries in the Middle Ages, and modern Egyptians still celebrate Ashura and other vestigially Shiite holidays. According to scholarly consensus, the southern tribes of Iraq became Shiite only in the 19th century, the better to strengthen economic ties with the predominantly Shiite pilgrimage sites of Najaf and Karbala. Some large Iraqi tribes still include both Shiite and Sunni clans, a continuing legacy of that nonviolent shift.

Even Sunni and Shiite belief structures have influenced each other more than is often recognized. In the Middle Ages, the great Islamic philosophers were mostly Sunnis, and the Shiites learned from them. More recently, the aspirations of Sunni Islamists have been shaped by Khomeini's novel version of Shiite political ideology.

This is not to say that the relationship has been trouble-free. In many Sunni-ruled states, Shiites have long been treated as an underclass. Violence has periodically flared up, as in Pakistan, where low-level sectarian attacks have been taking place for two decades. Nevertheless the last major ideological fighting between Sunnis and Shiites took place more than two centuries ago, even before the American Revolution, during the formation of the first Saudi state. Real theological disagreements mean that radicals on both sides can always find reasons to call their opponents heretics; but historically speaking, such a tactic has been rare.

DOJ_NMG_0139945

That means it is a mistake to find that we must support one side in the latest iteration of the Sunni-Shiite conflict. The tendencies that make each denomination distinct are not unequivocally good or bad for the United States. Take the outsize influence of the Shiite clerics: Ayatollah Khomeini gave the world the theory of the Supreme Leader and a distinctive Islamic anti-Americanism; but in Iraq, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani has given us a theory of clerical restraint and a policy of building democracy. The same flexibility is characteristic of Sunni salafis, whose emphasis on the Protestant-style individual reading of the Koran may favor either democratic reform or bin Ladenism. It all depends on who is doing the interpreting.

For the United States to defuse anti-American Islamism, it must be willing to embrace moderates and democrats of all stripes, Sunni or Shiite. From a strategic standpoint, it would also be an error to communicate to Muslims worldwide that the United States supports either Sunnis or Shiites as such. This would undercut the core realist principle that a country's allies are those who act in its interests, not those whom it prefers on the basis of race or creed. In this sense, realism is essentially anti-discriminatory — if not indiscriminate.

So choosing our friends on a case-by-case basis is both morally better and practically wiser. No matter what happens in Iraq, neither Shi'ism nor Sunnism is going to disappear. Just because some Muslims are willing to fight on the basis of who is Sunni and who Shiite doesn't mean we have to.

Military Faces Growing Ranks Of Bereaved (AP)

By David Crary,

AP, March 4, 2007

One of the first sights greeting visitors to Fort Hood is a day-care center's playground, brightly colored evidence of the Army's commitment to be family friendly.

A few blocks away is a more poignant symbol: an office building recently converted into a first-of-its-kind support center for women and children whose husbands and fathers have died in Iraq and Afghanistan. From Fort Hood alone, the toll has passed 365.

"It's our sanctuary," said Ursula Pirtle, whose daughter frequents a playroom at the center. Three-year-old Katie never met her father, Heath. He was killed in Iraq in 2003.

Over the past 15 years, America's armed forces have taken huge strides to retain married service members — improving schools, health programs and child care. But now, as never before in this family-embracing era, the military is struggling with the toughest home-front problem of all: Doing right by the often outspoken and ever-growing ranks of the bereaved.

Of the 3,350 Americans who died in Iraq and Afghanistan through early January, 1,586 of them — 47.3 percent — were married. Those fallen warriors left behind 1,954 children, according to the Pentagon's Manpower Data Center. More recent deaths have pushed that figure past 2,000.

Compared to the heavily draftee combat troops of the Vietnam war, today's volunteer fighting force is older, more reliant on National Guard and Reserve citizen-soldiers, and more likely to be married.

And more so than their Vietnam counterparts, the new generation of bereaved spouses has been vocal — on their bases, at congressional hearings — in pressing for more compassionate, effective support.

It's a constituency that politicians and generals do not want to alienate. The result has been numerous policy changes, ranging from improved benefits to better training for the officers who break the grim news of war-zone deaths. Even the Fort Hood support center materialized due to pressure from widows and their allies.

But the learning process is ongoing and the results are mixed.

"The war on terror has presented us with new challenges we haven't seen before, in terms of number of casualties," said an Army spokesman, Lt. Col. Kevin Arata. "We know we're not perfect — there are things families have said we can do better, and we've listened to that."

Interviews with a dozen widows at Fort Hood and across the country reveal varied experiences, but also some common bonds.

Across the board, the widows are proud of their husbands — even if they disagree on the wisdom of the Iraq war. Each woman is still grieving, and those with children have extra worries — financial and psychological — that extend far into the future.

Some are deeply grateful for the support provided by the military after their husbands' deaths; others are critical. Among the common complaints — that notification and assistance officers were sometimes ill-informed or aloof, and that they were bounced through different parts of the military bureaucracy when seeking help.

"We have to have someone who knows what they're talking about," Pirtle said. "The blind-leading-the-blind system isn't working out."

DOJ_NMG_0139946

Pirtle's daughter, Katie — born 26 days after her father's death in October 2003 — seems to be thriving. But many of the now-fatherless older children struggle emotionally — to the point where school can be anguishing and therapy is needed. The military pays for some such counseling, but there are limits, and families say the logistics can be difficult.

In Evans, Ga., Irene Prather is looking for a small Christian school for her 11-year-old son, Aaron, who has floundered at public school since his father, Army Chief Warrant Officer Clint Prather, was killed in Afghanistan two years ago.

"It seems like every day is a struggle for him," Prather said. "When we talk to the counselors, nobody understands what's really going on. They weren't prepared to deal with people who've lost somebody in the war."

Clint Prather served 11 years in the Army. His widow, who valued the tight-knit community on base, has found the shift to the civilian world difficult.

"It's kind of like you're pushed to the side," she said. "You're not part of that military family any more."

Other widows still feel those bonds, and reunite — often with children in tow — at "grief camps" or expenses-paid holidays arranged by charities.

Some stay in touch with buddies of their late husbands. A Palmer, Mass., widow, Melissa Storey, was still getting calls from soldiers in Iraq eight months after her husband, Staff Sgt. Clint Storey, was killed there.

"We're just as much a part of the Army as before he died," she said.

Storey, 29, has a 4-year-old daughter, Adela, who's had therapy sessions since her father's death. During the couple's final days together, she also became with pregnant with a son, to be named Clint. She considers her benefits package generous and praised the Army's outreach to families.

"But part of being a good military spouse is accepting that you don't come first — the mission comes first," she added. "It's a hard life. I don't want to sugarcoat it. You suck it up and deal with it."

While many widows have kept a low public profile, some have testified before Congress to urge better benefits or have gained prominence by speaking out elsewhere.

Laura Youngblood of South Hempstead, N.Y., wife of a Navy corpsman killed in Iraq, made national TV appearances assailing anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan, whose son also died in Iraq. Hildi Halley of Falmouth, Maine, met with President Bush last year and blamed his policies for the death of her husband, National Guard Capt. Patrick Damon, from an apparent heart attack in Afghanistan.

"To have him die in a war you didn't agree with is that much worse," she said.

The resentment has been deepened by her experience with the military after her husband's death. She still fumes that his personal belongings reeked of insecticide when they belatedly arrived, and that she spent weeks wrestling with Army bureaucracy before finally reclaiming her own love letters to him that had been confiscated.

Her husband had urged her to seek support among other spouses, but Halley — a mother of two adolescents — feels estranged from other military wives who support the war.

"I couldn't have them as my support group," she said. "They're going through enough pain, and if they want to believe their fairy tale, who am I to wake them up?"

Even at Fort Hood, the Army's largest armored base with 43,900 military personnel and 17,800 family members, anti-war sentiment sometimes surfaces.

"I don't support this war," said Ursula Pirtle. "What did my husband die for? I don't believe what we're doing over there helps our country."

Yet she views her fallen husband as a hero. "When he was killed, I would love to have been there holding him," Pirtle said.

The campaign to establish Fort Hood's Gold Star Family Support Center was led by Debbie Busch, whose own Army husband is alive and well, but who grew dismayed by the lack of organized backing for widows she knew. Initially, there were weekly support meetings at a chapel; last September her group got its own building, complete with lounge, kitchenette and playrooms.

Calls have come from other bases, seeking advice on launching similar programs, and Busch's efforts have been noticed by senior Army officials.

"The fact that these families spoke out and said it could be done better, it gave the Army the opportunity to change things," Busch said.

A recent report by the Government Accountability Office examined some of the issues troubling bereaved families. It said support services were inconsistent and advised the Defense Department to improve its oversight.

"Most survivors don't know what they're entitled to, and that's a big deal," said the GAO's Derek Stewart. "There should be one place that survivors could go and, in one sitting, have an individual spell out all the services and entitlements coming your way."

DOJ_NMG_0139947

Addressing some of the concerns, the Defense Department updated its guide to survivors' benefits, which have increased substantially since the Iraq war began. The so-called "death gratuity" for next of kin has climbed from $6,000 to $100,000; military life insurance payments have risen from $250,000 to $400,000.

Brad Snyder, a benefits expert with the Armed Forces Services Corp., said the package compares well to private-sector plans and can exceed $60,000 a year for a sergeant's widow with three children.

Children of fallen service members now get military medical coverage until adulthood, rather than losing it three years after the death. A bereaved family can now stay in military housing for a year, not six months.

Among the Fort Hood families benefiting from such changes are the widow and four children of Maj. William F. Hecker III, who was killed in January 2006 just six weeks after reaching Iraq. His prior duties included teaching a course on comparative war poetry at the U.S. Military Academy.

Richelle Hecker, his widow, said the children — the youngest 3, the oldest 11 — were helped by grief counseling.

"The counselors play games with them, let them talk about all those things that after a while other people don't want to hear anymore," Hecker said.

She also noted the stream of casualties has prompted many military families to think more seriously about future risks and attend financial-planning sessions that once seemed morbid or unnecessary.

"It's making or breaking people," Hecker said. "I see some marriages growing stronger and others that aren't."

The Army, which accounts for more than two-thirds of the Iraq and Afghanistan deaths, has been striving to address the most prevalent complaints from widows.

In January, it completed an overhaul of the training for casualty notification and assistance officers — the ones who deal directly with grieving families. The goal is for these officers to exhibit "professional compassion."

Col. Patrick Gawkins, director of the Army's Casualty and Mortuary Affairs Operations Center, said the new curriculum includes video footage with actors portraying officers and family members.

The Army also launched a 'round-the-clock call center to assist survivor families with questions about benefits.

"The benefits issue comes across as very bureaucratic and hard to understand," Gawkins said. "We want to clarify and simplify the instruction to the greatest extent possible, given it's in a time of great emotional stress."

Joanne Steen, whose Navy aviator husband died in a helicopter crash in 1992, felt she was filling a gaping void last year by co-authoring "Military Widow: A Survival Guide" — offering advice about coping with the loss of a military husband.

"As a young widow, you may feel like a sideshow in a circus," she wrote. "Because you aren't supposed to be a widow at such a young age, you don't fit in anywhere."

Some widows, though, are well into middle age. Nancy Kelly, of Richmond, Maine, is 52 and has three grandchildren as well as three grown children.

She and her husband, Staff Sgt. Dale James Kelly Jr., had been married 25 years when he was killed in Iraq last May while deployed with the Maine Army National Guard. One tough task was explaining the absence of "Grandpa Kelly" to his grandchildren.

Herself an Air National Guard veteran, Kelly said her husband and his Guard colleagues were well-trained and aware of dangers they faced. But she suggested part of the problem for the Guard-dependent military is that troops' families are less steeled for the traumas of war than active-duty families.

"From a family standpoint, no, we're not prepared for this," Kelly said. "The men go off once a month and two weeks a year (for training), and for many of us wives, it's, 'Oh, that's the time we have dinner with the girls while they're off playing soldier.'"

She paused, reflecting on her husband.

"He was and is my soul mate," Kelly said. "My life as I knew it will never be the same."

___

On the Net:

Fort Hood support center: http://www.goldstarfamilysupport.org/

Army families: http://www.armyfamiliesonline.org/skins/WBLO/home.aspx

A Teenage Soldier's Goodbyes On The Road To Over There (NYT)

By Dan Barry

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

It is time. The fresh young soldier has a plane to catch.

People file out of the dimness of V.F.W. Post 404 and into the morning light. They chat and smoke and mill about on the parking lot gravel, then come together to form a ragged circle of support.

DOJ_NMG_0139948

The dozen motorcyclists among them finalize plans to escort the soldier for most of the two-hour ride to the airport in Las Vegas. Just before raising voices and fists to a recording of the country-western anthem "God Bless the U.S.A.," the crowd bows its collective head and asks God for another favor: to keep safe this soldier, just 10 months removed from her senior prom.

That night she wore a gown the color of valentines; this morning she wears fatigues the color of mud. The uniform has a name patch, KANE, for Pvt. Resha Kane. Eighteen years old and five feet tall. Of Needles High School, Class of 2006, and, lately, of the United States Army, Fourth Infantry Division.

Earlier this morning, Private Kane walked out of her family home in Needles, a small railroad city in California just across the Colorado River. Before her, the family van, packed with two Army duffel bags. Behind her, a living room decorated with family portraits and a large mock check from her current employer.

"Reserved in the name of Resha Kane," the check reads, $37,200 from the Army College Fund and the Montgomery G.I. Bill. It represents her partial compensation for enlisting for three years and 22 weeks. She plans to study biochemistry someday.

At the moment, though, she stands outside this club for veterans of foreign wars, where a bar sign advertises Sunday bloody marys, a buck apiece, 10 to noon. Former soldiers tell her to keep her nose clean over there. Her father, Wesley Kane, has to leave soon for his job as a car dealership's lot manager, but he holds her tight and asks, again and again, do you know how to clean your weapon?

"Yes, Daddy," she says.

The motorcyclists, including some from a group called the Patriot Guard Riders, mount their bikes. Among them is Rich Poliska, a gray-bearded Air Force veteran who lives nearby, in Bullhead City. A Route 66 earring dangles from his left earlobe.

Several months ago Mr. Poliska and his daughter, Heather Ching, heard about a local soldier who had returned from Iraq to no welcome home. They decided to form the Bullhead Patriots, dedicated to honoring soldiers going off to war, or returning from it. This is the group's first deployment effort, he says. "But I've done six funerals and two homecomings."

The Bullhead Patriots had heard of Private Kane's imminent deployment from a veteran who knows a woman who works at the Family Dollar store with the soldier's mother, Patricia Kane. First a surprise potluck supper — the soldier left church on Sunday to find a limousine waiting to whisk her away to the V.F.W. — and now this: an escort to the airport.

Bike engines growl, signaling that it is time. Private Kane climbs into the family van, which features rear-window decals for Jesus and for the Army ("My Daughter Is Serving"). She sits in the back, surrounded by her three younger siblings and a sister's boyfriend. Her quiet mother takes the driver's seat.

Soon the caravan is crossing the Colorado River. It passes a man sitting on the back of a parked pickup, his fist raised in the air: the soldier's father.

This mobile honor guard continues on, heading north on Highway 95, into a desolate, arid stretch of southern Nevada. Motorcycles in front, motorcycles behind, and in the middle, a white van containing a young soldier with just-polished fingernails.

She took care of her siblings while her parents worked, and learned to make a mean baked chicken. She graduated in the upper ranks in a class of about 60. She was honored for her grades and for her abstract artwork of flowers and butterflies. She has yet to learn to drive.

She enlisted in April, the same month as her prom, because she saw the military as a way to further her education. Right after graduation she went through boot camp and some extra training, before coming home a couple of weeks ago to talk up the Army at her alma mater. "Hometown recruiting," the Army calls it.

"Everyone knows me there," Private Kane says of Needles High School, home of the Mustangs.

Now, riding in the midst of this caravan of protection and respect, she is bound for Fort Hood in Texas to await deployment — probably to Iraq, she says.

"Nobody wants to go, but it's our job," she said the other day, her tone all business. "That's what we're trained for. We'll go over, do our job and come back."

The motorcade stops briefly in the old gold-mining town of Searchlight, and a few bikers say goodbye. Then it continues on, across the nothingness, through spits of rain, before stopping again in Railroad Pass, about 20 miles south of the airport. The Bullhead Patriots say farewell to Private Kane.

"Best of luck to you," Mr. Poliska says.

A lone biker continues to lead the Kanes toward Las Vegas, a large American flag flapping from the rear of his motorcycle. He rumbles into the city of gamblers, past drivers oblivious to the now-common moment of a wartime soldier leaving home.

At the last moment the biker peels off. And the white family van follows the signs that say Departures.

A Hero Who Didn't Save Himself (WP)

By Peter Carlson

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139949

For Jeremiah Workman, Decorated for Bravery in Iraq, the Battle's Not Over Yet

Despite heavy resistance from enemy automatic weapon fire and a barrage of grenades, Corporal Workman fearlessly. . .

Jeremiah Workman stood at attention and tried to listen as the narrator read the citation that detailed what he'd done to earn the Navy Cross, an award for valor that is second only to the Medal of Honor.

. . . Corporal Workman again exposed himself to enemy fire while providing cover fire for the team when an enemy grenade exploded directly in front of him, causing shrapnel wounds to his arms and legs . . .

He was standing on the parade ground, facing a grandstand packed with hundreds of people, including his wife and his mother. Behind him were several hundred Marine recruits who were about to graduate from boot camp at Parris Island, S.C., where Workman had recently lost his job as a drill instructor after he suffered what he calls a "mental meltdown."

. . . Although injured, he led a third assault into the building, rallying his team one last time to extract isolated Marines . . .

When the narrator finished reading the story of Workman's "extraordinary heroism" in Iraq, Brig. Gen. Richard T. Tryon pinned the Navy Cross to Workman's chest and the crowd in the grandstand stood and cheered. It was a moment of well-deserved triumph, but it didn't make Workman feel any better.

"When they put that medal on me, from that point on, I sunk deeper into depression," he recalls. "Everybody says it must be awesome to win the Navy Cross. Well, as a matter of fact, it's not. I lost three guys that day, so for the longest time, I didn't even want to wear it. I'd look down at it and see three dead Marines."

Workman, 23, is sitting in a restaurant at the National Museum of the Marine Corps in Quantico, where he now works, his Navy Cross ribbon pinned to his uniform, just above his heart.

"If we lost three people, why did I get an award?" he says softly. "The last thing I think is that I'm a hero."

"I enlisted two days after my 17th birthday," Workman says. "I was a junior in high school. A year later, when I graduated, they shipped me to Parris Island."

He grew up in Marion, Ohio, son of a factory worker and a housewife. A jock in high school, he wanted to be an Ohio state trooper, but you have to be 21, so he figured he'd join the Marine Corps first.

"In my eyes, the Marine Corps was the elite, the tip of the spear," Workman says. "I walked into the recruiter's office and said, 'I want to be a Marine.' I was probably the easiest person they ever talked to."

After boot camp he spent two boring years guarding nuclear submarines at a base in Georgia. In August 2003, he married his high school sweetheart, Jessica Jordan.

In September 2004, he was sent to Iraq and stationed at a base outside Fallujah, the insurgent-controlled city where four American contractors had been killed in the spring, their corpses burned, dragged through the streets and hung from a bridge.

"Fallujah -- that was no man's land," he recalls. "When we drove past, you didn't even look because you knew it was a bad place."

In November 2004, Workman's platoon, part of 3rd Battalion, 5th Marines, got its orders: It would join the thousands of soldiers and Marines attacking Fallujah -- Operation Phantom Fury, the largest American military action since the invasion of Iraq. First, warplanes pounded the city with bombs. Then, in a driving rain, the Marines moved in.

Workman was a squad leader in a mortar platoon. For 17 days, they hunkered down in the mud in the northwest corner of Fallujah, firing at insurgent positions.

"We killed a lot of people with those mortar rounds," he says, "but it's not personal. You don't see the guys' eyes."

By mid-December, the Marines had conquered most of Fallujah and there wasn't much need for mortar fire anymore, so Workman's platoon was split in two and sent out to patrol the city, searching houses, looking for weapons. On Dec. 22, the other half of the platoon got into a nasty firefight.

"Some Marines were wounded pretty badly, and they're all charred. It looks like they've been in a fire," Workman recalls. "They come back and we're like, 'Holy cow!' So it's our turn to go out the next morning and we're kinda nervous. That night we're all still up at 2 o'clock in the morning, scrubbing our weapons, making sure they're perfect. We all had this gut feeling that the next day, we're gonna get in some sort of fight."Ambush in Fallujah

"It starts out like any other normal day," Workman says.

Workman commanded one team of 10 Marines; his friend, Sgt. Jarrett Kraft, commanded another.

"I take my guys on the right side of the street. Kraft takes his guys on the left side of the street," he recalls. "We search the first two houses -- same old crap, we found some guns and ammo and carried it out to the street and threw it in the Humvee."

Searching the third house, Workman heard a blast of machine-gun fire from the house across the street, where Kraft and his men ran into a group of heavily armed insurgents.

"We were pretty much ambushed by a lot of insurgents on the second floor of the house," recalls Kraft, who is now a police officer in Fresno, Calif. He also was awarded a Navy Cross for his actions that day.

DOJ_NMG_0139950

"I was scared," Workman says, laughing. "I really was. . . . When you get caught in a situation like that, it's a real man check. For two seconds, you have to look in that invisible mirror that's not there and look at yourself and question yourself as a man. And say, 'Okay, I'm a corporal in the Marine Corps and I have guys that are looking up to me for leadership. What am I going to do?' . . . So I grabbed everybody in the house and we come running."

Gun smoke rose from the windows of the house across the street. Workman ordered several men to guard the outside and then led the rest inside, where a lieutenant informed them that Marines were trapped on the second floor.

"The lieutenant looks at me and says, 'We gotta get in there.' I said, 'Okay, I'll follow you.' " He laughs. They then formed a line called a "stack" at the foot of the stairway.

"The lieutenant gets out of the way. Now, I'm the front man. I don't want to be." He laughs again. "In the citation, it says that Workman went in first every time. I'll be honest: It wasn't planned that way. . . . The lieutenant says, 'On three we're gonna go.' One, two, three. Bam! He kicks me and I go running up the stairs."

As he ran, machine-gun bullets buzzed past him, but he made it to the safety of the landing, protected from insurgent fire by a thick wall. But he was alone. Nobody had followed him.

"I remember him going up the staircase," says Kraft, who had managed to escape from the second floor after the ambush. There was a lot of confusion and the second guy in the stack sort of hesitated and that kept the rest of the stack back."

"So these guys are downstairs yelling at me, 'Get back down here.' And I'm like, 'You get up here.' I'm cussing at 'em," Workman says, smiling. "But it was a lieutenant, so I pretty much have to go down. I closed my eyes and did a Superman dive down the stairs."

The fall knocked the wind out of him. His buddies stood him back up.

They formed another stack with Workman again in front. He took off. This time, everybody followed and they reached the landing safely. They crept up another set of stairs toward the second floor. Workman had almost reached the top when a yellow grenade bounced into view.

"This thing went off and it felt like somebody hit me in the leg with a baseball bat," he says. "I look back and guys were laying down, knocked over. And I go, 'Is everybody good?' . . . Pretty much everybody got hit with shrapnel but we were all able to fight."

They climbed the stairs and fired at the insurgents, who were barricaded in a bedroom. After an intense firefight, the Marines ran low on ammunition and retreated outside to reload.

By then, two of the Marines they'd come to rescue were dead. Two other Marines dropped their bodies off a porch, then jumped down after them.

"One of the Marines comes stumbling out of this yard next to the house," Workman says. "He's covered with blood. He looked like a zombie. And he just falls over. I run up and grab him."

"Workman grabbed him and dragged him down the street while the insurgents were firing down at us from the rooftop," Kraft recalls. Workman carried the wounded Marine to a couple of Humvees, where a medical corpsman began working on him. Workman saw two other Marines sprawled in the back of a Humvee: Cpl. Raleigh Smith and Lance Cpl. Eric Hillenburg.

"Hey, doc!" he yelled. "Get up here!"

"They're all right," yelled the corpsman, who was treating the Marine that Workman had dragged to safety.

"I'm yelling, 'Doc, get your ass up here!' And he's yelling, 'They're all right, dammit, leave 'em be.' And I'm like, 'Get up here!' And he says, 'They're dead, man, they're dead.' "

Workman jumped out of the Humvee. "This was the first time I'd ever seen a dead Marine, ever," he says. "It was like somebody flipped a switch, like it wasn't even me anymore. . . . I grabbed whoever's standing around and we ran back into the house. Now it's like vengeance. I want to take as many insurgents out as possible."

The house was dark, the air heavy with smoke. Workman led another charge up the stairs and ran into another grenade.

"It knocked most of us down," he says. "At this point, none of us wants to get up. We're like, 'We're gonna die here.' My buddy, he gets up and fights and I hear this horrendous scream. They hit him with an AK47 and it literally tore the whole triceps off his arm."

Workman pulled the pin on a grenade and tossed it into the bedroom where the insurgents were barricaded, and then the Marines tumbled back downstairs.

"I collapse at the bottom of the stairs," he says. "I'm, like, done. And Major [Todd] Desgrosseilliers grabbed me by the helmet and dragged me out of the house."

All the Marines were out of the building and an M1A1 tank had arrived. It blasted the house to rubble.

At least 24 insurgents were killed in the battle. The Marines lost three men -- Smith, Hillenburg and Lance Cpl. James R. Phillips.

DOJ_NMG_0139951

"We went back to the makeshift morgue at Camp Fallujah," Workman says, "and we unloaded the bodies."A Recurring Nightmare

He's been talking for over a hour, sitting in the museum at a table in Tun's Tavern -- named for the place the Marine Corps was founded. He started out with laughs but now he's serious, his green eyes sad and tired.

"The next morning I felt like I'd been in a car accident," he says. Corpsmen had pulled some shrapnel out of him, some still remains. "Everybody was pretty much wounded. And three guys were dead. . . . Eric and James lived in the same bedroom. I went into that room and there are two empty racks. Seeing the empty cots, that's when it sank in. . . . When somebody dies, you gotta get all their belongings and take it back to base camp. You're going through the pockets in their cammies, finding pictures of their girlfriend, their mom and dad."

After a few days of rest, Workman's platoon was back out, patrolling roads and manning checkpoints outside Fallujah. They remained there until April 2005. Workman didn't see much action, but he kept busy enough that he didn't think too much about the day his buddies died.

He was promoted to sergeant and he reenlisted, requesting to become a drill instructor after his return. That spring, his platoon was back at Camp Pendleton in California.

"That's when the world came crashing down," he says. "That's when you have time to think about what really happened, that they're really gone."

Jessica, his wife, was back in Ohio, attending Nationwide Beauty Academy, studying to become a hairstylist. He was in California, partying every night.

"It's easy to self-medicate with alcohol," he says. "With Marines, you're not gonna get off the plane and say, 'I need help from a psychiatrist.' We adapt by getting drunk every night."

When he arrived at drill instructor school at Parris Island that September, he stopped drinking, he says. That's when the nightmares began:

"I would dream this: a staircase, never ending. And I'm running back and forth, being chased by insurgents, and they're throwing grenades at me. And I run and I run and I run until I finally get tired and I can't go on and they catch me and they kill me. Then I'd wake up and I'd be crying and I'd have mental pictures of my guys laying in the back of that truck."

He avoided the nightmare by avoiding sleep. All day he worked as a drill instructor, all night he paced and brooded about Iraq.

"Physically, I was a drill instructor," he says. "Mentally, I was somewhere else."

One day in the spring of 2006, he marched his recruits into the mess hall and then froze, staring into space.

"I didn't see the recruits, I didn't see anything," he recalls. "People are saying, 'Hey, what's going on?' I said, 'I don't give a [bleep] about you, I don't give a [bleep] about the recruits.' . . . I went downhill from there and they sent me to mental health."Suddenly a Hero

The doctors concluded that Workman was suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. They prescribed some pills and sent him home for 10 days.

"They wanted to get me home to be with my family to mellow out," he says.

Back in Ohio, he stayed with Jessica at her parents' house. Late one night, he got out of bed and wandered into the garage.

"He was out there for a while and I thought, 'What's he doing out there?' " Jessica remembers. "I went out there and he had my dad's rifle, and I asked him what he was doing and he said, 'I don't know why I'm here.' "

She took him inside and later that night saw him swallowing a handful of pills. "I had to literally stick my hands in his mouth and make him vomit," she recalls.

"Obviously, I probably wanted to hurt myself," Workman says. "But I don't remember much about it."

When he returned to Parris Island, he was no longer a drill instructor. Instead, he was assigned to do odd jobs, "basically like a janitor," he says.

And then he won the Navy Cross.

Suddenly, he was a hero. Reporters interviewed him. Generals posed for pictures with him. He met Donald Rumsfeld, Robert Gates, Ross Perot, Hillary Clinton and various other bigwigs. His home town declared Jeremiah Workman Day. Strangers begged to buy him a drink.

"Everybody else was more excited than I was," he says. "I was just slipping further into depression because I was reliving everything now. Everybody wants you to tell the story: How did you do it? How many people did you kill? I'm like, why don't you ask me to tell stories about my guys?"

DOJ_NMG_0139952

His guys, Smith, Phillips and Hillenburg, haunted him. He saw them in his dreams. He saw them when he looked at his Navy Cross. They got killed and he got a medal. Did that make any sense? That summer, he had their names tattooed on his back.

"This," he says, "is what I have to put in my mind to be able to wear this medal and not be ashamed: I accepted this medal for three guys who didn't make it back. So it's really theirs."

In the fall, Workman was transferred to Quantico and stationed at the new National Museum of the Marine Corps. He walks around in his uniform, talking to tourists, sometimes posing for pictures with the ones who recognize the importance of the Navy Cross ribbon on his chest.

"I'm an ambassador for the Marine Corps, I guess," he says with a laugh.

Jessica found work as a hairstylist at a nearby spa. On February 21, she gave birth to their first child, a son, Devon.

Months ago, Workman stopped taking his medicines. "I don't want to be a pill popper," he says. "But I pay for it. I have more bad days than I probably would if I was on the medication."

"I'd rather that he was still on the medications," says Jessica. "His mood swings are so much worse. He'll be fine one minute and then he's freaking out. With PTSD, you never know. It's a roller coaster every day."'You Don't Have a Choice'

When people call you a hero, what do you think?

He thinks for a moment. "Hero?" he says. "I almost laugh."

And then he does laugh. But he quickly gets serious. "Almost any infantry Marine would have done what I did. You don't have a choice. What are you gonna do? Not do it? And live for the rest of your life knowing that you hesitated and didn't act and more people may have died because you didn't do anything?"

He risked his life for his fellow Marines and that pleases him. "I did learn a lot about myself that day," he says. "In front of family and friends, you're the big tough Marine but . . . you always question yourself about whether you have what it takes in a situation like that. Not everybody does. I answered my own question that day. I was scared and I didn't want to do it, but I did it. That gives me some pride, I guess."

But that was then, he points out, and this is now. "I couldn't tell you if I could do it again," he says. "I would love to believe that every time something like that happened, I would do the same thing, but I don't know."

He does know one thing: He wants to go back to Iraq.

"I've volunteered. I've told everybody I can. Right now, they want to keep me here. . . . A lot of these high-ranking people think they know what's best for you. And in their minds, what's best for me is staying here and having a normal family life and going home every night. Whereas in my mind and in my heart, I want to get back into the fight."

He says: "A lot of my friends have been there three or four times. I think if I got one more tour over there, I'd feel better in the heart. I don't want to go down as a one-hit wonder."

Soldier Convicted Of Negligent Homicide In Iraq Shooting (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

LITTLE ROCK (AP) — An Arkansas soldier has been convicted of negligent homicide for the shooting death of a fellow guardsman in Iraq.

Spc. Daniel E. Turner was convicted Monday in Baghdad and sentenced to 15 years in a military prison, the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette reported Saturday.

He is being held at Camp Arifjan, Kuwait until his conviction is formalized, the newspaper said.

Turner was convicted for the death of Spc. Derek Plowman, 20, of Everton, Ark.

The circumstances surrounding Plowman's death have not been released by the military. The Defense Department did not immediately return a message seeking comment Saturday.

As part of a pretrial agreement, Turner also received a bad conduct discharge, forfeited pay and was reduced in rank to private.

"The forfeitures are suspended right now," said Maj. Steve Zega, 142nd judge advocate. "In other words, they're still paying him right now. I understand the reason they worked that out is he has a very young child at home."

The Charlie Battery returned home last week from its year-long deployment in Iraq.

The Warden Of Fallouja (LAT)

By Mike Carlson

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Taking charge of a detention center in Iraq? Here's what you need to remember.

DOJ_NMG_0139953

Mike Carlson served as the officer in charge of the Camp Fallouja Regional Detention Facility from March 2006 to October.[

1]

They're not prisoners, they're "detainees."

It sounds better, as if they're merely inconvenienced rather than shoehorned into cinderblock cells, thumbing their military-issued Korans and waiting to be interrogated. One-third are innocents caught up in sweeps; one-third are jihadists who will slit your throat, and one-third are opportunists who will rat out their neighbors. You will hold them for 14 days, no more, while the interrogators try to figure out who is what. Each gets a CF, for Camp Fallouja, and a four-digit number. No names will be used, mainly because numbers fit more easily onto spreadsheets. They will be forever known as entas. "Enta" means "you" in Arabic, and that's what you call them day after day, meal after meal, port-a-potty call after port-a-potty call. "Enta, ishra mai," you say, and the enta drinks his water, and if you say, "Enta, ishra mai kulak," he drinks all of his water, every drop, and holds the bottle upside down to prove it.

[2]

It's not personal.

The enta who screams "meesta!" every 10 seconds for 48 hours straight isn't doing it to infuriate you, his captor. What it boils down to is that he can't pronounce "mister," and he was carrying that 155-millimeter round in the back of his pickup, and he was going to try to blow you up, and the reason he was picked by the insurgent leaders to haul the shell is that he's soft in the head, which is why he cannot stop screaming "meesta!"

The major who watches NASCAR races on satellite TV in his air-conditioned office at the battalion headquarters while you and your Marines march entas to and from the latrines in 120-degree heat isn't doing it to antagonize you, his subordinate. Frankly, he's just over here for the retirement money, and he didn't want to be in charge of four regional detention facilities in Al Anbar province any more than you wanted to end up as the warden in Fallouja. He wants to keep his head down and forget about the fact that if one, just one, of your Marines snaps and goes Abu Ghraib on a detainee, his pension is out the window.

[3]

You won't fire your weapon in anger.

You'll fire plenty of training rounds. You'll be awakened nightly by outgoing artillery shells being blasted into the ether a mere 400 meters from your tin-can hooch, where you fall asleep to the drone of your air-conditioning unit and the faint yelps from the sergeant-next-door's porn videos.

Your fingers will ache from absently squeezing the grip of your M16A4 during endless nighttime convoys, transporting detainees from Fallouja to Abu Ghraib or Camp Cropper. The only illumination in the back of the truck will come from the red-lens flashlight you pan across the entas to make sure none of them have wormed loose from their flex cuffs and hatched a plot to kill you.

Your truck will stop one night outside Abu Ghraib. You will wait for explosive ordnance techs to clear a suspicious burlap bag. Because there are so many bombs, you never know how long you'll sit exposed on the road. During the second hour, CF-4562 will ask you in perfect English if he can pee. You will escort him to the edge of the road. When he thinks you aren't looking, 4562 will slink away from you and your rifle. You will immediately see through such a feeble escape attempt, and here, outside the site of America's shame, this enta will be one sandal step away from giving you an absolutely justifiable reason to finally click your weapon's selector off of "safe."

You will raise the muzzle slowly with muscles that ache from humping 60 pounds of body armor and ammo and water and Quick-Clot coagulant, but before your thumb moves over the safety, you will automatically say "kiff," Arabic for "stop," because it's been drilled into you as part of the rules of engagement. You will want to shoot, and 4562 will hear that in your voice. He will stop. He will manage a feeble stream of urine before you shoo him back aboard the truck.

[4]

You will be a constant target outside the wire.

A green beam of light will dazzle you through the Cyclops lens of your night-vision goggles as it streaks toward the armored sides of your truck. You will grit your teeth, and the rocket-propelled grenade will hit, and then, by the grace of some malfunction, it will only gouge out a divot from the big green plates, an errant golf swing's worth of metal. You will pan your rifle barrel across the garbage-strewn fields and pockmarked buildings, but you will see nothing, just a stray dog scurrying away from the tiny blast. A feeling of anticlimax will wash over you, of one beer short of the perfect buzz and a throw just wide of the catcher's mitt. You are a Marine and trained to kill, but you can never find any insurgents to shoot.

[5]

You will tell yourself lies about how being shot at will change you.

DOJ_NMG_0139954

You won't be able to tell your wife about the near-miss when you call home because you know she'll be worried, and when she worries, she cries, and you cannot, absolutely cannot, have her cry, mainly because it will make you cry, and you're a captain in a crowded phone center surrounded by junior Marines. Your neck will cramp up for two weeks, as if all your fears have been concentrated into a small kernel of misery somewhere north of your shoulder blade. Then, one day, the pain will be gone, and you will walk up to the side of the truck and place your fist inside the divot to remind yourself that it really happened.

[6]

You will screw up.

A sergeant will push one of your female Marines too hard during physical training, and she will turn on the waterworks and accuse him of sexual harassment. You will chew out the sergeant, but later discover that she is simply angry with him for forbidding her to visit her boyfriend in another unit.

You will apologize to the sergeant, but the incident will have cost you some of the platoon's trust, and you will find yourself hating her. She will hate you too, until she goes home early, knocked up by the very same boyfriend she was forbidden to see. You will feel a quick self-righteous high, followed by a prolonged low; your neglect of your own rule — don't take it personally — means you failed her as a leader.

[7]

You will drink water until your urine is clear.

You will drink and drink and keep drinking until you've drained more than 800 bottles of water during your stay in the Iraqi desert.

[8]

Your interpreter will be your greatest hidden ally.

Ali is rotund, aged and bearded, a prototypical Islamic authority figure. He reads the facility rules to all new detainees, his face hidden behind dark glasses and a ball cap. Your understanding of Arabic progresses to the point where you know he's adding regulations. You take him aside, and he explains that he tells the new arrivals that there are snipers in every tower, that trapdoors lurk beyond the borders of each gravel path and that attacking a Marine in the facility would result in a coward's death, voiding the promise of 72 virgins. You allow him to continue.

[9]

You won't abuse any detainees.

Your property room will hold a sniper rifle that killed a Marine and bears the fingerprints of the man inside Cell 4A. Evidence photos will show a bomb crater and bloody boots with shinbones still laced inside, and wires that lead from the crater to the home of CF-7634. As you perform your daily cell checks, you will occasionally want to smash and kick and eye gouge and palm-heel strike. But you won't. You will need to look in the mirror tomorrow when you shave.

[10]

You will get by with 20 words of Arabic.

When your prisoner-release convoy is waved into a field strewn with basketball-sized boulders by an Army lieutenant too new to speak Arabic, that will be just enough to get the entas to stop washing their feet and shouting blessings to Allah and to herd them into the civil affairs compound. Later, an 18-year-old lance corporal will fall asleep at the wheel and swerve off the Fallouja cloverleaf. As the 7-ton rumbles down the embankment, the entas will fling themselves off the truck. One enta will break his arm, and, again, your 20 words will coax him into medical treatment. Through it all — the bungled release, the accident, the medevac — you will not be attacked. Two days later, a similar convoy traveling the exact same route will be blown up by an IED, and the ache in your neck will return for another two weeks.

[11]

After seven months, you will fly home.

On the way back to the U.S., your Marines will be told by Maj. NASCAR that they can drink, and they will — to excess. You will resign yourself to breaking up the inevitable fights, and as you step between two Marines about to swing, you will realize that this has been your purpose. You set limits.

[12]

You will return to civilian life.

You will be jumpy and vaguely unsatisfied, disconnected from the civilians around you who care only about text messages and gas prices and catty e-mails. Navy doctors will find Iraqi sand trapped in the innermost pathways of your ear canals. Your wife now snores, and all her unfamiliar noises combine to drive you from your bed.

On one such night, you will turn on the television news and see that Anna Nicole Smith's death has trumped the coverage of America's 3,118th fatality, 31-year-old Petty Officer 1st Class Gilbert Minjares Jr. You will note that, at 39, Smith was younger than most of the helicopters flying in Iraq. You will turn off the TV and sit in the dark and feel your eyes water as you think about how you took 55 Marines and sailors into a combat zone and brought all 55 back home, and that no one in America besides you and those 55 really cares or understands what you went through.

DOJ_NMG_0139955

You processed 1,230 detainees, without a single incident of abuse, while America sat on the couch and watched girls go wild. As far as you know, you killed no one. This used to bother you, because killing is what Marines are trained to do. But now, after viewing documentaries and reports that paint American forces as Redcoat invaders, you take some comfort in the fact that you never pulled the trigger.

Those numbers — 55, 1,230 and 0 — will allow you to sleep tonight, and the next night, and the next. But each night you will insert a mouth guard made of silicone before you go to sleep, because your dentist informs you that you are always, always, always unconsciously grinding your teeth.

In Wartime, Who Has The Power? (NYT)

By Jeffrey Rosen

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

THE Constitution seems relatively clear. The president is the commander in chief, and he has the power to deploy troops and to direct military strategy. Congress has the power to declare war and can use its control over the purse to end a war. But it has no say over how the war is actually prosecuted.

That poses a problem for Congress, as it debates the course of the Iraq war. Democratic proposals to check President Bush's increasing unpopular war range from Senator Barack Obama's "phased redeployment" of all combat troops out of Iraq by March 3, 2008, to Representative John Murtha's attempts to impose specific standards for the training and equipping of troops.

Regardless of how these proposals fare politically, they raise serious constitutional questions that could affect not only the conduct of the Iraq war, but also the balance of power between Congress and the president in wartime.

Legal scholars — both critics and supporters of the Iraq war — say that if Congress tries to manage the deployment and withdrawal of troops without cutting funds, the president's powers as commander in chief would be encroached, perhaps leading to a constitutional confrontation of historic proportions.

"If there were to be a binding resolution that said troops had to go from 120,000 to 80,000 by April 15, Congress would be, in my view, transgressing on the conduct of a military campaign," says Samuel Issacharoff, a law professor at New York University. "Congress can't tell the president to charge up the east side of the hill rather than the west, which is the definition of the president's military authority."

So how, exactly, can Congress assert power over the war, beyond its ability simply to pull the plug on its financing? History suggests that Congress has found ways of checking the president in the past without encroaching on his power as commander in chief. And, history suggests, as well, that neither side is that eager for a constitutional showdown.

There is little dispute that Congress could, if it had the political will, end the war in Iraq tomorrow by using its power over appropriations to cut off funds to the troops. "Congress could easily check the president," says W. Taylor Reveley III, the dean of William and Mary School of Law and author of "War Powers of the President and Congress."

"If Iraq continues to go badly or if it looks like the president might actually use force in Iran, I can easily see Congress passing something like the Cambodian or Vietnam spending cutoffs, which would force the setting of a timetable for withdrawal that was pretty brisk," he said.

If Congress used its appropriations power in this way, even the most vigorous defenders of executive power agree, President Bush would have to acquiesce. "He would have to comply, and he would comply," says John Yoo, the University of California at Berkeley law professor who, as a Bush administration official, defended the president's authority to act unilaterally. According to Professor Yoo, Congress could immediately cut funds, or could order a phased withdrawal by authorizing a fixed amount of money each month for specified numbers of troops.

"The idea that the funding tool is too blunt is a view held by people who have never worked in Congress," he says. "It can be a scalpel as well as a baseball bat."

The problem is not that Congress lacks the constitutional power to cut off funds, but that it may lack the political will to do so.

"I think it's inconceivable that Congress will cut off appropriations, because no one wants to leave people on the field without support," says Michael Gerhardt of the University of North Carolina Law School.

Congress, however, has other cudgels. During the War of 1812, Federalist critics of President James Madison forced the resignation of his secretary of war, and, decades later, the House passed a resolution censuring President James Polk for unconstitutionally beginning a war with Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0139956

During the Civil War, Congressional Republicans wanted Lincoln to fire Gen. George B. McClellan and prosecute the war more aggressively. But they never tried to control actual troop movements. Instead, Congress tried to shame the Union generals into fighting by hauling them repeatedly before Congressional committees.

"It bordered on harassment, and Lincoln resisted some of the excesses, but even then, Congress never tried to issue orders about the deployment of troops," says Professor Issacharoff.

Congress, of course, could assert itself in similar ways today, according to Professor Gerhardt. "Congress is entitled to have oversight hearings to see how well things are going, and to figure out where we should go from here," he says.

Changes in technology also make it easier for Congress to micromanage military decisions if it chooses to do so. "In the 19th century, simply to send a command and find out what happened in the battle took weeks," says Professor Issacharoff. "So neither Congress nor the president could micromanage. Now you can have battlefield commanders in a speakerphone in the well of Congress — you could have 535 generals shouting instructions."

Congress would also be perfectly competent to examine civil liberties questions, like the restoration of habeas corpus for detainees held at Guantánamo Bay. It could pass resolutions opposing the war effort over Republican opposition, as Democrats have proposed to do. It could demand compliance with international norms about how the war is conducted.

But let's say Congress passed a binding resolution that reduced troop levels without actually cutting off funds. What then?

"What's likely to happen is that Congress will assert its power, and the executive will resist through delay, redeployment of troops elsewhere or simply disregarding Congress," Professor Issacharoff says. "It will never be presented to a court, because when both branches are involved in disputes about war and claim overlapping powers, the courts tend to back down."

Dean Reveley agrees. "These disputes about the powers of the president and Congress in wartime are waged with almost theological passion and conviction and the Supreme Court rarely intervenes, which is why war powers are still so murky," he says. "Every time we've gotten involved in an unpopular war, which has been all our wars except the two World Wars, there has been an enormous amount of bickering between the president and Congress when it didn't come out the way we wanted. Sometimes presidents have acted, Congress said 'Don't do that,' and the president acceded, as in Vietnam. But mostly Congress has stood on the sidelines and complained."

In other words, a constitutional crisis may not be the inevitable outcome.

"I think this will be resolved politically, as it has been in the past, and either the president or Congress will back down," Professor Issacharoff says. "My sense is that it's more likely to be Congress, because nobody wants to assume responsibility for managing a disaster."

Even if President Bush wins a constitutional confrontation, Congress may react by asserting its powers against future presidents. "Congress will be much more careful in the future about authorizing force without restrictions on presidential power," says Jack Goldsmith of Harvard Law School. "Every action on each side tends to provoke a counterreaction, which is probably what James Madison wanted."

Antiwar Caucus Wants To Be Heard Now (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 2 — About a dozen members of the Out of Iraq Congressional Caucus gathered on a sunny day last summer on the terrace outside the Capitol for a news conference. The only problem: no reporters showed up.

The members of the group, made up entirely of House Democrats, cracked jokes among themselves before heading back inside, chalking it up as another failed attempt to get noticed.

"I had 30 press conferences where no one showed up," said Representative Maxine Waters, a California Democrat who leads the 75-member caucus in the House.

Now, with a change in power in Congress and a new military strategy to increase the number of American troops in Iraq, the members of the group — most of them liberals — are suddenly much in demand, finding themselves at the center of the debate over the war.

Yet even with a majority of Americans opposing the war, the caucus is struggling to overcome its fringe image and is becoming increasingly frustrated by what its members say is the Democratic leadership's unwillingness to heed their calls for decisive action to the end the war.

At the same time, though the members are united in their desire to bring American military involvement in Iraq to a speedy end, they are still debating the best way to do so. In that sense, they reflect the broader struggle among Democrats in Congress, who have been unable to coalesce around a single position on how strongly to confront President Bush over the war.

House Democratic leaders this week seemed to back away slightly from a proposal by Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, to limit Mr. Bush's latest supplemental spending request for the war. Mr. Murtha's proposal would have required strict readiness for troops sent to Iraq, essentially limiting the president's ability to follow through on his plan to deploy an additional 21,500.

DOJ_NMG_0139957

Mr. Murtha's conditions were favored by caucus members, though it has come under fire from Republicans who labeled it a "slow bleed" strategy. The proposed strategy has also run into opposition from conservative House Democrats, who argue that their concerns need to be taken seriously because they helped deliver the Democratic majority in the midterm elections. The Murtha proposal, they said, would leave the party vulnerable to charges of abandoning troops.

"My concern, representing the state where we've got the highest percentage call-up of guard and reserve in the country, I want to make sure Congress does not do anything that hamstrings troops on the ground," said Representative Jim Matheson, a Utah Democrat who is a member of the Blue Dogs, a coalition of party moderates and conservatives.

Democratic leaders have responded to critics by floating a new plan that would allow Mr. Bush to waive the readiness standards, a possibility that has left many of the party's vocal left wing unhappy. About 30 members of the Out of Iraq Caucus met Thursday to plot strategy. They warned that they might vote against any supplemental bill that did not more strictly limit the president's options, a vote that could prove embarrassing for a Democratic leadership trying to preserve a fragile majority.

"Nothing is going to happen unless we use the power of the purse," said Representative Jerrold Nadler of New York. "It's time to draw a line in the sand."

The House minority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio, said Republicans would oppose any measure that "restricts the president's ability to win the war in Iraq."

Representative Barbara Lee, Democrat of California, a co-chairwoman of the Congressional Progressive Caucus and a founder of the Out of Iraq Caucus, is drafting an amendment that would allow financing only to protect American troops in Iraq pending a full withdrawal under a set timetable.

Assuming the supplemental bill is unsatisfactory to the caucus, war opponents are discussing whether to threaten to vote against it when it comes to a vote in the House floor in mid-March, unless the House leadership also permits a vote on the amendment from Ms. Lee.

Ms. Lee said her goal was to shift the discussion to a "fully funded withdrawal" from "cutting off funding."

"There's a distinction between cutting off funding and using the funding to begin a speedy and secure withdrawal within a specific timeframe," she said.

Created as an offshoot of the Progressive Caucus in the summer of 2005, the Out of Iraq group began with about 50 members. Its slow climb began when Mr. Murtha, an influential lawmaker and Vietnam veteran, unveiled his first plan calling for redeployment of troops in late 2005.

"The Out of Iraq Caucus grabbed onto Murtha," Ms. Waters said. "Don't forget, we were considered liberals and/or progressives that did not present a real threat to the administration, or even to the leadership."

Suddenly, though, they had Mr. Murtha's backing. The group's numbers have since swelled, and now include a third of the Democratic majority.

The roster includes nine House committee leaders. Also among its membership are Representative George Miller of California, a trusted confidant of Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, and Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, the vice-chair of the Democratic Caucus and the only member of the leadership in the group.

But many members rarely attend meetings. Some of its active members are lawmakers who play easily into Republican characterizations of some Democrats as peaceniks far from the mainstream. Ms. Lee was the lone dissenting vote in Congress against the resolution authorizing the president to use force to respond to the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001. In 2005, she co-sponsored a bill with Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio (also a caucus member), and others to create a cabinet-level office called the Department of Peace.

With such a large tent, caucus members are hardly uniform in their views. Some are pondering whether they should simply continue to be patient. Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, who heads the influential Ways and Means Committee, said he was not sure how he would vote on the supplemental measure.

He called the war "morally wrong" and said "it goes even beyond the brutality of slavery and the lynchings." At the same time, he said, Democratic leaders must be careful to carve out a consensus path.

Governing as a majority requires compromise, said Representative James P. Moran of Virginia, a caucus member who also sits on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. "Hopefully we don't have to compromise too much."

Pakistan Denies U.S. Claim Of Having Authority To Target Militants Inside Pakistan (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Pakistan vehemently denied Saturday the U.S. military's claim that coalition forces in Afghanistan have the authority to pursue Taliban fleeing across the border into Pakistani territory.

DOJ_NMG_0139958

"There is no authorization for hot pursuit of terrorists into our territory," Maj. Gen. Waheed Arshad, spokesman for the Pakistan Army, told The Associated Press on Saturday. "Whatever actions are needed to fight terrorism, we are taking them."

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry rejected an assertion by Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute, chief operations officer for the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, that his forces routinely fire on and pursue Taliban into Pakistan.

"No foreign forces are allowed to cross into our territorial border," said Ministry spokeswoman Tasnim Aslam. "Pakistan and United States are partners in the war on terror — not adversaries."

Aslam's and Arshad's comments came two days after Lute told the Senate Armed Services Committee in Washington that "we have all the authorities we need to pursue, either with (artillery) fire or on the ground, across the border."

Lute provided a detailed description of when U.S. forces can fire on and pursue insurgents across the border into the Islamic nation of Pakistan, an important ally of the U.S. in its campaign against terrorism.

However, Lute did not elaborate on whether there were restrictions on how deep into Pakistan his soldiers could go. He said the decision is based not on distance, but on the immediacy of the threat involved.

Pakistan used to be a main supporter of Afghanistan's former Taliban regime, but it switched sides after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Its forces have since arrested at least 700 al-Qaida and Taliban.

But there is growing international pressure on Pakistan to crackdown further on Taliban militants on its side of the border, a message delivered on Monday by Vice President Dick Cheney during a visit to Islamabad.

In Kabul on Saturday, Afghan Foreign Minister Rangeen Dadfar Spanta told members of Parliament that Pakistan uses terror as its foreign policy and that the international community should not reward Pakistan with aid.

"Pakistan shouldn't use terror as its foreign policy," he said. "I wish that the international community wouldn't give rewards to countries that are supporting the Taliban."

Afghan officials frequently accuse Pakistani leaders of harboring Taliban fighters and commanders, though Pakistan insists it does all it can to fight terrorism. Pakistan has deployed about 80,000 troops near Afghanistan, where al-Qaida and Taliban remnants are believed to be hiding.

Nisar A. Memon, chairman of the Pakistani Senate's Standing Committee on Defense, said his country alone would take action against militants on its side of the border, but that Afghanistan should do more from its territory.

"Pakistan has contributed more than any other country to the successes in the fight against terrorism and extremism," he said. "On the Afghanistan side, there is equal responsibility of the coalition and Afghan forces to stop undesirable elements from crossing into our territory."

During his trip, Cheney had expressed concern to President Gen. Pervez Musharraf over al-Qaida regrouping inside Pakistan's tribal regions and an expected Taliban spring offensive in neighboring Afghanistan.

Shortly after Cheney's visit, Pakistani intelligence officials said that Pakistani agents — during a raid in the southwestern city of Quetta — captured the Taliban's former defense minister Mullah Obaidullah Akhund.

Pakistan so far has not officially confirmed Akhund's arrest, although individuals with knowledge of Pakistani intelligence workings say the man was being questioned near the capital, Islamabad. Akhund is said to be a key associate of fugitive Taliban leader Mullah Omar.

Returning, Safe, After A Year's Service In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Kareem Fahim

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

FORT DIX, N.J., March 2 — In person, Specialist Lourdes Siverio looked remarkably like the picture her mother painted of her while she was away.

Her mother, Gloria Muniz, held the painting above her head on Friday as Specialist Siverio's National Guard unit marched crisply toward a reunion with loved ones. Then slowly, the painting dropped to the ground, and mother and daughter stood quietly, amid the whirl of tearful, laughing, shouting soldiers who had returned to New Jersey after more than a year in Afghanistan.

Specialist Siverio, 23, held on to Ms. Muniz with one hand. With the other, she dabbed tears from the cheek of her 13-year-old sister, Ruth Ruiz. The separation had been hard on the teenager. "It's like I've been an only child," Ruth said.

Specialist Siverio was among 80 soldiers from the 50th Personnel Services Battalion, based in Lawrenceville, who arrived at Fort Dix on Friday. Many of the returning soldiers were leaving the Guard. Others remained on active duty, and some re-enlisted.

DOJ_NMG_0139959

In Afghanistan, they had mostly engaged the enemy of paperwork, functioning as a human resources and postal division for a United States contingent of more than 21,000: they delivered the mail, tracked the promotions and kept records of time spent on leave. None were killed, and none were seriously injured.

The danger they faced was mostly on the roads, although many of them were at Bagram Air Base on Tuesday when a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the base during a visit by Vice President Dick Cheney, killing at least 23 people.

They returned on the day the Army secretary, Francis J. Harvey, resigned because of revelations about inadequate treatment of wounded soldiers at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center; and a day after a panel found that members of the National Guard and Reserve did not receive enough money or equipment, though at times they have accounted for half the soldiers in Iraq.

There was little talk of those matters outside a recreation center at Fort Dix where relatives and friends held flags and balloons, and wore T-shirts that welcomed Daddy, or A. J., or someone else. The relatives smiled nervously and hid from the wind behind posters when the bus carrying the soldiers was delayed.

"I didn't think of getting balloons," an older woman said, until she was directed inside, where there were plenty.

Specialist Rosalie Martinsen's mother, Tammy, had baked two apple pies, which sat waiting in a homey wicker basket. "It's the best, flakiest crust," said her father, Rob.

Then, with a chapel framing the background, the unit marched along a narrow road toward the whoops and hollers, and a woman screaming over and over, "That's my baby!"

Inside the recreation center, alongside the video games and pool tables, a feast of sandwiches and pasta and mashed potatoes waited on long tables.

Sgt. Erick Rodriguez, 31, with one of his four children sitting in his lap, ate slowly from a plate piled high, as more than a dozen of his relatives watched every bite as if it were the first time they had seen him eat.

"What did you miss the most?" a woman in the group asked him. He rolled his eyes, and she changed the question. "O.K. What did you miss second?"

Unlike Sergeant Rodriguez, Sgt. Dawan Ginn, 24, had no one waiting for him; his family lives in Virginia. Returning home to uncertainty about his future, he decided to re-enlist. "I basically built my life around the military," Sergeant Ginn said. Of Afghanistan, he said, "It's a kind of messed up, poor country." For half of his deployment, he had been stationed in Qatar.

Specialist Maladrique Wilson's father was working Friday night, and Specialist Wilson, standing with other soldiers near the entrance to the recreation room, understood. He had made friends in the unit, but he had also observed the strains and the fights. He saw the letters of support from schoolchildren, and he wondered why there was not more support from adults.

"Afghanistan is a process in life you have to go through with strength," Specialist Wilson said.

Specialist Samantha Nigro gave her family an equally grim assessment of Afghanistan, said her father, Joe. Specialist Nigro worked in the personnel department of the unit, where she processed identity cards. Others she knew handled death certificates.

Through Feb. 24, the number of United States military personnel killed in or around Afghanistan was 307, according to the Defense Department.

But Samantha was home. "Right now, we're ecstatic," her father said.

DOJ:

A New Mystery To Prosecutors: Their Lost Jobs (NYT)

By David Johnston, Eric Lipton, William Yardley

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 3 — After Daniel G. Bogden got the call in December telling him that he was being dismissed as the United States attorney in Nevada, he pressed for an explanation.

Mr. Bogden, who was named the top federal prosecutor in Nevada in 2001 after 11 years of working his way up at the Justice Department, asked an official at the agency's headquarters if the firing was related to his performance or to that of his office. "That didn't enter into the equation," he said he was told.

After several more calls, Mr. Bogden reached a senior official who offered an answer. "There is a window of opportunity to put candidates into an office like mine," Mr. Bogden said, recalling the conversation. "They were attempting to open a slot and bring someone else in."

The ouster of Mr. Bogden and seven other United States attorneys has set off a furor in Washington that took the Bush administration by surprise.

DOJ_NMG_0139960

Summoning five of the dismissed prosecutors for hearings on Tuesday, the newly empowered Congressional Democrats have charged that the mass firing is a political purge, intended to squelch corruption investigations or install less independent-minded successors.

Interviews with several of the prosecutors, Justice Department officials, lawmakers and others provide new details and a fuller picture of the events behind the dismissals. Like Mr. Bogden, some prosecutors believe they were forced out for replacements who could gild résumés; several heard that favored candidates had been identified.

Other prosecutors may have been vulnerable because they had had run-ins with the Justice Department, not over corruption cases against Republicans, but on less visible issues.

Paul Charlton in Arizona, for example, annoyed Federal Bureau of Investigation officials by pushing for confessions to be tape-recorded, while John McKay in Seattle had championed a computerized law enforcement information-sharing system that Justice Department officials did not want. Carol C. Lam of San Diego, who successfully prosecuted former Representative Randy Cunningham, had drawn complaints that she was not sufficiently aggressive on immigration cases.

Justice Department officials deny that the dismissals were politically motivated or that the action resulted from White House pressure.

Brian Roehrkasse, an agency spokesman, said, "These decisions were based on the individual concerns about each U.S. attorney's overall performance. This included performance concerns about ineffectively prosecuting departmental priority areas, failure to follow departmental guidelines, or just overall concerns about an ability to lead and effectively manage a U.S. attorney's office."

United States attorneys have four-year terms but can be removed at any time, and for almost any reason.

But across the country, legal and public officials have expressed dismay over the firings. In Western Michigan, for example, lawyers and a federal judge came to the defense of Margaret M. Chiara, the United States attorney there, saying she was well regarded.

"It just doesn't look right," said James S. Brady, who was United States attorney in Western Michigan during the Carter administration. "It compromises the credibility that justice is being dealt with fairly and impartially. There is a fear that politics have entered in life and death situations."

Discussions began in October at the Justice Department about removing prosecutors who were considered flawed or deficient in carrying out administration policy by law enforcement officials, lawmakers and others, several officials said. The White House eventually approved the list and helped notify Republican lawmakers before the Dec. 7 dismissals, officials said.

While Justice Department officials expected that top assistant prosecutors in each office would probably fill the jobs initially, the officials said they had not chosen permanent successors. However, officials knew that if the replacements were to have a substantial tenure before Mr. Bush left office, they needed to be named quickly.

The list of prosecutors who were targets was approved by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and the deputy attorney general, Paul J. McNulty, the day-to-day manager of the Justice Department since he was appointed in the fall of 2005.

Under Mr. Gonzales, Mr. McNulty has become a powerful deputy with a wide-ranging portfolio. He was a United States attorney in Virginia, but he worked in Congress for more than a decade and was once legal counsel to the House majority leader. He is regarded in legal circles as more attuned to policy and politics than his predecessor, James B. Comey, a former career prosecutor in New York.

That leadership change may explain the removal of prosecutors who had mostly been in place since the start of the Bush administration.

"I and my colleagues are the same people in December of 2006 that we were in 2001," said one former prosecutor who would speak only on the condition of anonymity. "The only thing that has changed is the administration of the Department of Justice. We were making the same arguments and the same points before."

Justice Department officials, who would speak about the department's decision making only anonymously because they were not authorized to discuss personnel matters publicly, now acknowledge that the dismissals were mishandled. They failed to anticipate how much attention the highly unusual group firing would draw, and the agency's contradictory accounts about whether the dismissals were performance-related helped spur suspicions.

In one case, they said that they were unaware of concerns by United States Attorney David C. Iglesias of New Mexico, which he has expressed publicly in recent days, about being pressured by two Republican lawmakers to rush indictments before last November's elections in a contract kickback investigation involving a former state Democratic official. New Mexico has three Republicans in Congress; Representative Steve Pearce has said he did not call Mr. Iglesias, while aides to Senator Pete V. Domenici and Representative Heather A. Wilson have said they would not comment.

DOJ_NMG_0139961

The Justice Department still appears to have an uphill battle in convincing lawmakers that its actions were justified. Several Congressional officials who have been briefed on the decision making said they were not persuaded that the firings were a well intended if botched effort to oust a few problem prosecutors among the country's 93 United States attorneys.

Some said they suspected that the administration hoped to install its favorites in the jobs, as they did when J. Timothy Griffin, a prosecutor who had worked for Karl Rove, the White House political adviser, was chosen as the temporary replacement for H. E. Cummins III of Arkansas. Mr. Cummins was told last summer to step down after Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel, met with Mr. Gonzales's staff on Mr. Griffin's behalf.

Even Republicans who are generally supportive of the administration expressed skepticism about the Justice Department's explanations.

Former Senator Slade Gorton of Washington said, "The administration has a perfect right to ask people to leave and appoint other ones just because they want turnover."

But he said he was unhappy that Mr. McKay, the Seattle prosecutor, was dismissed. He was very effective, Mr. Gorton said, and it was a mistake for the Justice Department to characterize the firing as performance related.

Mr. McKay, who is among the ousted prosecutors who have been summoned to testify before Congress, has said little about his dismissal. In interviews this week, officials in Seattle said he was a strong advocate for the expansion of law enforcement powers under the USA Patriot Act and a determined prosecutor who reorganized the office and allowed senior assistants to focus on complex cases.

"Institutions need to go through a period of renewal to be energized," said Norm Maleng, the King County prosecuting attorney. "That's what John did. He took it to a higher level."

Jeffrey C. Sullivan, who served as chief of criminal investigations under Mr. McKay and hopes to succeed him, said he was asked by the Justice Department to describe how the office had enacted "the attorney general's priorities." He said he responded that Mr. McKay created drug and gang task forces and pursued antiterrorism initiatives.

Mr. McKay had led efforts to start a computer system allowing law enforcement officials in the Seattle region to collect and analyze crime data. The program helped make him popular in local law enforcement circles, but his associates believed that Justice Department and F.B.I. officials in Washington objected, believing that such efforts should be undertaken on the national level.

Many Republicans and law enforcement officials in Washington say they are puzzled about the dismissal of Mr. McKay, whose brother is a former United States attorney in Seattle who was the state vice chairman of Mr. Bush's 2004 campaign.

Chris Vance, a former chairman of the state Republican Party, said some conservative activists were upset when Mr. McKay did not pursue a voter fraud investigation after a close election for governor was won by a Democrat in 2004, but that none of them had influence with the White House. Mr. Vance said in consulting with national party leaders at the time, Mr. McKay was not mentioned.

"They never said to me, 'Why isn't John McKay doing something?' " he said. "That never came up."

Justice Department officials said they regarded Mr. Bogden as competent but insufficiently aggressive, although they acknowledge that his removal was a tough call.

Mr. Bogden, whose last day was Wednesday, remains bitter about his dismissal. A Justice Department official said Mr. Bogden's conversation with the agency official who told him he was being moved out to make way for someone new was an effort to express sympathy for his situation, not an indication that his successor had already been chosen.

"You would think that you would be evaluated on your record, what your office has been able to achieve and what you have been able to accomplish as a United States attorney," Mr. Bogden said. "You hear something like that, there is a sense of disbelief."

JOHN L. SMITH: Patriot Act Lets Politics Trump Professionalism With U.S. Attorney's Firing (LVRJ)

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 4, 2007

How quickly they forget.

On a rainy Tuesday morning in August 2003, Attorney General John Ashcroft came to the Lloyd D. George U.S. Courthouse to address members of the U.S. attorney's office on the importance of teamwork in implementing the USA Patriot Act.

At Ashcroft's side that day was his loyal soldier in the war on terrorism, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden. A career federal prosecutor, Bogden was so square he squeaked. Despite the numerous constitutional concerns over the Patriot Act's use, in a post-9/11 world Ashcroft received rousing support from his troops in the Southern Nevada office.

"You are the doers," Ashcroft said. "You are the achievers. You are the soldiers ... on the ground and in the trenches ... who put your lives on the line to defend life and liberty. Your spirit is the heroic spirit we saw on September 11th, when New York's finest and New York's bravest ran up the stairs of the World Trade Center while others were running down the stairs."

Bogden appeared so devoted to the prevailing cause, in fact, that civil libertarians questioned his office's use of the Patriot Act to retrieve bank documents in the FBI's public corruption investigation of members of the Clark County Commission. It was believed then to be an unprecedented use of an act touted as essential to fighting the war on terrorism.

Ridiculed by some, Bogden took one for the team as his office moved methodically, if not always successfully, to prosecute corrupt politicians, warring bikers, drug traffickers, topless bar wiseguys and criminals of every stripe.

During his five-year tenure, which ended last week after his unceremonious sacking by the Department of Justice, some colleagues questioned his decisions, but no one questioned his competence. He was a professional, a public servant in the best sense of the words.

Now the 51-year-old Bogden is one of a half dozen terminated U.S. attorneys from around the West in what stacks up as a nakedly political and brazenly hypocritical move by the Bush administration and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. What some critics recently called a glorified attempt at GOP résumé-building by the administration has backfired into one of the most embarrassing moments in recent Department of Justice history.

Those looking for a good reason for Bogden's ouster won't find one. In fact, his office is credited with taking big risks by pursuing public corruption cases -- worthy work that in Southern Nevada's recent past often resulted in the vicious lambasting of federal prosecutors and FBI agents.

Ironically, a provision of the Patriot Act allows Gonzales to easily replace U.S. attorneys who are nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate.

Those loyal soldiers put their careers on the line. Now they have been reminded that, beyond all the impassioned rhetoric and all the talk about making the world a safer place, there's someone above them itching to play politics.

They are the doers, the achievers, the soldiers.

And they are expendable.

I caught up with Bogden last week as he packed his office. Although he chose his words carefully, there's no question he was stinging from the insult after spending more than five years piling up convictions despite substantial staffing shortages.

"I've had my hands full," Bogden said. "It has been a 24-7 job. You fight the good fight. We've been able to at least get Washington to recognize our need for more resources."

Even as he cleared off his desk, he was left wondering why he'd been targeted for termination.

"I've never been told a reason why, and I guess that's one of those things that's hardest to deal with," Bogden said. "It would be nice to get an answer. ... I'd be a liar if I tell you it hasn't been an emotional time."

Now Bogden's capable assistant, Steven Myhre, will fill in as the acting U.S. attorney in an office obviously in turmoil.

On that August morning in 2003, Ashcroft invoked dramatic images of Sept. 11 and said, "It has transformed the mission of the Justice Department."

Was this what he had in mind?

The terminations also make a liar out of Gonzales when he talks about how "our commitment to the rule of law allows ordinary citizens to rely on and expect ... honesty of government officials."

What could be less honest than playing politics with top federal prosecutors?

John L. Smith's column appears Sunday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday. E-mail him at Smith@reviewjournal.com or call 383-0295.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Doubts Rise As States Hold Sex Offenders After Prison Terms (NYT)

By Monica Davey, Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

The decision by New York to confine sex offenders beyond their prison terms places the state at the forefront of a growing national movement that is popular with politicians and voters. But such programs have almost never met a stated purpose of treating the worst criminals until they no longer pose a threat.

About 2,700 pedophiles, rapists and other sexual offenders are already being held indefinitely, mostly in special treatment centers, under so-called civil commitment programs in 19 states, which on average cost taxpayers four times more than keeping the offenders in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0139963

In announcing a deal with legislative leaders on Thursday, Gov. Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, suggested that New York's proposed civil commitment law would "become a national model" and go well beyond confining the most violent predators to also include mental health treatment and intensive supervised release for offenders.

"No one has a bill like this, nobody," said State Senator Dale M. Volker, a Republican from western New York and a leading proponent in the Legislature of civil confinement.

But in state after state, such expectations have fallen short. The United States Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of the laws in part because their aim is to furnish treatment if possible, not punish someone twice for the same crime. Yet only a small fraction of committed offenders have ever completed treatment to the point where they could be released free and clear.

Leroy Hendricks, a convicted child molester in Kansas, finished his prison term 13 years ago, but he remains locked up at a cost to taxpayers in that state of $185,000 a year — more than eight times the cost of keeping someone in prison there.

Mr. Hendricks, who is 72 and unsuccessfully challenged his confinement in the Supreme Court, spends most days in a wheelchair or leaning on a cane, because of diabetes, circulation ailments and the effects of a stroke. He may not live long enough to "graduate" from treatment.

Few ever make such progress: Nationwide, of the 250 offenders released unconditionally since the first law was passed in 1990, about half of them were let go on legal or technical grounds unrelated to treatment.

Still, political leaders, like those in New York, are vastly expanding such programs to keep large numbers of rapists and pedophiles off the streets after their prison terms in a response to public fury over grisly sex crimes.

In Coalinga, Calif., a $388 million facility will allow the state to greatly expand the offenders it holds to 1,500. Florida, Minnesota, Nebraska, Virginia and Wisconsin are also adding beds.

At the federal level, President Bush has signed a law offering money to states that commit sex offenders beyond their prison terms, and the Justice Department is creating a civil commitment program for federal prisoners.

Even with the enthusiasm among politicians, an examination by The New York Times of the existing programs found they have failed in a number of areas:

¶Sex offenders selected for commitment are not always the most violent; some exhibitionists are chosen, for example, while rapists are passed over. And some are past the age at which some scientists consider them most dangerous. In Wisconsin, a 102-year-old who wears a sport coat to dinner cannot participate in treatment because of memory lapses and poor hearing.

¶The treatment regimens are expensive and largely unproven, and there is no way to compel patients to participate. Many simply do not show up for sessions on their lawyers' advice — treatment often requires them to recount crimes, even those not known to law enforcement — and spend their time instead gardening, watching television or playing video games.

¶The cost of the programs is virtually unchecked and growing, with states spending nearly $450 million on them this year. The annual price of housing a committed sex offender averages more than $100,000, compared with about $26,000 a year for keeping someone in prison, because of the higher costs for programs, treatment and supervised freedoms.

¶Unlike prisons and other institutions, civil commitment centers receive little standard, independent oversight or monitoring; sex among offenders is sometimes rampant, and, in at least one facility, sex has been reported between offenders and staff members.

¶Successful treatment is often not a factor in determining the relatively few offenders who are released; in Iowa, of the nine men let go unconditionally, none had completed treatment or earned the center's recommendation for release.

¶Few states have figured out what to do when they do have graduates ready for supervised release. In California, the state made 269 attempts to find a home for one released pedophile. In Milwaukee, the authorities started searching in 2003 for a neighborhood for a 77-year-old offender, but have yet to find one.

Supporters of the laws offer no apologies for their shortcomings, insisting that the money is well spent. Born out of the anguish that followed a handful of high-profile sex crimes in the 1980s, the laws are proven and potent vote-getters that have withstood constitutional challenges.

"There has to be a process in place that prevents someone from rejoining society if they're still dangerous," said Jeffrey Klein, a Democratic member of the New York State Senate who has pushed for civil confinement there.

Martin Andrews, 47, of Woodbridge, Va., who was abducted, buried in a box and repeatedly sexually assaulted for a week when he was 13, also supports the laws.

"If they can't control themselves," Mr. Andrews said, "we need to do it for them."

But the myriad problems have concerned some advocates for victims of sexual abuse, who suggest the money is being wasted and that other options for dealing with dangerous sex offenders — such as giving them longer prison terms, preventing sentencing deals with prosecutors and mandating treatment during incarceration — would be more effective.

DOJ_NMG_0139964

"Civil commitment is a huge, huge assignment of resources," said Anne Liske, the former executive director of the New York State Coalition Against Sexual Assault, a victims' advocacy group. "This wholesale warehousing — without using the proper assessment tools and with throwing treatment in when they are not people who can be treated — has already proven not to be working, so why would we do it more?"

A Series of Convictions

Leroy Hendricks was a likely candidate for commitment as he prepared to leave a Kansas prison in 1994.

Mr. Hendricks's most recent crime, for which he had been convicted a decade earlier, had been "indecent liberties" with two 13-year-old boys in an electronics shop where he worked. All told, his convictions left a painful trail reaching back to 1955: exposing himself to young girls; molesting 7- and 8-year-old boys at a carnival where he was the ride foreman; molesting a 7-year-old girl; playing strip poker with a 14-year-old girl; preying on his own family members, including a boy with cerebral palsy.

Like Mr. Hendricks was, thousands of soon-to-be-released prisoners are screened for commitment each year by state corrections departments, prosecutors and panels. The process varies widely from state to state, as do standards for the evaluators, but in most states, those recommended for commitment have trials before judges or juries.

Mr. Hendricks may have sealed his own fate when he testified in 1994 that he could not "control the urge" to molest when he got "stressed out." He said his mother, Violet, had wanted a girl when he was born and had dressed him as one when he was growing up.

"I sure don't want to hurt anybody again," he told the court, but then conceded that he could not ensure the safety of children in his presence. "The only way to guarantee that is to die," he said.

More often, these cases come down to contentious duels between psychologists over how best to analyze an offender's history and likelihood of repeating crimes. In most states, commitment is for an indefinite period, but offenders are allowed to have their cases reviewed by a court periodically.

The results of the screening process are inconsistent. Some offenders are passed up for civil confinement, only to commit vicious crimes again; others' physical ailments alone make them unlikely repeat predators.

Even though Minnesota prison officials had classified Alfonso Rodriguez Jr., a convicted rapist, in a category of sex offenders most at risk to commit more crimes, Mr. Rodriguez went home when his term ended in May 2003. That November, he kidnapped and killed Dru Sjodin, a North Dakota college student who was beaten and raped.

Likewise, Jerry Buck Inman was charged with raping and strangling a college student in South Carolina last June, nine months after his release from a Florida prison after serving 17 years for rape and other crimes. The authorities in Florida looked at his records but decided not to seek commitment.

Meanwhile, some prosecutors seek commitment for others convicted of noncontact crimes like public exposure. In Florida, prosecutors tried unsuccessfully to civilly commit a man who was imprisoned for driving drunk even though his last sex arrest was decades earlier.

"The population that is being detained is a very, very mixed group," said Richard Wollert, a psychologist in Portland, Ore., who evaluates civilly committed offenders. "There are cases that are appalling in terms of being kept in custody at the taxpayers' expense when there are probably alternative placements for them."

Predicting who is likely to commit future sex crimes has become more of a science over the last decade, but many still find the methods questionable.

Actuarial formulas — akin to the tables used for life insurance — play a central role in deciding who is dangerous enough to be committed. They calculate someone's risk of offending again by looking at factors such as the number of prior sex offenses and the sex of the victims. Men with male victims are graded as higher risk, for example, because statistics show they are more often repeat offenders.

"The danger is that these numbers will blind people," said Eric Janus, a professor at William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul who has challenged Minnesota's civil commitment law in court.

Politics and emotion also factor heavily into who gets committed, with decisions made by elected judges or juries who may be more affected by the raw facts of someone's offense history or the public spectacle over their crimes than the dry science of risk prediction.

"It's so emotional for them," said Stephen Watson, an assistant public defender who represented an offender in Florida. "They don't even want to hear the research."

New Laws Follow Publicized Cases

Earlier in the 20th century, many states had sexual psychopath laws that allowed them to hospitalize offenders deemed too sick for prison. But by the 1980s most such laws had been repealed or fallen into disuse.

DOJ_NMG_0139965

But a handful of horrific and highly publicized cases in the 1980s and '90s spurred lawmakers to act again. Washington State adopted the first civil commitment law in 1990 after men with predatory histories killed a young woman in Seattle and sexually mutilated a boy in Tacoma.

After state courts upheld Washington's law, Kansas, Minnesota and Wisconsin passed versions in 1994, followed by California in 1996.

Then, in a 5-to-4 decision in 1997, the United States Supreme Court found civil commitment to be constitutional in Kansas v. Hendricks, the same Mr. Hendricks still confined in Kansas.

In the ruling, the justices found that a "mental abnormality" like pedophilia was enough to meet a standard to qualify someone for commitment, not the different standard of "mental illness" that had been traditionally used. The court also rejected the notion that civil commitment amounted to double jeopardy (a second criminal punishment for a single crime) or an ex post facto law (a new punishment for a past crime), noting that Kansas's statute was not meant to punish committed men but, like other acceptable civil commitment statutes, intended "both to incapacitate and to treat" them therapeutically.

"We have never held that the Constitution prevents a state from civilly detaining those for whom no treatment is available, but who nevertheless pose a danger to others," Justice Clarence Thomas wrote for the majority, later adding, "By furnishing such treatment, the Kansas Legislature has indicated that treatment, if possible, is at least an ancillary goal of the act, which easily satisfies any test for determining that the act is not punitive."

Since then, state officials, civil liberties advocates and lawyers have wrestled with exactly what that treatment requirement means.

"There's no question about it," Professor Janus of William Mitchell College said, "it's a very murky area of the law."

Since the Hendricks ruling, the courts have indicated that states have "wide latitude" when it comes to treatment for the civilly confined, meaning that unsuccessful treatment alone or an untreatable patient would not be enough to undo the laws.

In 2001, the Supreme Court, in Seling v. Young, decided the case of Andre Brigham Young, a committed man in Washington State who argued that the conditions he was being held under were so punitive and the treatment so inadequate as to amount to a second criminal sentence. The court ruled against Mr. Young.

A year later, in 2002, the Supreme Court made clear the limits of who may be committed by states, saying the authorities must prove not just that an offender is still dangerous and likely to commit more crimes but also that he or she has a "serious difficulty in controlling behavior."

Some civil libertarians and prisoner advocates, who still object to the laws, have not given up on finding a challenge that the Supreme Court might view favorably. Despite the court rulings, these groups insist civil commitment amounts to a second sentence for a crime.

Even the look of commitment centers reflects the dichotomy at the core of their stated reason for being — to lock away dangerous men (only three women are civilly committed) but also to treat them.

Most of the centers tend to look and feel like prisons, with clanking double doors, guard stations, fluorescent lighting, cinder-block walls, overcrowded conditions and tall fences with razor wire around the perimeters.

Bedroom doors are often locked at night, and mail is searched by the staff for pornography or retail catalogs with pictures of women or children. Most states put their centers in isolated areas. Washington State's is on an island three miles offshore in Puget Sound.

Yet soothing artwork hangs at some centers, and cheerful fliers announce movie nights and other activities. The residents can wander the grounds and often spend their time as they please in an effort to encourage their cooperation, including sunbathing in courtyards and sometimes even ordering pizza for delivery. The new center in California will have a 20,000-book library, badminton courts and room for music and art therapy.

Diseases like hepatitis and diabetes are common among the committed, and severe mental illness — beyond the mental "abnormalities" described by the Supreme Court — a scourge. A survey in 2002 found that 12 percent of committed sex offenders suffered from serious psychiatric problems like schizophrenia and bipolar disorder.

Most severely mentally ill men cannot participate in sex offender treatment and receive few services besides medication. Verwayne Alexander, a self-described paranoid schizophrenic who has been detained at the Florida Civil Commitment Center since 2003, has sliced himself so many times with razor blades that a guard often watches him around the clock, lawyers said. Mr. Alexander has sought unsuccessfully to be moved to a psychiatric hospital.

Those who choose to participate in sex offender treatment spend an average of less than 10 hours a week doing so, but the hours differ vastly from state to state. The structure of therapy, too, varies widely, a reflection, perhaps, of the central question still looming in the field: Can treatment ever really work for these offenders?

Admitting to previous crimes is a crucial piece of a broad band of treatment, known as relapse prevention, that is used in at least 15 states and has been the most widely accepted model for about 20 years.

DOJ_NMG_0139966

Some of the institutions, too, devote time to other therapies and activities that seem to have little bearing on sexual offending. In Pennsylvania, young residents take classes to improve their health and social habits called "Athlete's Foot," "Lactose Intolerance," "Male Pattern Baldness," "Flatulence" and "Proper Table Manners."

In California, they can join a Brazilian drum ensemble or classes like "Anger Management Through Art Therapy" and "Interpersonal Skills Through Mural Making."

But many of those committed get no treatment at all for sex offending, mainly by their own choice. In California, three-quarters of civilly committed sex offenders do not attend therapy. Many say their lawyers tell them to avoid it because admission of past misdeeds during therapy could make getting out impossible, or worse, lead to new criminal charges.

For those who decline treatment — sometimes including hundreds of "detainees" awaiting commitment trials — boredom, resentment and hostility to those in treatment lead to trouble. Some sneak in drugs, alcohol and cellphones, sometimes with the help of staff members, or beat up other residents, sometimes coercing them into having sex.

"There's rampant sexuality going on in there," said Natalie Novick Brown, a psychologist who has evaluated 250 men at Florida's center.

The people who run civil commitment centers say that a constant, nagging question hangs over them: How to keep order while not treating argumentative, sometimes violent offenders like prisoners? The low-level staff members are not prison guards and tend to be poorly educated, trained and paid. Their job titles — in Illinois, security therapy aide — reflect the awkward balance they must achieve between security and therapy.

Because civil commitment centers are neither prisons nor traditional mental health programs, no specialized oversight body exists. None has been created, in part because its base of financial support, the 19 civil commitment programs around the country, would be too small, several experts who study the programs said. But the need, they said, is urgent.

"They ought to be reviewed by an independent entity with the highest possible standards," said Dr. Fred Berlin, founder of the Johns Hopkins Sexual Disorders Clinic in Baltimore.

Few Signs of Progress

Around the country, relatively few committed sex offenders finish treatment and are released.

"Every year I go to his hearing, and every year there's no progress in his case," said Armand R. Cingolani III, a lawyer with a client in Pennsylvania who was committed in 2004 after being adjudicated as a juvenile for sexual assault on two different minors. "It doesn't seem that anyone gets better."

Nearly 3,000 sex offenders have been committed since the first law passed in 1990. In 18 of the 19 states, about 50 have been released completely from commitment because clinicians or state-appointed evaluators deemed them ready. Some 115 other people have been sent home because of legal technicalities, court rulings, terminal illness or old age.

In discharging offenders, Arizona, the remaining state, has been the exception. That state has fully discharged 81 people; there, the facility's director said records were not available to indicate the reason for those discharges.

An additional 189 people have been released with supervision or conditions (excluding Texas, where there is no commitment center and those committed are treated only as outpatients). And an additional 68 (including 58 in Arizona) are in a higher, "transitional" phase of the program, but still technically committed and often living on state land.

The backlogs have led to an aging population. Inside many facilities, wheelchairs, walkers, high blood pressure and senility are increasingly expensive concerns. Florida's center filled 229 prescriptions for arthritis medication one recent month, and 300 for blood pressure and other heart problems.

More than 400 of the men in civil commitment are 60 or older, and a number of studies indicate a significant drop in the recidivism rate for this group, many of whom have health problems after years in prison. David Thornton, treatment director of Wisconsin's center and an expert on recidivism rates, said the decline was increasingly well-documented.

The growth of the committed population has become a political quagmire. No legislator wants to insist on the release of sex offenders, but few are able to swallow the mounting costs of civil commitment. The costs of aging and sick offenders, such as Mr. Hendricks in Kansas, are especially high in part because of their special needs and physical ailments.

From 2001 to 2005, the price of civil commitment in Kansas leapt to nearly $6.9 million from $1.2 million, a state audit there found. "Unless Kansas is willing to accept a higher level of risk and release more sexual predators from the program," the audit said, "few options exist to curb the growth of the program."

But as more states consider granting some offenders supervised release, the cost is turning out to be nearly as prohibitive.

For $1.7 million, Washington converted a warehouse in Seattle into a home for men on conditional release. It has 26 cameras monitoring residents, a dozen workers, a surveillance booth overseeing the living area and a 1,700-pound magnetic door.

Two men live there so far.

DOJ_NMG_0139967

With the logjams and frustrations mounting, many states have lengthened prison sentences for sex offenders. Virginia last year increased the minimum sentence for certain sexual acts against children to 25 years, from 10, though it also sharply expanded the number of crimes that qualify an offender for civil commitment.

Ida Ballasiotes, whose daughter's rape and murder in 1988 helped spur the first civil commitment law, in Washington State, said that no sexual predator should walk free and that longer prison sentences should "absolutely" be considered.

"I don't believe they can be treated, period," Ms. Ballasiotes said.

After Release, Objections

Even for those sex offenders considered safe enough to be released, going home is no simple process. Kansas authorities decided two years ago that Mr. Hendricks, who was the first person that state committed under its law and who after a decade had progressed to one of the highest phases of treatment, should be moved from Larned State Hospital to a group home in a community where he would be watched around the clock.

Mr. Hendricks would not be allowed onto the home's porch or patio without an escort, according to court documents. Besides, his medical problems, including poor hearing and eyesight, meant he could not walk down the 40-yard gravel driveway outside the house without falling, the documents said.

But as with many men with his history, the community balked. In California, so many towns object to men leaving civil commitment that some of those released have to live in trailers outside prisons.

"You can't just sneak them in," said John Rodriguez, a recently retired deputy director in the California Department of Mental Health. "You've got hearings, the court announces it, it's all over the press."

In Mr. Hendricks's case, residents of Lawrence, where he was initially to be moved, collected petitions. "You can tell me that he's old, but as long as he can move his hands and his arms, he can hurt another child," said Missi Pfeifer, 37, a mother of three who led the petition drive with her two sisters and mother.

Then officials in Leavenworth County, picked as an alternative, said the choice violated county zoning laws. Mr. Hendricks lasted two days there, in a house off a road not far from a pasture of horses, before a judge ordered him removed.

State officials said they had no choice but to move Mr. Hendricks back to a facility on the grounds of a different state hospital, where he still is.

Through a spokeswoman for the state Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, Mr. Hendricks declined to speak to The New York Times.

Two years ago, he told The Lawrence Journal-World that he would be living in a group home "if somebody hadn't opened their damn mouth," adding, "I'm stuck here till something happens, and I don't know when that will be."

Crime's 'Mr. Untouchable' Emerges From Shadows (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

The 74-year-old man who used to be Leroy Nicholas Barnes, owner of 60 pairs of custom-made shoes, 27 full-length leather coats and more than one Mercedes-Benz, wears baggy Lee dungarees these days and drives to work in a used car he bought five years ago.

With his slight limp and mostly bald pate, he seems the antithesis of his former persona as Mr. Untouchable, the dashing Harlem heroin dealer who posed 30 years ago on a magazine cover in a blue denim suit and a red, white and blue tie.

Mr. Barnes's posture of smug invulnerability so affronted President Jimmy Carter that he ordered his attorney general to, as they say, prosecute Mr. Barnes to the fullest extent of the law.

The Justice Department did just that. And in 1977, Mr. Barnes — a former addict with a junior high education who made a fortune flooding black neighborhoods with heroin and swaggered around as an invincible outlaw — was sentenced to life in prison without parole.

"He was the No. 1; he had charisma," said Sterling Johnson Jr., a federal judge and former special narcotics prosecutor in New York City. "Have you been in the presence of Bill Clinton when he walks down the street? That was Nicky Barnes."

While Mr. Barnes, widely known as Nicky, languished behind bars, though, his former cronies, his wife and his girlfriends began cavorting, he said, squandering the criminal enterprise that had made them all millionaires. So much for honor among thieves. Mr. Barnes felt betrayed.

"They had a sleeping lion, a caged lion," he recalled, "and they woke him up." And so Mr. Barnes roared, so ferocious a government witness that scores of drug dealers were convicted. He was released into the federal witness protection program in 1998.

And then he disappeared.

DOJ_NMG_0139968

Years ago, a former associate predicted how difficult it would be for Mr. Barnes to adjust to a life of anonymity if he ever turned informer and was granted a fresh identity.

"If he runs a Laundromat in Dubuque or a grocery store in Slippery Rock, that's one thing," the associate said. "But the man has a tremendous amount of charisma and intelligence. I don't think he's going to be innocuous anywhere."

For nearly a decade, though, Mr. Barnes says, he has managed to seamlessly insinuate himself into mainstream America, this time untouchable by those he incriminated and the friends and families of foes he murdered.

"A lot of people think I'm dead," he says. "The anonymity that cloaks middle America is the life I'm comfortable with, and what I want to be."

Last weekend, though, Mr. Barnes surfaced briefly, and pseudonymously, to promote a new book about his old life in the feral 1970s, "Mr. Untouchable," written with Tom Folsom. This summer, he will appear in a documentary with the same name and later this year a movie, "American Gangster," is to be released. It stars Cuba Gooding Jr. as Mr. Barnes, but, to his exasperation, focuses on his chief rival in Harlem's heroin trade, Frank Lucas.

The dapper Nicky Barnes that audiences will see bears little resemblance to the man he says he has become, a grandfather who puts in solid 40-hour weeks at an undisclosed job, who lives in a white neighborhood in an undisclosed state, and who matter-of-factly takes home doggie bags from restaurants.

"Nicky Barnes is not around anymore," he said. "Nicky Barnes's lifestyle and his value system is extinct. I left Nicky Barnes behind."

Money is a common denominator between his lives past and present. Once he made so much that he worried about how to dispose of it. Now, he says he needs more to survive.

"I live within my paycheck," he said. "I want to get up every day and get in the car and go to work and be a respected member of my community. And I am respected. I know I am. I'm not looking in the rear view mirror to see if anyone is tailing me anymore. I don't turn on the blender when I'm at home so I can talk. That is not a part of my life. Sure, I'd love to have more money, but I am not willing to do anything but go to my job to get it."

Except sell some of the secrets of his old life.

He agreed to be interviewed, but not photographed, by The New York Times, as he was for its earlier magazine cover, somewhere in middle America. He would not divulge much about his new identity.

His mission, he insisted, was not some late-life effort to stroke his ego, seek vindication or arrange redemption. He just wants to make a buck off his autobiography.

"Ego? That's not what I need, not with gas at $3," he said. "I need bank, and this is my only way to get it."

The millions he made and squandered, he said, are gone.

"I miss it," he said. "There was glamour, money, influence, attractive women. I didn't have any financial concerns, and I do have them now. I'm concerned about being able to retire at some point comfortably. That's my principal concern."

He said he received no subsidy from the government for his cooperation. (His profits from the book might yet be diverted to his victims under the Son of Sam law in New York.)

Mr. Barnes is still on probation, which means he has to submit to a monthly urine test for drugs. He must regularly show his pay stubs to federal marshals and account for any expense over $500.

A former altar boy, he converted to Islam in prison. There he earned a bachelor's degree and taught fellow inmates math in a language they could understand: "Suppose you stick up someone and get away with X..." Nowadays, he doesn't believe in much, he says, but neither drinks nor smokes and plays by the government's rules.

"I look over my shoulder," he said. "I worry. I want to fly under the radar."

He lives in a middle-class neighborhood. So many of his neighbors are white that Mr. Barnes, who has not undergone plastic surgery, did not worry they would be watching when his criminal career was profiled recently on Black Entertainment Television.

"Everybody gets up, gets in their cars and goes to work," he said of his neighbors. "There's nobody with 20 pounds of heroin in their car."

He watches basketball on television and loved "Little Miss Sunshine." He has started writing rap lyrics and looks forward to spending time with his grandchildren. He can coolly recount drug deals with the Mafia and what he says were police payoffs.

But raise the right subject and, in a flash, Mr. Barnes can rip off the mask of frumpy respectability and transmogrify into a spitting, expletive-spewing image of the old days. Ask him, for example, whether he was ever framed by law enforcement.

"This case right here! This case right here!" he explodes. "The Constitution doesn't allow prosecutors to convict people because they're doing something morally wrong. Yeah, I was a drug dealer and I was doing everything they said I was doing. But they didn't catch me at it. I'm not saying I was innocent. I'm saying with all I was doing they could not get a conviction without a contrivance."

DOJ_NMG_0139969

Mr. Barnes said federal agents eavesdropping on his associates had mistakenly transcribed "payroll" as "kilo."

He remains furious that while he was imprisoned some of his former confederates consorted with his wife and girlfriends. But hadn't he been a womanizer himself?

"The issue was the bond that we had among us," he replied. "Don't evaluate my moral character and start splitting eyelashes."

His autobiography is dedicated to Guy Fisher, a former associate serving a life sentence in federal prison, with this unambiguous message: "When you finish the last page, I want you to look up, see where I put you and ask yourself, was it worth it? Ask yourself that every day until you die."

Mr. Barnes's story, indeed, is much more about revenge than redemption. He is a captivating conversationalist, but not a particularly sympathetic character. He unabashedly, though not necessarily proudly, admits to destroying lives, peddling heroin, committing murder, contributing to police corruption and informing on his confederates.

He was doomed to die in prison until he agreed to cooperate. After that, Rudolph W. Giuliani, a former United States attorney, was among those who intervened to get him out of prison and into witness protection.

Is there anything worse than being an informer?

"Being in prison for the rest of your life," Mr. Barnes said sharply. "I'd rather be out as a witness than be in there and what they characterize as a stand-up guy."

"I'm out," he said. "They're in."

In the new documentary, one former associate, Frank James, urges Mr. Barnes to deliver a positive message to black youth and to admit that what he did was wrong. "Frank is right," Mr. Barnes said. "I knew it was wrong then. I did it for money."

He said he opposed the legalization of drugs, not because that would be bad for business, but rather because making them readily available would kill more blacks. "It would increase the number of addicts in the inner-city community," he said.

He was matter of fact, though, in discussing how he would react if someone sold his family drugs. "It's not that person's fault," Mr. Barnes said. "Let's say I launched a crusade and killed 10 drug dealers. The user would find an 11th."

Mr. Barnes said his two daughters, who were raised in foster care after he was imprisoned, knew about his former life. His grandchildren do not.

A female friend doesn't know about his past either. "I don't think I could tell her, she wouldn't understand," he said. "That's how I know it won't be a long-term thing. For it to be a long-term thing, I think I would have to be able to tell her the truth about my past, and I can't."

After dinner in a crowded restaurant, it was time for Mr. Barnes to return to his life of mundane routines and aging secrets. He politely asked the waitress to pack up his leftover grilled salmon. She handed him a foam container.

"In the old days," he acknowledged, "I would've been embarrassed."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI To Look At Deaths From Jim Crow Era (RNO)

By Mandy Locke, Staff Writer

Raleigh News & Observer, March 4, 2007

Agents will peer into past for clues in possible 'racially motivated' killings

Federal Bureau of Investigation agents received a tall order last week when they were asked to take a close look at the deaths of three North Carolina men a half century ago.

The names of three men who died during the height of the civil rights era landed on the desks of field agents in Charlotte last week as federal Justice Department officials promised to crack open a batch of cold cases flagged by the Southern Poverty Law Center in Alabama.

The center has collected information since the late 1980s on what it feared were "racially motivated" homicides that were never resolved, said Andrew Blejwas, the center's communications coordinator.

Ken Lucas, spokesman for the FBI in Charlotte, said agents will scratch at the three cases, hoping to turn up evidence that allows them to prosecute after these many years. It's not clear how much the cases were investigated at the time, if at all.

In Shelby, many older black residents still remember Dr. George Singleton, who was killed in an explosion and fire in his office in 1957.

Details are skimpy for the other two cases. Both men -- William Dallas Owens of New Bern and Clarence Cloninger of Gaston, outside Roanoke Rapids -- died while in jail.

DOJ_NMG_0139970

Owens died of a skull fracture in 1957; Cloninger didn't get medical treatment after suffering a heart attack in 1960, his wife complained at the time.

Lucas knows little more about the men. He said despite the media attention the cases received last week, it would take a solid piece of evidence for agents to launch a full-blown investigation of a 50-year-old death.

"The hype and hopes, we've got to stifle that a bit," Lucas said.

Owens, a disabled World War II veteran, died in jail after being arrested by New Bern police for being drunk. Details in his published obituary suggest Owens was white. His Army unit had not been integrated during World War II. The church and funeral home that handled his burial is traditionally white.

The Southern Poverty Law Center and FBI officials were not aware of Owens' race when he was added to the list.

They will take a look at his case anyway, Lucas said. Federal civil rights laws protect against abuses in local jails and prisons. Plus, it's possible Owens sympathized with blacks during the civil rights movement.

"Civil rights violations can extend beyond race lines," Lucas said.

Staff writer Mandy Locke can be reached at 829-8927 or mandy.locke@newsobserver.com.

Prosecutor Sees Virtue In Failure To Try Emmett Till Case (AP)

AP, March 4, 2007

Killing of boy promoted fight against segregation

Even as the U.S. Department of Justice was announcing a fresh look at unsolved civil-rights-era killings around the South, a Mississippi Delta prosecutor was closing the books on perhaps the most notorious of those cold cases - the brutal 1955 murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till.

To some, the Leflore County grand jury's decision not to return an indictment in the case after an exhaustive three-year federal investigation was a sign that not much has changed in Mississippi in the past 52 years.

But others, including the prosecutor herself, felt that it showed the opposite - a maturing of racial justice in this part of the South.

"It would have been very easy for that grand jury to have returned a true bill based solely on emotion and the rage they felt, and I commend them for not doing that," says Joyce Chiles, the black district attorney who directed the case in which the grand jury declined to charge Carolyn Bryant Donham, 73, the object of Till's infamous wolf whistle.

If the grand jurors had acted on the basis of hate, not evidence, Chiles says, that would have been like the Jim Crow justice of 1955.

When federal officials reopened the case in 2004, many had hopes that someone would at last be made to pay for killing the boy whose defiled, river-savaged face helped drive mass opposition to segregation.

The FBI determined that the statutes of limitations had run out on all possible federal crimes. The agency turned the file over to Chiles, with a recommendation that she take a close look at Donham. At the time, Roy Bryant had denied that his wife came along on Till's abduction.

Since 1989, officials in Mississippi and six other states had won convictions in nearly 25 civil-rights-era cases that most had considered stone cold.

Editorial: A Welcome Partnership To Right Old Injustices (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, March 4, 2007

Who holds the secrets to the killings?

Decades have passed, but the ghosts of Mississippi and the South demand justice. It is no small thing when federal officials stand up and vow to stay on the trail of murderers. Such a public commitment occurred Tuesday when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller linked forces with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Urban League and Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala.

They announced their commitment to solve racially motivated murders of the civil rights era, when some considered it open season on black people in the South. A year ago, the FBI began identifying hate-crime murders that occurred before 1969. The slayings weren't investigated or reported, or were misclassified as accidental deaths or disappearances.

Civil rights groups have long wanted Washington's power circle to focus on the lynchings. At long last it has happened. Federal authorities will make about a dozen of 100 cold cases their priority for investigation and prosecution. They didn't disclose which ones.

Mueller noted that successful prosecutions of such cases since 2001 "have restored our hope and renewed our resolve." Those cases included the 1963 church bombing in Birmingham, Ala., that killed four young girls and the 1964 murders of Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney in Neshoba County, Miss.

With new forensic tools available and civil rights groups providing information, authorities should be equipped to right injustices. The passage of time has not erased the need for this country to stand up for its ideals and for the forgotten ones.

Primary On Mardi Gras Day Illegal? (MR)

By Dan Murtaugh, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), March 4, 2007

A presidential primary election on Fat Tuesday next year would most directly impact majority-black voting districts, possibly violating federal voting rights laws, according to local officials and lawyers.

"I really would be extremely surprised if the Justice Department would approve of a Feb. 5 presidential primary," said Beth Marietta Lyons, an attorney and a lobbyist for the city of Mobile and the Mobile County Probate Court.

The federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 stipulates that several states, including Alabama, cannot change voting procedures unless the U.S. Department of Justice determines that the change had no discriminatory purpose and no discriminatory effect.

Last year, Alabama's Legislature voted to move the state's presidential primary from early June to the first Tuesday in February in order to make the state a more enticing campaign stop for national politicians.

That created a conflict for 2008, as both the primary and Fat Tuesday are scheduled for Feb. 5.

Fat Tuesday parades run through three Mobile voting precincts, all of which are majority black, according to U.S. Census Bureau data for 2000:

Precinct 14, which votes at Bishop State Community College and includes land north of Beauregard Street and Martin Luther King Boulevard, has 5,360 residents, 5,266 of whom are black.

Precinct 16, which votes at the Springhill Avenue Recreation Center and includes the downtown loop and parts of Midtown, has 3,832 residents, 2,086 of whom are black.

Precinct 18, which votes at the Mobile Civic Center and includes the Down the Bay community, has 2,752 residents, 2,169 of whom were black.

While a Mardi Gras primary would affect all of Mobile County, voters in those three precincts would have the hardest time getting to their polling places, according to Probate Judge Don Davis.

He agreed with Lyons that the Justice Department might object if state lawmakers don't change the date. "That's a factor I would look at if I were in their position," Davis said.

More than 100,000 people crowd along the parade routes in downtown Mobile on Mardi Gras Day. Barricades line many streets, and parking spots -- especially free parking -- are practically nonexistent.

Local attorney Cecil Gardner, who recently won a voting rights lawsuit against Gov. Bob Riley over his appointment of Juan Chastang to the Mobile County Commission, said he is researching whether this change in the primaries would violate the law.

"If a citizen were prohibited from getting to the polls, it would certainly raise my interest," Gardner said.

But Brian Fair, a law professor at the University of Alabama, said the Justice Department has narrowed its interpretation of what falls under the auspices of the Voting Rights Act and probably would not buy the argument that a Mardi Gras primary would violate it.

"I don't think a failure to do anything will necessarily implicate the Voting Rights Act," he said.

No one contacted by the Press-Register said he or she would file a lawsuit based on the Voting Rights Act if legislators don't move the date of the primaries.

A number of legislators from Mobile County have said they're working to change the primary date.

Davis said he's concerned that lawmakers from elsewhere might hesitate to reschedule the whole state's primary just to accommodate one county. "The feedback I'm getting from Montgomery is that there seems to be the attitude that Mobile needs to cancel Mardi Gras so we can have the election that day, that Mobile just needs to suck it up and cancel the parades," Davis said.

For that reason, lawmakers may be stuck between a rock and a MoonPie: If they move the primaries to an even earlier date, the national parties have said they will penalize Alabama by decreasing the state's number of nominating delegates. If lawmakers move the vote to a later date, they risk losing the national relevance they sought in the first place.

Twenty-one other states, including California and Florida, have primaries set on or before Feb. 5, according to the National Association of Secretaries of State.

Davis is pushing for a Jan. 30 primary date -- the Wednesday before Mardi Gras -- when usually there are no parades scheduled. The date might lose Alabama some delegates, but it would give the state greater visibility, Davis said.

Another option would be to let Mobile County vote on Jan. 30, along with any other county that wants to, then seal the ballots and count them on Feb. 5, when the rest of the state votes, Lyons said.

DOJ_NMG_0139972

Fair said there are other options, such as keeping polls open in Mobile County for several days or encouraging voters in affected areas to fill out absentee ballots.

"There are a lot of things you can do, short of not participating," he said.

Whatever happens, it will be the last time Alabama will have to worry about such a conflict for the near future. Fat Tuesday won't fall on the first Tuesday of February again until 2046.

Investigations Multiplying In Juvenile Abuse Scandal (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

HOUSTON, March 3 — A sexual abuse scandal in the Texas juvenile justice system has state politics in an uproar, with accusations that damning reports were doctored and shelved and sexual predators in high positions were allowed to resign without facing charges.

Late Friday, Ronnie Earle, the district attorney of Travis County who has jurisdiction over Austin, the state capital, announced a criminal investigation into possible records tampering at the Texas Youth Commission.

And Gov. Rick Perry, pressed by angry legislators to put the commission into conservatorship, appointed a special master, Jay Kimbrough, a former deputy state attorney general and state director of homeland security, to lead an investigation into the agency and "reports of failures and wrongdoings."

According to officials, at least 13 boys and girls were molested by staff members at two state schools run by the commission. Even before Mr. Earle and Mr. Perry took action on Friday, there were already inquiries under a previously appointed special prosecutor and legislative committees.

At a State Senate hearing in the capital Tuesday, parents complained of sexual abuse and other mistreatment of their children in state facilities.

"My son is home, but he is not the same since he was raped in the T.Y.C.," said Mary Jane Martinez of San Antonio, who told the Senate Criminal Justice Committee that her 17-year-old son "is so ashamed of himself he built a wall."

Ms. Martinez said her son refused to detail what happened to him at the Victory Field Correctional Academy in Vernon.

With the state's Republican leadership under strong challenge, a high-level legislative audit committee called on Governor Perry on Friday to appoint a conservator to take over the commission, or, failing that, to send in state auditors to investigate how it was handling nearly 8,000 youthful felons, misdemeanants and parolees in 36 facilities.

One top Democratic lawmaker with bipartisan support said he would seek to introduce a bill on Monday ordering a takeover of the agency.

"The allegations of sick sexual abuse of troubled youths are so severe, the Legislature needs to bypass the bureaucracy and protect the victims and prevent more children from becoming victims," said the lawmaker, Representative Jim Dunnam of Waco, leader of the House Democratic caucus.

In recent days, top officials of the youth commission have resigned or been ousted. Many lawmakers — already furious with the governor for bypassing them last month on an order that sixth-grade girls be vaccinated against a sexually transmitted virus causing cancer — have criticized the commission as dysfunctional.

Officials who testified at the State Senate hearing said that the commission staff members trained for only 80 hours compared with 300 for adult criminal justice employees, and that last year the commission's staff turnover rate was 52 percent. There is only one staff member for each 18 juveniles ages 10-21.

"What scares me the most is what I don't know," Senator John H. Whitmire, the Houston Democrat heading the Criminal Justice Committee, told Neil Nichols, then the acting executive director, at the hearing this week.

Mr. Nichols, the longtime general counsel who took over last Friday upon the sudden retirement of the previous executive director, Dwight Harris, acknowledged that "T.Y.C. is in hard times," saying that some of the events "would be impossible to explain to a parent or family."

Mr. Nichols was among the officials replaced this week over the scandal.

The State Senate hearing drew anguished mothers like Katrina Cannon of Troy, near Waco, whose 17-year-old son is now at the McLennan County State Juvenile Correction Facility and who, she said, had once suffered an unexplained incident of rectal bleeding.

"I have asked him and he will not admit anything," Ms. Cannon said.

The revelations, disclosed in recent weeks by news organizations that had obtained long-secret reports by the youth commission and the Texas Rangers, have reverberated around the state.

DOJ_NMG_0139973

Will Harrell, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Texas, which has investigated juvenile mistreatment allegations for years, said the juvenile justice system was overwhelmed and needed alternatives to incarceration, like probation programs.

The furor is centered on the commission's handling of allegations of sexual abuse by two former high-ranking administrators.

One, Ray Brookins, a security director at the San Saba State School in central Texas, was allowed to transfer to the West Texas State School in Pyote on Oct. 1, 2003, although a commission report compiled in 2005 said he had been disciplined for having adult pornography on his work computer and had been admonished for regularly taking students into his office alone at night with the blinds drawn.

The report was not made public until last month.

The superintendent at Pyote, Lemuel Harrison, said he not been told of Mr. Brookins's history. But the report criticized Mr. Harrison as having ignored repeated complaints from staff members that within days of arriving, Mr. Brookins began taking boys out of the dormitory at night for sexual encounters.

A caseworker later reported overhearing a boy telling his mother that Mr. Brookins had molested him in the dormitory.

When Mr. Harrison went on medical leave in October 2004, Mr. Brookins became acting superintendent and, the report said, "used his authority and powers of persuasion to keep his victims and West Texas State School staff from reporting his conduct."

Mr. Brookins, 41, who was said at the Senate hearing to be working now at a bar in Austin, could not be reached for comment. Two Austin phone listings in his name were out of service and the youth commission has no way to reach him, said a spokesman, Tim Savoy.

Two weeks after Mr. Brookins's arrival at Pyote, the West Texas State School hired a new principal, John Paul Hernandez. Mr. Hernandez, too, began taking boys out of the dormitory to private late night encounters, the report said.

The Texas Rangers later found that both men "engaged in sexual contact with several students." Federal prosecutors declined jurisdiction in the matter and the findings were referred to the Ward County district attorney, Randall W. Reynolds, who said this week that the case was still active, if delayed.

"Frankly I wish it had moved quicker," Mr. Reynolds said. Now it has been turned over to a special prosecutor.

Mr. Savoy of the commission said Mr. Hernandez had "staff sexual contact" with two 17-year-olds and a 20-year-old, and that Mr. Brookins had sexual contact with an 18-year-old and committed "unprofessional conduct" involving other sex-related offenses with six youths 15 to 19.

Both men resigned without criminal charges in 2005. The commission's executive director at the time, Mr. Harris, ordered his own report, which remained secret until last month when The Texas Observer and The Dallas Morning News obtained it and other records and revealed the abuse allegations.

Mr. Hernandez was later named principal of a charter school, the Richard Milburn Academy in Midland. The superintendent, Norman Hall, said that he had not been told of Mr. Hernandez's history at his hiring and that he had now suspended him.

Mr. Hernandez, 41, reached by phone on Wednesday, denied the charges but said he was declining to comment further on the advice of his lawyer.

Mr. Harrison was later named the commission's director of juvenile corrections in charge of several state schools but has now also been suspended, Mr. Savoy, the commission spokesman, said.

Pete C. Alfaro, the chairman of the youth commission board from 2004 until he was demoted by Mr. Perry and announced he would resign this week, said the first he knew of Mr. Harris's 2005 report was from the recent news accounts.

Mr. Earle, the district attorney, said he was investigating an account in The Austin American-Statesman that even when the 2005 commission report was released last month, a section showing that high agency officials had been alerted to the abuse, but ignored it, had been deleted.

N.Y. Suburb Scraps Election After Suit (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, March 4, 2007

PORT CHESTER, N.Y. -- Officials in a suburban New York village will not appeal a federal judge's decision to temporarily block its upcoming election after federal officials said the voting method discriminates against Hispanics and violates the Voting Rights Act.

An appeal was "not an effective use of taxpayer dollars," Port Chester Mayor Gerald Logan said after a meeting Saturday with the village trustees.

DOJ_NMG_0139974

Officials haven't yet decided whether to continue trying to preserve an at-large method of electing trustees that Justice Department lawyers say has kept Hispanics from gaining elected office.

The village is about 25 miles from New York City and is governed by a mayor and six trustees. It has used at-large elections since 1868. The village, with a population of about 28,000, is 43 percent Hispanic, according to the 2000 Census. The citizen voting-age population was 22 percent Hispanic, but no Hispanic has ever been elected as a trustee.

The village's planned March 20 election for two of the six seats on its Board of Trustees is canceled. The two trustees whose seats were up for election will continue on in the posts, village attorney Anthony Piscionere said.

U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson granted a preliminary injunction Friday stopping the trustees vote from taking place, saying the Justice Department was likely to prevail in its case against the village. The Justice Department wants to divide the village into six districts, including one in which a Hispanic-favored candidate would be more likely to win.

ANTITRUST:

Report: Private Equity Firm Blackstone Considering Chrysler Bid (AP)

AP, March 4, 2007

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. (AP) — Private equity firm Blackstone Group has emerged as a leading contender to buy DaimlerChrysler's (DCX) struggling Chrysler unit, according to a report published Saturday.

The Detroit News, citing people familiar with the Chrysler sale process that it didn't name, reported that Blackstone is moving forward with a detailed analysis of Chrysler's finances and operations with an eye toward making a formal bid.

A message seeking comment was left Saturday with a spokesman for Chrysler, which has declined to comment about speculation about a possible sale.

John Ford, a spokesman for New York-based Blackstone, said Saturday that he was aware of the report but couldn't comment.

The development is the latest in a series of reports that have surfaced since DaimlerChrysler Chairman Dieter Zetsche said Feb. 14 that all options are on the table for the money-losing Chrysler business and he would not rule out a possible sale.

Among those that analysts say are exploring a purchase of the struggling company are General Motors plus four private equity firms, including Blackstone, Apollo Management, the Carlyle Group and Cerberus Capital Management.

Feds, State Probe TUSD Tech Mess (AZDS)

By George B. Sánchez, Arizona Daily Star

The Arizona Daily Star, March 4, 2007

District has lost out on millions for computer, phone upgrades

The Tucson Unified School District is being investigated by federal and state officials for wide-ranging problems in its technology department — and has lost multiple opportunities at tens of millions of dollars in federal aid as a result.

Authorities declined to discuss the investigations, but TUSD's problems are evident: Students have slow Web access on school computers, and the technology department is without a director or a coherent technology plan for the future. And — as long as the shadow of the investigations hangs over TUSD — there's little chance the district can obtain federal money to solve the problems.

"I don't think any of the turmoil is affecting students," TUSD Superintendent Roger Pfeuffer said. But he admitted TUSD's infrastructure and computer network need improvement, and the current problems could have big effects in the future. "The longer we put it off, the more it will affect students."

The turmoil began in 2004, when TUSD officials applied for federal funds to upgrade the district's computer network and phone system.

Not long afterward, employees in the technology department secretly alerted authorities, concerned that the millions of dollars in contracts would go to a small, local company instead of the major national corporations with which the district previously had contracted.

The employees also were concerned the company may have received special treatment because of a friendship between its president and TUSD's technology director.

Two years later, TUSD's Governing Board asked the Arizona Attorney General's Office to investigate the department, citing concerns of possible bid-rigging by a paid consultant.

Hundreds of pages of records obtained by the Arizona Daily Star, many through public records requests, along with dozens of interviews and months of investigation, paint a picture of a department in distress and under deep scrutiny.

DOJ_NMG_0139975

Since federal funds for technology improvement — E-Rate funds — became available in 1998, TUSD has had problems obtaining them, and hasn't received any since 2002. In that time, more than $6.2 billion has been disbursed nationwide.

Despite the investigations, TUSD continues to apply for the federal funds — because there's no other single source with that much money to give.

State education officials say the investigations hurt TUSD's chances but that it's still possible the district could receive funds, as long as all application rules are followed.

"The 2007-2008 application from TUSD would get reviewed just like all the other applications submitted this year," wrote Cathy J. Poplin, director of educational technology for the Arizona Department of Education. "However, final approval will depend on where the investigation is at."

E-Rate protocol

In March 2004, two TUSD Technology and Telecommunication Services (TTS) employees independently called the federal whistle-blower hotline, concerned with how district officials planned to use the federal funds they were seeking.

The E-Rate funds are administered by the SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Federal Communications Commission and are designed to give discounts to schools and libraries for telecommunications and Internet access. Those that apply for funds must already have picked vendors to perform the services detailed in the application.

TUSD requested nearly $16 million in 2004 for 41 services, FCC records show.

Thirty-five of those service contracts — totaling more than $10 million — were awarded to NVision Networking Inc., an eight-person technology company in Tucson that also was TUSD's E-Rate consultant that year. Some TTS employees said the contracts are inappropriate given NVision's consulting role.

NVision had worked with TUSD in the past, employees and TUSD records said. In 2003, TUSD awarded NVision $2.5 million for E-Rate services, though the money was never received because the government denied TUSD funding that year.

However, TTS employees were concerned about possible preferential treatment of NVision because of the relationship between its president, Dan Meyer, and TUSD's TTS director, Guyton Campbell. Campbell quietly resigned from his $93,000-a-year job in January.

"NVision (was) allowed access to director, manager, and schools during E-Rate proceeding not provided to other vendors," states a TTS memo obtained by the Star. The unsigned memo contains a list of concerns submitted in May 2004 to Superintendent Pfeuffer and TUSD's governing board. "Password to restricted district data on the Schools and Library E-Rate proceeding was provided to one contractor, NVision."

An e-mail obtained by the Star shows then-TTS manager Mary Veres shared an internal password with Meyer and an NVision co-worker. In it, she invites them to "look at what I've done so far" and concludes: "Any and all advice would be appreciated."

Sharing the code with a potential vendor violates E-Rate protocol. The e-mail also indicates the contract was arranged before the federally imposed bidding period ended, which the FCC noted in its explanation of why TUSD was denied funding.

Fractured department

Most alarming to TTS employees was the relationship between Campbell and Meyer.

"I have been friends with Guyton for many years," Meyer said when contacted by the Star in late February.

Meyer said the two worked together, as vendor and school technology director, when Campbell worked at the Arizona State Schools for the Deaf and the Blind as well as the Sunnyside Unified School District. Before that, Meyer recalled, the two set up a computer lab for a University of Arizona satellite campus.

On Jan. 19, Campbell submitted a two-page resignation letter, obtained by the Star via a public-records request. He wrote he'd been "the subject of various investigations for alleged issues arising out of the performance of my defined job and performing tasks that were assigned to me by my superiors."

The Star made more than a dozen attempts to contact Campbell, at his home, through all listed phone numbers, via TUSD officials and neighbors, and even the real-estate agency where he now hangs his license. A certified letter with written questions was sent to his home as well. He didn't respond.

Campbell's resignation letter reads: "My employer is attempting to eliminate me as an employee" because Campbell had "apparently offended an 'outside force' that enjoys a particularly cozy and profitable financial relationship with the district."

He concluded: "It would appear justifiable that TUSD consider fair compensation for what has transpired. I will await your reply."

The letter never identifies the "outside force."

When Campbell arrived at TUSD in late 2003, he'd been lauded for his work. But suspicions also followed him.

DOJ_NMG_0139976

While at Sunnyside, he received the Computerworld Smithsonian Award and was honored alongside Stanford University and Harvard University Medical Center.

He'd gone on to spend four years at the Schools for the Deaf and the Blind. But the same month he left ASDB, the school received a $3,000 check, described in records as a donation, from a Florida software company for furniture for ASDB's Information Technologies Department. Thirteen months later, on the advice of the state Attorney General's Office, ASDB returned the check, an ASDB board member says. It isn't clear, though, if Campbell knew about the money.

Visions of a wireless network

Internal memos and a federal mediation report obtained by the Star show TUSD's TTS department became fractured under his leadership. Employees said Campbell didn't detail to them his vision for the network's future and they were concerned that his plan was financially irresponsible.

Campbell's vision was to scrap TUSD's current network and create a wireless network spanning the district's 250 square miles. The ambitious project would have cost more than $50 million, current and former TTS employees say.

Officials say the idea for a wireless computer network was approved by voters, as part of 2004's $250 million bond issue. About $8 million of that would have gone to the wireless computer network.

But Campbell needed more support, and administrators accuse him of staging a campaign to discredit the existing system. Last year, TUSD's governing board applied for E-Rate money because members were told public safety hinged on it.

Pfeuffer and board members were told by Campbell and an outside consultant that TUSD's 911 system was defective, and that if someone at a school called 911, emergency responders would arrive at TUSD's headquarters at 1010 E. 10th St.

"That isn't accurate," Pfeuffer said in January.

Though there were problems with the system that caused some emergency responders to head to TUSD headquarters, the problems were nowhere near the systemic breakdown Campbell and TUSD's 2006 E-Rate consultant described. That consultant's recommendations are being investigated by the Attorney General's Office, too.

Pfeuffer admits that along with TUSD's alleged 911 problem, administrators and TUSD's Governing Board were never apprised of the various options to upgrade TUSD computer network and phone system.

"There were people who thought it was probably advantageous to simply, and I say simply and relatively cheaply, upgrade our current phone system," he said. "There were others that said the future is not in that kind of phone system. The future is in Voice over Internet Protocol."

Voice over Internet Protocol means replacing phone lines with a Web-based service, and, in this case, according to TUSD records, a wireless network.

That's what Campbell recommended, Pfeuffer said.

Audit pushes policy changes

At least a dozen TUSD employees have been interviewed by federal and state investigators. TUSD has conducted three internal investigations. And an outside audit found problems with TTS procurement policies, including the fact that TUSD's purchasing department was out of the loop.

In December 2004, investigators for the U.S. SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Department of Justice's San Francisco office interviewed two TTS staffers.

"Some staff has spoken to federal officials," Pfeuffer said, but not for some time. "We know nothing about what's going on there."

Owen Clements, chief of special litigation for the city of San Francisco Attorney's Office, said that could be by design.

Though he's not connected to this case, his office was involved in a massive, nationwide E-Rate investigation that began in 2000. He said a federal statute called the False Claims Act lets anyone who discovers fraud involving federal funds file a civil complaint. The complaint is sealed during the investigation so the government can build its case and consider civil penalties or criminal charges.

Luke Macaulay, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's San Francisco office, declined to comment, and referred questions to Department of Justice's antitrust division in Washington, D.C. A spokeswoman there declined to comment as well.

Rudy Flores, TUSD's executive director of engineering and facilities, was interviewed under oath by the state Attorney General's Office in October. Flores was assistant director of TTS under Campbell from July 2005 to July 2006.

Though he said he'd twice been interviewed by investigators, he wouldn't disclose whether they were federal or state. "I'm not supposed to mention anything about any of that," he said.

Mary Veres, currently TUSD's interim-TTS director, also was interviewed. She also would not talk about the case.

When shown the e-mail in which she gave NVision internal passwords, she said: "I would love to discuss this with you because I think there's a lot of misinformation. But I don't feel like I should be doing it because the investigation is still going on."

DOJ_NMG_0139977

A 2005 audit of TUSD, by Heinfeld, Meech & Co., TUSD's auditors, found that the 2004 E-Rate application was handled by TTS, not TUSD's purchasing department, and, therefore, wasn't subject to proper oversight. The report also stated that TTS had few records of its 2004 E-Rate application.

The audit said the problems didn't merit notifying federal officials, but it recommended a significant policy change:

"All future request for proposals for E-rate services should be made through the Purchasing Department, where internal controls, purchasing procedures, and knowledge of applicable compliance requirements will help ensure all of the district's procurements are in compliance with the Arizona school district rules."

It could be months, if not years, before the federal and state investigations conclude.

The San Francisco City Attorney's Office took until 2004 to conclude its E-Rate investigation. In 2005, a federal grand jury returned a 22-count indictment against six companies and five people on charges of fraud, collusion, aiding and abetting and conspiracy. Two companies paid more than $20 million to settle the civil claims brought by the U.S. government.

"We've missed the boat"

Until contacted for this story, TUSD Governing Board member Judy Burns said she'd only heard rumors of a federal investigation. "The district is going to suffer and the students in class will suffer for not doing this in a legitimate, businesslike way," she said.

On Jan. 30, TUSD's governing board voted to apply for E-Rate funds for 2007. Absent from the meeting was Campbell, whose resignation had become official one week earlier. There was no public mention of his departure.

A new committee has been charged with writing a new technology plan for the district that likely will include various options to improve TUSD's network and phone system.

A plan that details technological improvements for teaching and classroom education does exist, but there's no plan for how TUSD will increase its bandwidth and provide classroom computers with the Web access expected of such a large district in the digital age.

In 2006, TUSD's governing board voted to apply for E-Rate funds with the caveat that the Attorney General's Office investigate whether procurement policies were followed. There were concerns about the consultant used that year, Jon Slaughter, and possible links to a vendor he'd recommended for a contract. At the time, Slaughter said his recommendations weren't influenced by any vendors, even though an ad for the company he recommended was on his Web site at the time.

Pfeuffer and the Governing Board expected a quick investigation. It's lasted more than a year.

In June, with no word from state investigators, TUSD withdrew its 2006 E-Rate application. Pfeuffer said district officials don't expect any 2006 funds.

"We've missed the boat here," Burns said. "We've missed many opportunities."

The Karmazin Way: Build It, Sell It, Run It, Repeat (NYT)

By Richard Siklos

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

MEL KARMAZIN could sell microwavable ice to Eskimos. He started his career in ad sales at WCBS radio in New York four decades ago, quickly proved himself to be a master closer, and has been peddling his wares ever since.

“Mel is the singular best salesman I have ever met in my life,” said Joel Hollander, the chief executive of CBS Radio, who spent much of his career working for Mr. Karmazin. “He’s very aggressive, to say the least.”

The capping moment of Mr. Karmazin’s radio career came in 1997, when he sold Infinity Broadcasting (now CBS Radio), a vast collection of stations he and partners had built, to what was then the broadcast company CBS Inc.

Though he had little experience in television, Mr. Karmazin’s hero status on Wall Street and his zeal for growth catapulted him into the chief executive’s chair at CBS after only a couple of years. A mere nine months later, he pulled off another coup and sold CBS to Viacom, on the condition that he would run the combined media conglomerate as its president.

The Karmazin rocket finally ran out of fuel in 2001, when Viacom’s chief executive and controlling shareholder, Sumner M. Redstone, lost confidence in Mr. Karmazin’s relentless focus on costs and quarter-to-quarter results, coupled with an unpardonable failure to invite the billionaire to lunch. (Mr. Redstone went a step further last year by sort of undoing the deal and splitting off a new CBS Corporation, which he also controls.)

Anyway, gazing at Mr. Karmazin’s career, you start to get the picture behind what happens when you put him in the big chair: he is forever building and selling, even when it looks like he’s buying. And so, two years after he became the chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, it should come as no shock that he has struck a deal to merge the company with its only direct rival, XM Satellite Radio.

Not coincidentally, if the deal goes through, he will again end up running the combined entity.

DOJ_NMG_0139978

Last week, Mr. Karmazin took his campaign to win over lawmakers and regulators to Washington with his pitch that a single satellite radio company would mean more choice and lower prices for consumers — rather than create a foreboding monopoly, as his former chums in the terrestrial radio business contend.

Speaking before an antitrust task force of the House Judiciary Committee, Mr. Karmazin said he was shocked by the very idea that anyone would see a monopoly as the logical result of merging the only two satellite radio broadcasters. “There is no monopoly or duopoly,” he told the hearing. “That’s the most bizarre thing I have ever heard.”

Mr. Karmazin’s essential message is that satellite radio is competing with all forms of audio entertainment and information — from commercial radio to iPod jacks in cars to Internet radio and maybe even people humming as they walk down the street.

On Feb. 19, the day the merger was announced, Mr. Karmazin had a similar message for me: that it was wrong to compare his proposed deal with the merger of the direct broadcast satellite companies DirecTV and EchoStar, which regulators turned down in 2004. “The only thing that you could even think of as similar between those companies and us is that they both use satellites,” he said. By Mr. Karmazin’s reasoning, the television business has an entirely different structure.

Whether this is conviction or sophistry, it is very hard to throw Mr. Karmazin off his message, even when he seems to be contradicting himself.

Early in his tenure at CBS, for example, he was dismissive of the Internet as a business. But he quickly changed tack and did some clever deals in which the company traded ad space on its TV network to Web start-up companies for equity, which it cashed in on shrewdly during the stock market bubble a few years ago.

Similarly, the pre-Sirius Mel was a satellite-radio skeptic. He later argued that what changed his mind was the defection of Howard Stern, whose career he had nurtured, from CBS/Infinity to Sirius for an estimated $500 million pay package. Mr. Karmazin said the potential of having the controversial but popular Mr. Stern anchoring Sirius helped entice him out of a brief post-Viacom retirement to join the company.

Sirius has certainly blossomed since Mr. Karmazin came on board in November 2004: it had just under 800,000 subscribers then but has more than six million now.

After chalking up billions of dollars in losses since its inception in the early 1990s, the company will begin generating positive cash flow this year, Mr. Karmazin says, and he contends that Sirius does not need to merge with XM and its eight million customers to survive.

But the costs of acquiring and keeping customers remain daunting. And what tears him up inside, he said, is Sirius’s stock price, which, at a closing price on Friday of $3.55, is 28 percent lower than the day before he joined the company. “It’s been a great two years,” he told me. “If there weren’t a Quotron in my office, it would have been the perfect job for me.” (A key to Mr. Karmazin’s legendary salesmanship is that he can be quite funny.)

One of the messages that Mr. Karmazin brought to Washington is that a combined satellite broadcaster is better for choice — Mr. Stern and major sports leagues would ultimately be available to subscribers of both services rather than one or the other.

Among the biggest hurdles he and XM face is persuading the regulators that merging would be better for consumers than the satellite radio rivals’ long-promised and long-delayed new receivers that would allow listeners to switch from one service to the other without having to pull one receiver out of their cars and install another.

As far as price is concerned, Mr. Karmazin made it plain to the House committee that he would be willing to agree to a price cap for the combined service to seal the deal. The pitch is that raising prices isn’t really feasible anyway because most of what satellite radio is competing with out there is free — particularly on the radio.

ONCE more, this seems slightly at odds with statements that Mr. Karmazin made only a few months ago, Jonathan A. Jacoby, a Banc of America Securities analyst, wrote last week in a report. At an investor conference in December, Mr. Jacoby said, Mr. Karmazin talked up the potential for raising prices beyond the $12.95 a month most people pay now.

Clearly, Mr. Karmazin and his counterparts at XM have their work cut out for them in getting their deal past regulators. But one thing you can take to the bank is that he will do whatever it takes to get the deal done. If he does pull it off, the question will be this: What company would the master pitchman want to sell the combined XM-Sirius to next?

INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Tracking Crime On Tribal Lands (AP)

By Amy Forliti, Associated Press writer

AP, March 4, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS -- Sgt. Bill Blake gave his anti-gang presentation to American Indian communities so many times, he says, that his daughter knew it by heart. Yet it wasn't enough: "Dad, you have to do more," he recalls her saying.

DOJ_NMG_0139979

Nearly four years later, 20-year-old Erica Rae Blake was dead -- shot in the head at a party on a Wisconsin reservation. Her death was ruled an accident, but memory is driving Blake to work even harder to fight violence on reservations.

Blake set out to improve cooperation between tribal police, federal and local law enforcement, but quickly found a big obstacle: Nobody tracks hard data on crime occurring on tribal lands.

With the help of another Minneapolis police officer, Larry Loonsfoot, and an expected $600,000 grant from the Department of Justice, Blake hopes to create a database that would give tribes a tool to spot trends, share information and track offenders who seek sanctuary elsewhere.

"We're never going to be able to address these problems and make things better in tribal communities when it comes to crime and quality of life unless we get the data," said Blake, a member of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa.

The goal is to collect the data in a central location so law enforcement and tribes can identify problems and apply resources where needed.

"I think what's unique about the Indian community is there is always some connection to the reservation," said Loonsfoot, a member of Michigan's Keweenaw Bay Indian Community. "We need to bridge that communication gap where we can directly enforce both ends."

Blake said the I-CARE project -- it stands for Indian Crime Awareness Research and Evaluation -- will start small, with the ultimate goal of creating a national database.

Technology and money -- too little of both -- sometimes play a part in whether tribes collect and share crime data. A maze of overlapping jurisdictions hurts, too. For example, a crime on a Minnesota reservation may be handled by tribal police, a county sheriff, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the FBI or any combination of law enforcement.

That means data is absorbed by different agencies and a true picture of crime on a reservation can be harder to get. Without good numbers, a tribe may have a hard time getting grant money for a particular problem, or might not make the right choices for spending its crime-fighting dollars, Blake said.

"Nationally, crime statistics from Indian Country are not collected well," said Tom Heffelfinger, a former U.S. attorney in Minnesota. "It's one of the real impediments to improving public safety in Indian Country."

The FBI collects crime data each year, but many tribal communities don't participate. The Bureau of Indian Affairs doesn't collect crime statistics.

The Bureau of Justice Statistics publishes a report on American Indians and crime, but instead of tracking crime as it occurs, the data is collected by a variety of methods, including household survey.

Minneapolis Police Chief Tim Dolan said a database has "tremendous promise," and is trying to line up computers, clerical help and space for Blake's project, likely in one of the city's American Indian neighborhoods.

"The connections between the tribal lands and the city of Minneapolis are very strong," Dolan said. "You see the same people that are involved in crime here are involved in crime there. There is a very selfish reason to want to create this database and create this sharing of information."

Ted Quasula, police chief of the Las Vegas Paiute Tribe in Las Vegas was intrigued by Blake's project. He said his department tracks crime, but doesn't link its information with other jurisdictions.

"Most criminals could care less about jurisdiction boundaries, in fact they enjoy it when jurisdictions fight," said Quasula, a member of the Hualapai Tribe of Arizona. Sharing information is vital, he said.

"If you kind of hole up and you've got your own island, it's going to be detrimental in the long run," he said.

George Goggleye Jr., chairman of the Leech Lake Band of Ojibwe in Cass Lake, Minn., was enthusiastic about Blake's idea, too. He said his tribe has been keeping statistics in the seven years since it established its police department, and already shares data with surrounding communities.

"It's just been fantastic," said Goggleye.

With the words of his daughter still fresh in his memory, Blake is determined to help prevent more violence.

"What I've learned is doing nothing will get your family killed," he said. "So if I were to sit back and still do nothing and lose somebody else that was close to me, I couldn't live with myself."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge To Decide Validity Of Case On Marijuana (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0139980

SAN FRANCISCO, March 3 — A federal judge has asked the United States attorney here to submit all trial preparation memorandums in the case against a leading advocate of medical marijuana so that the court can determine if the government has been pursuing a "vindictive prosecution."

The judge, Charles R. Breyer, ordered the review at the request of lawyers for Ed Rosenthal, a spokesman in the effort to legalize marijuana who has been in a closely watched court battle with the government.

At a motion hearing in Federal District Court here on Friday, defense lawyers for Mr. Rosenthal urged Judge Breyer to dismiss an array of federal drug, money laundering and tax evasion charges against their client, saying an appellate court judge had overturned his conviction in a nearly identical case last year.

The new charges, outlined in a federal grand jury indictment issued in October, accuse Mr. Rosenthal of 14 felonies, including conspiracy to grow and sell marijuana for medical use, laundering $1,850 and failing to report income from the sale of crop plants on his tax returns.

The overall charges are nearly identical to a 2003 federal case against Mr. Rosenthal, which ended with a one-day prison sentence after members of the jury disavowed the verdict, having learned belatedly that Mr. Rosenthal was growing marijuana under Proposition 215, the state's medical marijuana law.

"We are outraged that the prosecutor continues to pursue this case," said Shari L. Greenberger, a lawyer for Mr. Rosenthal. "The vindictive nature of the prosecutor is clear-cut and utterly shocking."

Despite the short sentence in the 2003 case, Mr. Rosenthal challenged the fairness of his trial, and in April, a federal judge with the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the marijuana growing conviction, citing jury misconduct. The decision punctuated a contentious three-year volley of legal appeals and cross complaints that were given a second wind on Friday, with the start of the new case.

The United States attorney, George Beven, declined to answer questions about the case, citing an office policy. But at Friday's hearing he agreed to provide Judge Breyer with all interoffice memorandums pertaining to his office's decision to seek another trial and expanded charges.

ATF Computers Help Police Track Guns (WCFC)

By Jeff Reinitz, Courier Staff Writer

The Waterloo-Cedar Falls (IA) Courier, March 4, 2007

WATERLOO --- A new computer program has sped up the first step Waterloo police take when tracing firearms they come across during criminal investigations

Last fall, three Waterloo officers were certified to use the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearm's eTrace system, which discloses the name of the person who first bought a certain weapon, the seller and the date of that sale.

In the past, police had to fill out paperwork which was then sent to ATF officials. Unless the trace was a high priority, it could take weeks or longer to get results.

"Now it's Web-based, so you just go in and run it yourself," said Sgt. Keith Smith, who works in the police department's crime lab.

Results aren't instant and can still take hours or weeks.

An officer with investigations and an agent with the Tri-County Drug Enforcement Task Force are also authorized to use eTrace.

Aside from make, model and serial number, eTrace users type in a long list of information about the gun --- the caliber, the type of crime it was used in, what part of the house it was found in and so on.

Smith said the ATF apparently crunches that information for future statistics.

"It relieved AT and F of some workload issues, and we may get our results quicker that way also," said Capt. Bruce Arends.

Smith's first trace with the system involved a fatal self-inflicted gunshot wound this fall. The handgun that was used was first purchased by a person with the same last name as the deceased --- likely a relative --- from a store that went out of business decades ago.

Another firearm being traced --- a pistol found with a juvenile --- was first sold to a Waterloo man. But this is just the starting point.

The sale was in 1990, so detectives now have to ferret out the information that isn't in any computer database, specifically how the weapon traded hands from the first buyer to the teenager.

"It's just a piece of the puzzle," Arends said.

Investigators will try to find the buyer and see if he remembers who he sold the gun to, and then try to find any subsequent owners.

DOJ_NMG_0139981

Private owners aren't required to keep records of who they sell their guns to, so the chain can be easily broken.

Contact Jeff Reinitz at (319) 291-1578 or jeff.reinitz@wcfcourier.com.

Man With A Million Bullets In Home Charged (RPE)

By Kenny Klein, The Press-Enterprise

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, March 4, 2007

ARSENAL: Authorities accuse him of possessing illegal assault weapons, illegal ammunition and explosives.

NORCO - A man who authorities described as a survivalist after investigators found a cache of weapons and ammunitions at his burning home has been arrested and jailed, the Riverside County Sheriff's Department said Saturday.

Thomas Lee McKiernan, 62, of Norco was arrested on suspicion of possession of assault weapons, possession of illegal ammunition, and possession of explosives, according to the sheriff's department.

McKiernan, who had been held since Thursday for a mental evaluation, remained at the Robert Presley Detention Center. His bail is currently set for $100,000 and he is scheduled to appear in Riverside Superior Court on Tuesday, according to his booking information.

The only illegal items investigators have identified so far are five assault rifles, several high-capacity magazines and the 60 pounds of gunpowder, they said. It is illegal to possess more than one pound of gunpowder, Gutierrez said.

The cause of the fire is still unknown. Authorities condemned the house because of the tunnel.

It will take days for deputies and federal agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to document all the weapons and ammunition, Sheriff's spokesman Dennis Gutierrez said.

On Saturday, a locked fence surrounded the damaged property in the neighborhood of neatly kept homes. A number of boxes and other property were stacked in the front yard with four pickups.

McKiernan is a retired machinist who was identified as the home's owner by neighbors and property records.

Sheriff's investigators also found stashes of food and water.

Authorities said they found more than 125 rifles and handguns, about a million rounds of ammunition and 60 pounds of gunpowder in McKiernan's home on the 1800 block of Pali Drive. They said they also discovered a tunnel beneath the garage on Friday.

Fire crews discovered an eight-foot deep tunnel 30 feet from the middle of the garage to a spot beneath the main house. Local and federal officers pulled three barrels out of the tunnel using hooks and poles, said Norco Fire Department Battalion Chief Frank deBoer. They contained rice, water and cooking oil.

On Friday, investigators removed weapons from the kitchen, living room and bedrooms. They also found to safes with reinforcing chain that they have yet to open.

Two-thirds of the driveway leading to McKiernan's modest, shingle-roofed home was filled with ordnance. Cardboard boxes and green metal, military-style containers of ammunition were stacked next to canisters and cookie tins packed with gunpowder.

The ammunition ranged from .22 caliber bullets for small arms to .30 caliber rounds used in high-powered military rifles.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush In A Quandary Over Border Agents' Case (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, March 4, 2007

Border shooting uproar leaves him no easy option

WASHINGTON — For weeks, defenders of the two former Border Patrol agents imprisoned for shooting a Mexican drug trafficker have bombarded the White House with calls, e-mails and petitions.

Their demand is straightforward: A presidential pardon for a pair of Texans they view as heroes persecuted for doing their jobs.

"This is a terrible injustice, and I urge you to use your considerable authority and power to pardon these two agents and right this obvious wrong!" reads a petition from Grassfire.org, a conservative Web site that claims more than 337,000 people have signed the online form.

But the issue is far from simple for President Bush, who is being asked to wade into a highly controversial case where even the most basic facts are in dispute. The quandary for the president: Whether to side with former Border Patrol agents Jose Compean and Ignacio Ramos or with the prosecutors who contend they were rogue officers who wounded a fleeing, unarmed man and then concealed evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0139982

Outcry from conservativesDuring a February 2005 incident near Fabens, Texas, Compean and Ramos pursued Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila and fired 15 rounds at him as he ran back toward Mexico after ditching a vehicle with 743 pounds of marijuana. The wounded trafficker later was given immunity to testify against the agents in a case that has drawn a tremendous outcry from conservatives on and off Capitol Hill, who believe the Bush administration sided with a drug trafficker over its own law enforcement agents.

Though clemency is the one area in which a president has power unlimited by the courts or Congress, Bush thus far has indicated no inclination to sidestep the Justice Department regulations typically followed for pardons cases.

"There is a process in any case for a president to make a pardon decision," Bush said during a Fox News Channel interview in January. "In other words, there is a series of steps that are followed so that the pardon process is, you know, a rational process."

The Justice Department rules require that people petitioning for a pardon wait until five years after they have completed their sentence before filing an application. And the applications must be submitted by the guilty parties themselves.

Compean and Ramos have not applied for a pardon or a commutation of their sentences, Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin said.

Rep. Ted Poe, a Republican from Humble who has championed the ex-agents' cause, has no use for what he views as needless red tape.

"The bureaucracy is getting in the way," Poe said. "The Constitution gives the president absolute power of pardon and parole, and the president can exercise it whenever he wishes."

'A good shield'Some clemency experts fret at the rules, saying no president should limit his pardon powers.

Douglas Berman, an Ohio State University law professor who has followed the Texas case, argues that while the Justice rules may protect the president, they also "eliminate some of the virtue" of the pardon power.

By citing the regulations, Bush "may be trying to cushion himself from the public clamoring to do something in this case," Berman said.

But Margaret Love, who headed Justice's pardons office during the Clinton and first Bush administrations, contends that the rules protect the president and the integrity of the process.

"It's been a good shield for the president," she said.

President Clinton sparked congressional hearings and a huge outcry over his pardon of fugitive financier Marc Rich, whose application bypassed the Justice Department and went directly to the White House without following the rules. And President Ford generated a tremendous public backlash with his pardon of Richard Nixon even before the former president had been charged with any crime in connection with Watergate.

Bush has known intense pressure on the clemency front.

He faced international and domestic pressure as governor of Texas in 1998 to save killer Karla Faye Tucker from the execution chamber. Bush refused to spare Tucker's life despite her reformation in prison and pleas from Pope John Paul II, evangelist Pat Robertson and others, making her the first woman executed in Texas since the Civil War.

Limited useThe Tucker case may hold some clues to Bush's thinking in the Border Patrol ex-agents' matter, said Daniel Kobil, a clemency expert at Capital University Law School in Columbus, Ohio.

"That would suggest that he may well not cave to pressure, even from his own supporters on something like this," he said.

Thus far, Kobil and other experts said, Bush has used his presidential clemency power in very limited fashion.

"It's just really very noncontroversial cases," Love said, calling them "a little unusual in their colorlessness."

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel declined to discuss the Texas case, any timeline for making a decision, or even how many e-mails, letters and calls have been received on behalf of the former Border Patrol agents.

Compean and Ramos, sentenced to 12 and 11 years respectively for shooting the trafficker, have filed a notice of appeal of their sentences, which they began serving in January.

Commutation vs. pardonSupporters argue that the two men deserve, at most, an administrative punishment such as suspension or firing for not reporting the shooting.

Kobil and Berman suggested that the ex-agents' backers might find better success if they argued for commutation of the sentence to time served rather than an outright pardon.

Legally, there is a difference. A pardon wipes the slate clean, forgiving the crime. Commutation reduces the sentence without negating the crime.

"That would be a compromise, obviously," Kobil said. Bush "may well say 'I'm not sure what happened, but they have suffered and they paid a serious price for this crime'," he said.

In light of the controversy surrounding the ex-agents' case, Kobil suggested that Bush might wait until the end of his term before issuing a pardon or commutation for the pair.

Such a stance would not suit Rep. John Culberson, R-Houston, and other conservatives who have rallied to the ex-agents' side.

"This is an utterly unique and outrageous set of circumstances that demands an immediate presidential pardon for the sake of national security and for the sake of the morale of our law enforcement officers on the border," Culberson said.

michelle.mittelstadt@chron.com

Prosecutor Stands In Political Storm (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News

San Antonio Express-News, March 4, 2007

The Justice Department's recent firings of eight top federal prosecutors across the country have come amid allegations that the agency bowed to political pressure.

Even as the Justice Department rebuts the accusations, some are wondering who might be next.

In Central and West Texas, Johnny Sutton has held the post of U.S. attorney for more than five years, but he has come under fire recently over a case in El Paso in which Sutton's office gained convictions of Border Patrol agents who shot an alleged drug smuggler.

In a federal trial in El Paso last year, jurors convicted Ignacio "Nacho" Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean on charges that they shot the alleged smuggler in the buttocks Feb. 17, 2005, and counts alleging they covered up the shooting. Ramos got 11 years in prison. Compean was sentenced to 12. Both have appealed.

Hailing them as "heroes" who were wrongly convicted, some foes of illegal immigration and Republican members of Congress are pushing for President Bush to pardon them.

More Information

Report of Investigation on Ignacio Ramos & Jose Compean

Without a satisfactory answer from the White House on the request, supporters of the agents are aiming at Sutton who, from Austin, supervises 120 federal prosecutors in the largest federal district in the country, a territory that stretches from Waco to San Antonio, south to Del Rio and west to El Paso and Midland/Odessa.

Sutton "has violated the public's trust, and must be removed from office immediately," said T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, the union that represents 10,000 Border Patrol agents.

"Our federal government had to make a choice between prosecuting somebody who was bringing in $1 million worth of drugs, and prosecuting two border agents who did not follow policy," said U.S. Rep. Ted Poe, R-Humble, who stopped short of seeking Sutton's removal but has collected more than 40 signatures from fellow House members seeking congressional hearings on the case. "The government chose the wrong side."

The Justice Department had no comment Friday on whether mounting criticism would have an effect on Sutton's post. But a high-ranking department official told the Senate Judiciary Committee last month that Sutton's job is safe. The Feb. 6 hearing was to review the wave of terminated U.S. attorneys, the transcripts show.

"No," Paul J. McNulty, the No. 2 man in the Justice Department, responded to a question of whether Sutton's job was in danger over the controversial border agent case.

Sutton, a former Harris County prosecutor who has held criminal justice policy advisory roles for the Bush administration, said he does his job based on his experience and management of a large office of prosecutors. He added that deciding whether to prosecute is based on facts and evidence. He also said he had no plans to resign.

"Politics is not a consideration, and public pressure is not a consideration," Sutton said. "Those kinds of things are extraneous, and you just have to put them out of your mind."

"What happens is, the defenders of Compean and Ramos just don't like the result," he said. "They don't like the fact that a jury convicted these two men, and they're willing to change the facts or manipulate the facts to try to get a different result."

Immunity agreement

Hundreds of pages of trial transcripts, exhibits, court documents and reports reveal adrenaline-infused moments of border police work that can cut careers short.

Shortly after 1:10 p.m. Feb. 17, 2005, agents chased a van they suspected of being involved in smuggling undocumented immigrants or drugs back toward the Mexican border near Fabens, east of El Paso. It led to the shooting of Osvaldo Aldrete Davila.

Those involved in the incident agreed Aldrete ditched the van, which carried 743 pounds of marijuana, at the edge of a deep sewage ditch, not too far from the Rio Grande. Other agents involved in the pursuit gave conflicting statements about what they saw or heard. Three testified for the government during the trial after the prosecution gave them "proffer letters" that shielded them from criminal prosecution but not from administrative punishment. The three were later terminated or resigned from the Border Patrol — one of them for violations that included his admission that he picked up some shell casings fired by Compean and threw them into the ditch, where they were never found.

Compean testified he fired at Aldrete as he ran off because he thought Aldrete turned his body toward the agent and appeared to have something "black, shiny" in his hand that Compean believed was a gun. One of the agents who received immunity testified he saw Compean fire several times with his handgun, reload and fire some more.

Ramos testified that he heard gunfire, saw Compean on the ground and fired once because, "I believed I saw a gun."

The agents claimed they did not believe they hit Aldrete because he fled into Mexico. The trial documents say Compean fired 14 times, and that the final shot fired by Ramos was the one that hit Aldrete in the buttocks.

The documents also said Ramos and Compean turned back toward the drainage ditch after the shooting and that Compean picked up some shell casings and threw them into the ditch. The reports they wrote did not mention the shooting.

Border Patrol policy on firearm discharges requires agents to verbally report such incidents within an hour to a supervisor. That didn't happen, the trial documents said, although the agents claimed they did.

The shooting investigation did not start until two weeks later, when Aldrete's family reported it to the relatives of another Border Patrol agent in Arizona who is originally from the El Paso area. That agent made inquiries that resulted in the Homeland Security Department's Office of Inspector General launching an administrative probe.

One thing not directly mentioned in the public records is that Aldrete was named in a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration report as the alleged transporter of another 750 pounds of marijuana while he waited to testify at the border agents' trial. The November 2005 report identified Aldrete as the person responsible for stashing the marijuana in a van parked at a house in Clint, also east of El Paso, in October 2005, according to a story published Tuesday by the Inland Valley Daily Bulletin of Ontario, Calif.

U.S. District Judge Kathleen Cardone limited the defense's ability to question Aldrete about his alleged criminal activity in detail, ruling that such information would be prejudicial.

Prosecutors gave Aldrete limited use immunity, which shielded him from prosecution for his acts on the day he was shot. Additionally, no charges were filed in the October 2005 incident, infuriating the backers of Compean and Ramos. They claim the immunity deal he was originally given shows it extended beyond Feb. 17, 2005.

A civilian group in California, Friends of the Border Patrol, called for Sutton, his prosecutors and the judge to be fired. Cardone, appointed for life like all federal district judges, had no comment.

"It's clear this was a witch hunt," said the group's head, Andy Ramirez. "They protected a doper."

"We cannot comment about matters that are under seal or ongoing investigations," Sutton said in a statement. "This office will pursue criminal charges where there is prosecutable criminal activity and competent evidence to prove it.

"We have clearly stated that the immunity necessarily afforded to Aldrete in the investigation and trial of Ramos and Compean for the February 17 (2005) incident would not extend to any subsequent or future criminal activity that may be alleged."

At Bush's side

Sutton calls the criticism "ironic," given his office's track record. Justice Department data shows his office last year led the nation's 94 federal districts in drug prosecutions and was second in prosecuting immigration cases.

Sutton has dealt with pressure before, albeit in a less serious role. As a left fielder for the University of Texas — where he said expectations were high — he played on the same baseball team with pitching great Roger Clemens that won the College World Series in 1983.

After choosing a career in law, he worked in the Harris County District Attorney's Office for eight years. It led to positions as Bush rose politically. When Bush was governor of Texas, Sutton served as his criminal justice policy director from 1995 to 2000.

Sutton later was a policy coordinator for the Bush-Cheney transition team before joining the Justice Department as an associate deputy attorney general.

Bush appointed Sutton as U.S. attorney in late 2001. He serves as the chairman of the Attorney General's Advisory Committee, a 17-member body picked by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. The committee plays a significant role in determining Justice policies and programs and in carrying out the national goals set by the administration.

Despite Sutton's closeness to Bush, some observers note that the fired U.S. attorneys were also appointed by Bush originally. Last week, New Mexico's David Iglesias publicly claimed to have been forced out after refusing a request by two congressmen to rush an indictment that could have helped Republicans in last November's election. Iglesias has refused to identify the two.

The Justice Department staunchly denied the charge that Iglesias or any of the eight federal prosecutors were dismissed for political reasons, according to the Associated Press.

U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be fired for any reason — or none at all.

DOJ_NMG_0139985

Given those circumstances, Carl W. Tobias, a law professor for the University of Richmond in Virginia, said it wouldn't be a stretch to assume that other prosecutors might not rest easy.

"The question is whether the Justice Department will listen to these people who are arguing for his removal," Tobias said of Sutton. "Whether they can get to him and whether the Justice Department would even listen, I don't know, but that's the kind of thing U.S. attorneys are worried about."

Inmates Will Replace Wary Migrants In Colorado Fields (NYT)

By Dan Frosch

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

DENVER, March 3 — As migrant laborers flee Colorado because of tough new immigration restrictions, worried farmers are looking to prisoners to fill their places in the fields.

In a pilot program run by the state Corrections Department, supervised teams of low-risk inmates beginning this month will be available to harvest the swaths of sweet corn, peppers and melons that sweep the southeastern portion of the state.

Under the program, which has drawn criticism from groups concerned about immigrants' rights and from others seeking changes in the criminal justice system, farmers will pay a fee to the state, and the inmates, who volunteer for the work, will be paid about 60 cents a day, corrections officials said.

Concerned about the possible shortage of field labor, Dorothy B. Butcher, a state representative from Pueblo and a supporter of the program, said, "The workers on these farms do the weeding, the harvesting, the storing, everything that comes with growing crops for the market."

"If we can't sustain our work force, we're going to be in trouble," said Ms. Butcher, a Democrat.

The program will make its debut in Pueblo County, where farmers have been hit hard by the labor shortage. Frank Sobolik, director of a Colorado State University extension program that works with farmers in Pueblo County, said he expected that about half of the 300 migrant workers employed by area farms might not return this season.

"There's a feeling, a perception that these laborers won't be back because it's safer for them to find work in other states," Mr. Sobolik said. "The farmers are really concerned. These are high-value crops we're talking about here with a high labor requirement."

Last year, the Colorado General Assembly passed tough legislation that included giving local law enforcement broader powers to check immigration status and restricting access to social services for workers without proper documentation.

The Colorado Immigrant Rights Coalition estimates that there are 150,000 illegal immigrants in Colorado, many of them involved in agriculture. Migrant workers typically travel here from Mexico, Texas and New Mexico for the crop season, where their labor can last from May through the late fall, before returning home to their families. But those numbers could soon be reduced drastically, as workers who are in the country illegally are unwilling to risk exposing their status.

Joe Pisciotta Jr., who owns a 700-acre produce farm in Pueblo County, said he had about 20 workers and expected to lose half of them. Mr. Pisciotta, a third-generation farmer, worried that such a reduction would undercut his ability to supply buyers with the watermelons, onions and pumpkins he grows.

"It's very frustrating," he said. "I'm definitely going to lose customers. We've never had an issue like this. With all of us trying to get enough workers on our farms, I'm worried this is going to turn into farmer against farmer."

Although chain gangs and prison farms have long been staples of American correctional culture, the concept of inmates working on private farms is unusual. But there are signs that other states are following suit. The Iowa Department of Corrections is considering a similar program because of a migrant labor shortage in that state.

Several Iowa farmers called recently to request inmates in lieu of migrant workers, said Roger Baysden, the director of the state's prison industries program. One farmer asked for as many as 200 inmates, Mr. Baysden said.

In Colorado, Ms. Butcher said she hoped that the program, which could send up to 100 inmates to Pueblo County farmers, would remedy a situation that might otherwise turn into an economic disaster.

Immigrant rights group, however, said the Colorado program was myopic.

"Many immigrants are leaving Colorado for other states that will actually embrace their contributions as good citizens and hard workers," said Julien Ross, state coordinator for the Colorado Immigrant Rights Coalition. "This exodus from Colorado has profound negative consequences on our economy and the very fabric of our society."

Mr. Ross said his group was organizing a weeklong boycott of Colorado businesses beginning March 25 to demonstrate the workers' impact on the regional economy.

A group calling for changes in sentencing, the Colorado Criminal Justice Reform Coalition, is also uneasy about the program. The group views the inmates' pay as problematic.

DOJ_NMG_0139986

"This feels like the re-invention of the plantation," said Christie Donner, the group's executive director. "You have a captive labor force essentially working for their room and board in order to benefit the employer. This isn't a job training program. It's an exploitative program."

But Ari Zavaras, executive director of the Colorado Department of Corrections, said the merit of a hard day's work outdoors was invaluable to an inmate.

"They won't be paid big bucks, but we're hoping this will help our inmates pick up significant and valuable job skills," Mr. Zavaras said. "We're also assisting farmers who, if they don't get help, are facing an inability to harvest their crops."

With the start of the farming season looming, Colorado's farmers are scrambling to figure out which crops to sow and in what quantity. Some are considering turning to field corn, which is mechanically harvested. And they are considering whether they want to pay for an urban inmate who could not single out a ripe watermelon or discern between a weed and an onion plant.

"This is not a cure-all," Mr. Pisciotta said. "What our farm laborers do is a skill. They're born with it, and they're good at it. It's not an easy job."

Americans Selling Personal Identity To Illegal Aliens (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

HARLINGEN, Texas (AP) -- Asked by a federal judge why she sold her birth certificate, Rosie Medellin said she needed a few bucks and didn't really think it through. Bobby Joe Flores said he sold his identification documents to buy drugs. Margarita Moya and her son did it to raise money for medicine for a loved one.

Their documents were destined for illegal aliens.

In all, seven defendants pleaded guilty in Corpus Christi last week to charges of selling their birth certificates and Social Security cards for $100 each. Seven other defendants pleaded guilty to buying or reselling those documents as part of a ring that sold documents to illegal aliens seeking jobs in Dodge City, Kan.

The federal government's attention has been on stolen or fabricated identity documents, and officials say they know little about people who sell their own legitimate documents.

Defense attorneys said prosecution for selling an ID may be something new.

"I've been practicing criminal law for years and this is the first I've seen in our Southern District," said Grant Jones, who represents a roofer with sporadic employment. "If they've (the government) been aware in the past, they've now decided to enforce the law."

However, Mr. Jones said his client told him that document selling was a well-known way to earn a quick buck.

Prosecutors declined to talk about the case until a sentencing hearing in May before U.S. District Judge Hayden Head Jr. in Corpus Christi. The defendants face anywhere from probation to five years in prison.

Government raids at meatpacking plants in six states in December stemmed from an investigation that uncovered up to 4,300 workers with questionable documentation.

Tim Counts, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman in Bloomington, Minn., said that investigation revealed documents were available for a price in places as open as Kmart parking lots. He said genuine documents were the most expensive, costing up to $1,500, and the most effective against detection.

"We don't have an all-inclusive picture of it," Mr. Counts said. "What we do have is evidence and information from individual cases. ... We definitely know it happens."

The issue also has turned up elsewhere.

In June, a man pleaded guilty in Concord, N.H., to selling five genuine Texas birth certificates and six Social Security cards to informants. Three years earlier, 10 people in Beardstown, Ill., were charged with receiving or transferring real documents that originated in Texas. In August 2002, a man in Green Bay, Wis., was charged with intent to sell documents including genuine Puerto Rican birth certificates and Social Security cards.

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said there isn't much specific information on the extent of the problem.

"Irrespective of the mode of identity theft, the issue itself is prevalent and it's something we're striking at very aggressively," Mr. Knocke said.

Hope For Amends To Filipino Immigrants (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Bills to Speed Children's Moves to U.S., Give Military Pensions Show Political Assertion

DOJ_NMG_0139987

Amid the wrangling over immigration reform, virtually everyone in Congress appears to agree on one point: Filipino-born veterans who fought alongside U.S. troops during World War II deserve a break.

Denied the right to immigrate to the United States until 1990, they came hoping that their children could follow them here later, just as other groups have done. But the adult children have been required to wait twice as long -- up to 16 years -- as anyone else. With the veterans often too old and sick to travel home, many have died while waiting to be reunited with their families.

Now, after several longtime backers have risen to key positions in Congress, Filipino American advocates are hopeful that legislation will be pushed through to exempt the veterans' children from the immigration delay. They also are optimistic about a potentially more controversial bill that would grant Filipino veterans military pensions.

About 5,000 veterans in the United States would stand to benefit from a change in immigration provisions, and an additional 10,000 in the Philippines could be eligible for pensions.

To many in the 2-million-strong Filipino American community, the issue represents a chance to cement their political identity in a nation where they have long felt invisible, even though Filipinos rank second, behind Mexicans, in the number of immigrants living in the United States.

"Historically, we Filipinos have always been looked down on as your little brown brothers -- as these acquiescent people who would just accept anything Uncle Sam would do to them," said Jon Melegrito, communications director of the National Federation of Filipino American Associations. "This is about asserting who we are as a people and how we served this country. . . . It's a call to action to stop acting like colonial slaves and to start acting like first-class citizens."

The effort builds on an association with the United States that dates to 1898, when the United States acquired the Philippines from Spain after winning the Spanish-American War.

Laws and discriminatory practices against all Asian immigrants kept Filipino numbers in the United States low through the first half of the 1900s. But in the Philippines, many residents were taught English and raised to think of themselves as something akin to Americans.

Celestino Almeda, 90, a veteran who lives in Alexandria, remembered that the director of his elementary school in Manila led students in a pledge of allegiance to the American flag every morning.

"We also celebrated all the holidays: Washington's birthday, Armistice Day," Almeda said. "In our mind, it was like America was our mother country."

When Japan invaded the Philippines in 1941, more than 200,000 Filipinos joined Americans in waging a fierce resistance, enduring such horrors as the Bataan death march and the grueling guerrilla campaign that followed. Technically, the Filipino fighters were under overall U.S. command. But within months of the Allied victory, Congress stripped most of them of their rights as foreign veterans of U.S. forces -- including the opportunity to become U.S. citizens -- on the grounds that the Philippines was about to be granted independence.

Even so, the Philippines continued its close affiliation with the United States. Thousands of Filipinos joined the U.S. Navy, which until recently had major bases there. By 1970, there were more Filipinos in the U.S. Navy than in the Philippine Navy.

And, after 1965, when Congress repealed the nationality quota system that had practically prohibited Asians from immigrating, hundreds of thousands of Filipinos streamed in.

Ranging from unskilled workers and nannies to nurses and professionals who came in on occupational preference visas, the new arrivals immediately formed social, cultural and professional organizations. Before long, they were rising to prominent positions in government, unions and the military. Several won elected office, including in Prince George's County, where a sizable community settled.

Yet when it came to turning their clout into political activism on behalf of Filipino American causes, many of the immigrants hesitated, said Bing Cardenas Branigin, 50, a former regional chairman of the Filipino American federation.

"There was this sense that you shouldn't make trouble, that you shouldn't contradict the government," she said. "You should just pay your taxes and send your kids to school and keep quiet."

That began to change in the mid-1970s when anger spread over the repressive policies of the Filipino president, Ferdinand Marcos. As much as their opposition to Marcos galvanized the Filipino American community, it also caused rifts with those who supported Marcos.

After Marcos was ousted, community leaders looked to refocus their newfound energy on a more unifying issue. The fight for veterans' equity was a natural choice.

Since then, the veterans have won some of the benefits they lost after the war. Most notably, in 1990, Congress granted Filipino World War II veterans the same opportunity to naturalize offered to all other foreign nationals who served in the U.S. armed forces.

DOJ_NMG_0139988

But the Filipino veterans remain ineligible for a military pension, forcing many of the more than 24,000 elderly veterans who became U.S. citizens after 1990 to live off food stamps and Supplemental Security Income payments.

Joaquin Tejada, 84, a former guerrilla fighter who survived two years resisting the Japanese from jungle hideouts, said he now struggles to get by with his $545 monthly SSI check. The rent for the two-bedroom apartment he shares with another Filipino World War II veteran in Columbia Heights takes $275.

"By the end of the month, it's hard to buy even basic food," said Tejada, who proudly sported an American flag tie during an interview.

Then there is the 16-year wait veterans face if they wish to bring over their adult children, an unintended consequence of the 1965 law lifting the quotas that had prevented most Asians from immigrating.

In their place, Congress introduced a complicated system meant to offer every country the same number of family reunification visas. But because Filipino applicants far outnumber the yearly slots allotted to them, they face the longest delays -- 22 years to sponsor an adult brother or sister, for instance, compared with 11 years for applicants of most other nationalities.

Candida Romulo, 72, said she and her husband, Bayani, a veteran who became a lawyer in Manila, would not have naturalized and moved to Oxon Hill had they known that the wait to sponsor their grown children would be so long.

"We did it because we wanted to give them the opportunities of living in this country. It was going to be our gift to them," Romulo said during an interview in a living room crammed with photographs of her four children.

Soon after the couple's arrival, Bayani developed a medical condition requiring frequent dialysis, making visits to the Philippines impossible. Because of their pending residency applications, his children were unable to get visas to visit him.

When Bayani suffered a severe stroke in September, his eldest son wasn't able to relay his final words to his father over the phone before he died.

"The receiver couldn't reach his bed in the ICU," Candida Romulo said. "So I told my husband, 'Your son says that he loves you very much and that he's so proud that you are his father.' My husband couldn't speak, but I could tell that he understood, because there were tears in his eyes."

Now Romulo worries that her son may never gain entry to the United States, because if a sponsor dies while the visa application is pending, there is a chance that the application will be annulled.

But she said she is still praying that Congress will pass the legislation for the sake of those veterans who remain alive.

"If that happens, I know my husband will be very happy about it, even if he is already in heaven," she said.

Immigration Reform, Take 2 (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Learning the lessons of last year's debacle

ADVOCATES OF sweeping measures to reform the nation's broken-down muddle of an immigration policy are preparing to enter the fray once again: A new bill may be introduced in Congress as early as this week. This time hopes are high that the political map has changed just enough to make success a real possibility. Beware: Those hopes will be realized only if everyone involved in last year's debacle has drawn the right lessons from Congress's failure to enact a meaningful law.

What are the lessons? President Bush, who favored last year's Senate bill but went limp when it came under attack by anti-reform forces in the House, should note that passivity in the face of his own party's hard-liners is a prescription for further disappointment. Republican leaders in the House, who killed last year's legislation, should conclude that they gained nothing by trying to whip up the party base with misleading talk of an "amnesty" for illegal immigrants -- and probably alienated droves of coveted Hispanic voters at the elections in November.

As for Democrats, who have squabbled among themselves but now run Congress, they must take note of an opportunity staring them in the face. They have a chance to exercise leadership and score a victory on a major domestic policy problem.

The early signs are generally encouraging. The authors of the most realistic legislation in the last Congress -- Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.), and Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Luis V. Gutierrez (D-Ill.) -- are again preparing to introduce a bipartisan bill. As for Mr. Bush, he has also sounded the right notes by calling in his State of the Union address for a "legal and orderly path for foreign workers to enter our country," and for resolving the status of more than 11 million illegal immigrants already here, "without animosity and without amnesty." Still, the president's fuzziness is worrying. He did not mention a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country in the State of the Union speech, and two of his Cabinet secretaries sidestepped it during recent testimony on Capitol Hill. It may be that their intent was to avoid, for now, inciting the hornets' nest of opponents to eventual citizenship. But without addressing the question frontally and without providing avenues by which the nation's underclass of undocumented workers may one day emerge from the legal shadows, the chances of an effective fix for immigration are nil.

DOJ_NMG_0139989

To have a hope of success, both as legislation and as policy, immigration reform must also establish much tougher domestic controls and sanctions for employers; means by which they can verify prospective workers' status; and counterfeit-proof identity documents for workers. There must be a process by which new immigrants can come here legally in sufficient numbers to satisfy the obvious economic demand for them and according to rules that ensure that they will not become a permanent underclass. Time is short. Chances for a reform package will fade as the 2008 presidential campaign approaches. Let's hope that all the players take to heart last year's lessons as this year's debate is joined.

Illegal Immigrants -- They're Money (LAT)

Gregory Rodriguez

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Bank of American is right to treat them as legitimate participants in our economy.

DAN STEIN, the premier American nativist and president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, is shocked, shocked. He's mad at Bank of America for issuing credit cards to illegal immigrants. He says that to BofA "and other large corporations, illegal immigrants are a source of low-wage labor and an untapped customer market." You bet they are, and that's the American way.

Sure, I'm proud to be a citizen of a nation that portrays itself as a refuge for the "tired," "the poor" and the "huddled masses yearning to breathe free." But let's face it, Emma Lazarus, the poet who wrote those words, may have laid it on a bit thick. The truth, no less beautiful in its way, is a little more crass and self-serving. But it wouldn't have sounded nearly as poetic to say, "bring us your able-bodied, poor, hardworking masses yearning for a chance to climb out of poverty, establish a credit history and…. " We all love to rhapsodize about immigrants' embrace of the American dream, but it's more like a hard-nosed American deal — you come here, you work your tail off under grueling conditions, and you can try your damnedest to better your lot over time.

In their generational struggle for acceptance and security, from outsider to insider and, dare I say, from exploited to exploiter, immigrants could avail themselves of those inalienable rights that stand at the core of our national political philosophy — life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

But that, of course, was before the invention of illegal immigration.

Until the early 1900s, pretty much anybody who wasn't diseased, a criminal, a prostitute, a pauper, an anarchist or a Chinese laborer could gain entrance to the U.S. Between 1880 and 1914, only 1% of a total of 25 million European immigrants were excluded from this country. But after transatlantic crossings had already been halted by World War I, Congress buckled to anti-foreign sentiment and closed the proverbial Golden Door by passing a series of restrictionist laws in 1917, 1921 and 1924.

Yet even as the historical front door of the nation was being closed, business interests were busy prying open a new side-door. Only three months after the passage of the Immigration Act of 1917, which required all newcomers to pass a literacy test and pay a head tax, the U.S. secretary of Commerce waived the regulations for Mexican workers. Thus began America's dishonorable relationship with Mexican immigrant labor.

*

FOR THE NEXT several decades, Mexican workers were brought in when the economy expanded and kicked out when times got bad. They were recruited in the 1920s, only to be deported in the 1930s. They were brought in again during the labor shortage in the 1940s. By the 1950s, one branch of the government recruited Mexican workers, under the illusion that they were "temporary," while another sought to keep them out.

The piece de resistance in the creation of the illegal immigrant is the Immigration Act of 1965. Although touted as a great piece of liberal legislation that ended discriminatory immigration barriers, it imposed an annual cap on migrants from the Western Hemisphere that was 40% less than the number that had been arriving yearly before 1965. A decade later, Congress placed a 20,000 limit per country in this hemisphere.

In other words, after importing millions of Mexicans over the decades, particularly during the bracero guest-worker program from 1942 to 1963, and establishing well-trod routes to employment north of the border, the U.S. drastically reduced the number of visas available to Mexicans. This reduction, of course, coincided with a rapid rise in Mexico's population. And guess what? When jobs were available on this side of the border, Mexicans just kept coming, whether they had papers or not.

Clearly, today as ever, mass migration to the U.S. is being driven by economic need — the immigrants' and our economy's. But the hard-nosed American deal has become unfair because, on top of the handicaps we have always imposed on new arrivals, we've added a rather brutal one — criminal status. Good luck with that pursuit of happiness as you engage in backbreaking labor when your place in society is summed up with that one cutting word, "illegal."

No, I'm not advocating open borders. Nor do I believe that immigrants should be guaranteed anything but a chance to achieve their end of the nation's cruel bargain. For hardworking illegal immigrants who've established roots here, we should uphold our end of the bargain and give them a chance to achieve their piece of the American dream. BofA is not wrong to give illegal immigrants the tools with which to compete legitimately in the marketplace. We as a nation are wrong for treating all these people as illegitimate.

DOJ_NMG_0139990

*

grodriguez@latimescolumnists.com

TAX:

The Untaxed Rich, Found And Then Lost (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

FALSE advertising is part of the problem, and it's right there in the name: alternative minimum tax.

"Minimum," when the tax was conceived, meant that even the wealthiest Americans, with their buffet of deductions, loopholes and shelters, would still pay some income tax.

"Alternative," added to the name of the tax 21 years ago, suggests a choice, but it's not much of one for one in four taxpayers this year who must pay using this calculation unless Congress comes up with a different "alternative" when it takes up the matter this week.

What happened between 1969, when the minimum tax was born, and today, when it has few champions — and many people scratching their heads? And how could it be that a tax aimed squarely at rich investors who paid no income tax now hits middle-class families?

The '69 version of the tax was more or less what it set out to be, right or wrong. And that was a remedy to the disclosure by the Johnson administration that 155 rich families some of whom made millions in 1966 had not paid any taxes — taxes that for other Americans were rising to pay for the Vietnam War. If deductions like the ones for owning oil wells and leasing rail cars had whittled some tax bills down to nothing, these rich earners would be required to pay something.

But in 1986, when President Ronald Reagan and both parties on Capitol Hill agreed to a major change in the tax system, the law was subtly changed to aim at a wholly different set of deductions, the ones that everyone gets, like the personal exemption, state and local taxes, the standard deduction, certain expenses like union dues and even some medical costs for the seriously ill. At the same time it removed and revised some of the exotic investment deductions. A law for untaxed rich investors was refocused on families who own their homes in high tax states.

Taxes are now calculated two ways — using the traditional income tax formula, and using the 1986 alternative tax formula — and taxpayers owe the higher of the two numbers. The majority of families with two or more children earning $75,000 to $500,000 now owe more under the alternative tax — anywhere from hundreds of dollars to tens of thousands of dollars annually. Among such families with an adjusted gross income of $75,000 to $100,000, almost 80 percent are affected, compared with just a third of those with incomes of $1 million or more, according to computer modeling studies by the Tax Policy Center, a joint venture of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute.

Repealing the alternative minimum tax would cost the government almost $70 billion this year, while putting everyone on the alternative and repealing the regular income tax would cost only $63 billion.

Simply removing personal tax exemptions and credits and indexing for inflation would reduce the number of taxpayers affected by 85 percent, the center estimated. That would retain the few, weakened provisions still in effect from the 1969 law intended to tax the rich.

For now, the only area of wide agreement is to keep enacting temporary patches until Congress and some future administration tackle fundamental changes in the tax code.

Regardless, until another course is chosen, a law focused on rich investors who paid little or no tax is now a law that affects 23.4 million of the nation's 90 million taxpayers.

The story began on Jan. 17, 1969, three days before the Johnson administration was to end. Joseph W. Barr, who served only a few weeks as Treasury secretary, told a Congressional panel about the 155 families who paid no income tax, despite incomes of $1 million or more in today's dollars.

Mr. Barr's report made the front page of newspapers across the country the next morning and fueled debates in coffee shops, police stations and across kitchen tables. Congress in 1969 received more letters about these untaxed Americans than it did about Vietnam, according to Michael Graetz, a Yale Law School professor and tax adviser in the George H. W. Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0139991

While the idea of paying your fair share as a moral issue may seem strange today, it was central to tax debates in that era. The disclosure that some of those who had gained the most by living in the United States did not share in the costs of the war infuriated many taxpayers.

But in 1986, when the '69 remedy was fundamentally changed, there was virtually no news coverage because at the time the changes affected only a few people. The initial amount of deductions before the new alternative minimum tax kicked in was set so high that in the first year it raised only the $1.7 billion needed to plug a hole in President Reagan's budget.

The alternative tax's long-term effect was given no more consideration than, say, the exemptions on fuel-economy standards the government in the 1960s gave to sport utilities — vehicles that at the time were far less common and were used mostly for work that required hauling.

Since its inception, the alternative tax has raised more and more revenue each year, reducing the perennial federal budget deficits. Indeed, President Bush's 2001 income tax cut plan was premised on taking back a third of the tax cut through increasing alternative minimum tax revenues.

Left unchanged, the alternative tax this year will take back about 27 percent of the Bush tax cuts, mostly from people making $75,000 to $500,000, the Tax Policy Center calculated. The center's estimates are held in high regard by the administration and by administration critics.

Two major factors now push people into the alternative system. One is that the alternative tax rate of 21 percent in 1986 was raised in 1993 to rates of 26 and 28 percent, in tandem with the increased rates in the regular tax system that President Bill Clinton sponsored. This held the spread between the two systems steady, Professor Graetz said.

But when Mr. Bush sponsored his tax cuts in 2001, they applied only to the regular tax system, narrowing the spread and pushing many more people into the alternative system.

Because those on the alternative system cannot deduct state and local taxes, their marginal tax rates are often above 40 percent, a level many economists say is high enough to discourage earning more and to encourage cheating. Many of these taxpayers also lose the benefits of the lower capital gains and dividend rates that President Bush championed as tools for economic growth.

Professor Graetz says that a second factor is inflation, which has eroded the value of the exemption from the alternative tax, pushing millions of people into it. The dollar has lost more than 44 percent of its value since 1986.

Meanwhile the stated goal of the original tax is not being met under the successor tax enacted 21 years ago. A far greater number of well-off families still pay only small amounts of tax. More than 41,000 taxpayers with incomes of $200,000 or more in 2003, the last year for which figures are available, paid less than 10 percent of their income in individual income taxes. And the number of untaxed high-income families — once 155 — grew to 2,824.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Children's Health Care On Agenda (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Divisions Surface as Congress Works to Renew Program

The success of the decade-old Children's Health Insurance Program is exposing Washington's familiar ideological divisions over health care as Congress begins to work on renewing the state-federal program.

Members of both parties want to continue the popular $5 billion-a-year effort, which at any given time provides health insurance to more than 4 million children from lower-income families that do not qualify for Medicaid but cannot afford insurance on their own. But Republicans and Democrats cannot agree on how much money the program should get, and whom it should cover.

The conflicts track long-standing divisions over the proper role of government in health care, with Democrats generally favoring more activist attempts to ensure that everyone has access and Republicans supporting a more limited role that focuses on helping the neediest.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office and other analysts estimate that the program, known as SCHIP, will require $13 billion to $15 billion above current funding levels just to keep covering the same number of children for the next five years. The Bush administration has proposed $4.8 billion, saying that is enough to maintain enrollment for "priority low-income children."

Many Democrats on Capitol Hill and advocates for children call the White House proposal inadequate, but the dispute is about more than numbers. Some Democrats, in control of Congress for the first time since 1994, would like to increase funding levels by as much as $50 billion over five years to extend coverage to many of the nation's 8.3 million uninsured children -- and to some uninsured parents and childless adults as well.

DOJ_NMG_0139992

One possible source of money is the nearly $65 billion that the CBO says could be saved by erasing the gap between what the government pays private insurers that operate Medicare HMOs and what it pays doctors and hospitals for traditional fee-for-service care. A Medicare advisory panel reported Thursday that federal payments to the HMOs are an average of 12 percent higher.

"A lot of states, including my own, have more kids that are eligible for the program but are not enrolled that we'd like to reach out to," Rep. Frank Pallone Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on health, said Thursday in an interview during a break in a hearing on the program. "I don't understand what the president is doing. . . . If he's going to hold to his commitment that he wants to cover the uninsured, this is the best way to do it. I would ask that he not look at this from an ideological perspective, and maybe not like it because it's a government program. Look at it practically -- it's working."

But President Bush and many congressional Republicans, wary of creeping growth in a federal social program, say the program is losing its way. They note that 14 states have taken advantage of the program's flexibility to cover not just children but also 639,000 adults, according to the Government Accountability Office. States such as Arizona, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin covered more adults than children in 2005, the GAO found.

Moreover, seven states cover children from families that earn as much as 300 percent of the federal poverty level or more, or $61,950 for a family of four. Bush and some GOP lawmakers argue that the program should focus on children from families at or below 200 percent of the poverty level, or $41,300 for a family of four.

"I fear that using these limited federal dollars for adults has undermined coverage for low-income children," said Charles E. Grassley (Iowa), the ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee. "The issue is not whether or not coverage for adults is desirable: It is. The issue is not whether or not coverage for adults is beneficial for the family: It is. . . . The issue is whether SCHIP funds used to cover adults have drained resources targeted by Congress for kids."

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said last week that the program, which must be reauthorized by the end of September, should not be "the engine that pulls the train of a national health insurance program."

The partisan divisions do not carry over to state leaders. When a federal program is funded jointly with the states, governors generally prefer to see more money from Washington -- regardless of political affiliation. More than a dozen governors of both parties last week urged the White House and Congress to approve more funding for the program, including an immediate $745 million infusion to head off projected shortfalls this year in Maryland and 13 other states.

Continued funding is vital for people such as Craig and Kim Lee Bedford of Baltimore, who at a Senate committee hearing last month said that they struggled to pay high monthly private insurance premiums for their five children until they learned they were eligible for the federal program in 2004.

"We no longer have to decide whether a child is really sick enough to warrant a doctor's visit," said Kim Bedford, whose husband is an insurance agent. "We no longer have to decide whether a child really needs a certain medication prescribed by his pediatrician. . . . The times when we would have to make medical decisions for our children based on financial criteria were extremely stressful as parents, full of those impossible choices. Those are not the kinds of choices that parents in a society as advanced and as resourced as ours should be forced to make."

A Boy's Death (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

How could a toothache have such a tragic outcome?

THE WHAT-IFS of Deamonte Driver's short life are heartbreaking. Just 12 years old, the Prince George's County boy died last week because of a succession of breakdowns in a system set up to ensure that children get basic dental care that is critical to their health. Equally tragic is that there are many more children like Deamonte who are at risk.

Deamonte's death, as reported by The Post's Mary Otto, happened because he didn't get timely treatment for a decaying tooth. Bacteria from the problem tooth migrated to his brain, and after two operations and more than six weeks in the hospital, he died. Deamonte's death should be more than mourned. It should serve as a call to strengthen the safety net -- and the first step is not blaming the victim. We have been taken aback by the ire some have directed at the boy's mother.

Obviously there is always parental responsibility, but, as children's health advocates will attest, the real issues are with the system. The states, the federal government and the dental profession have to do more. Medicaid requires dental coverage for children who qualify. But there aren't enough dentists willing to either treat children (think of Deamonte's brother whose dental treatment was stopped when he squirmed too much) or to accept Medicaid. This is a nationwide problem; states such as Virginia and Tennessee have developed robust programs to increase the number of dentists willing to serve the needs of people on the margins.

DOJ_NMG_0139993

Another solution is expanding the reach of public health: The Maryland legislature should approve a bill to increase public dental clinics by allocating $6 million over three years.

Although not required, most states provide dental care under the State Children's Health Insurance Program to low-income children who don't qualify for Medicaid. That act is now up for reauthorization. Congress would do well to include dental care in the menu of benefits, as well as help out states that face budget shortfalls. Those worried about cost should think about Deamonte. The loss of his life is immeasurable, but it's worth noting that the cost of his care is likely to top $250,000. There can't be a more vivid reminder of how shortsighted our system is in not fostering access to preventive health care that saves not only money but lives.

Nuclear Warhead Plan Draws Opposition (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Some Lawmakers Are Against New Weapon, While Others Seek Justification

The selection of a basic design for what could become a new generation of U.S. nuclear warheads has drawn immediate opposition from some key members of Congress.

The National Nuclear Security Administration announced on Friday that it had selected a design by the California-based Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory for the Reliable Replacement Warhead (RRW). It would be the first of a new generation of secure and reliable nuclear warheads initially intended for the Navy's submarine-launched intercontinental ballistic missiles.

Within the next 12 months, a team from Livermore and the Navy is to put together cost estimates and an engineering and production plan that would be presented to Congress next year for approval, according to acting NNSA Administrator Thomas P. D'Agostino.

Rep. Peter J. Visclosky (D-Ind.), the new chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee that controls the funds for the nuclear weapons complex, has sharply questioned why a new warhead is needed. Saying the NNSA announcement "puts the cart before the horse," he called on the Bush administration to present a "clear, coherent national policy" to justify the new warhead.

Visclosky said he plans to hold oversight hearings and may seek to slow or eliminate the RRW if the administration does not present a strategy "that defines the future mission, the emerging threats, and the specific U.S. nuclear stockpile necessary to achieve the strategic goals."

The same subcommittee, under the previous chairman, Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), helped eliminate the Bush administration's plan to develop a nuclear "bunker buster" weapon and, instead, initiated a program to upgrade the reliability of the current stockpile of Cold War weapons. The Bush administration turned this into a program to develop a new nuclear warhead.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a longtime opponent of new nuclear weapons, has declared that she is "100 percent opposed" to building the RRW. A member of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that funds the nuclear complex, she said in a statement: "While I appreciate the fact that Lawrence Livermore was selected, this in no way answers my questions about the Reliable Replacement Warhead program."

She questioned how other countries would view the U.S. effort to develop new nuclear weapons at the same time that the United States is pushing Iran, North Korea and other countries to drop nuclear weapons programs. "What worries me is that the minute you begin to put more sophisticated warheads on the existing fleet, you are essentially creating a new nuclear weapon. And it's just a matter of time before other nations do the same thing," she said.

D'Agostino told reporters on Friday that the RRW "is not about starting a new nuclear arms race." He said the program would use a warhead design that was tested in the 1980s but package it with new features, such as insensitive high explosives less liable to explode by accident, as well as locking devices that would prevent the warhead from being used if it fell into the hands of terrorists.

There is congressional support for the warhead development. Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services subcommittee on strategic forces, which also has jurisdiction over the weapons program, said she is "encouraged" by the NNSA decision. But she added that it "is only an early step in what will be a long evaluation process."

With the design going to Livermore, located in her district, Tauscher said the NNSA and the Pentagon "appear to have followed Congress's clear directions." She said her subcommittee's first hearings on the RRW will take place this week.

Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R) of New Mexico, home of Los Alamos National Laboratory, whose design lost out to Livermore's, said: "The important thing is that we're taking a step forward with the RRW to transform and reduce our stockpile, improve security and reliability, and lower the life-cycle cost." He hinted that this may only be the first of a series of RRWs, saying, "One system is not equivalent to a transformation, and we need to move on a second design competition."

DOJ_NMG_0139994

Although Livermore's warhead is designed to be carried by a Navy intercontinental ballistic missile, the NNSA and the Pentagon are about to begin a study to determine what elements are needed for an RRW that would be carried by an Air Force ICBM.

FDA Rules Override Warnings About Drug (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Cattle Antibiotic Moves Forward Despite Fears of Human Risk

The government is on track to approve a new antibiotic to treat a pneumonia-like disease in cattle, despite warnings from health groups and a majority of the agency's own expert advisers that the decision will be dangerous for people.

The drug, called cefquinome, belongs to a class of highly potent antibiotics that are among medicine's last defenses against several serious human infections. No drug from that class has been approved in the United States for use in animals.

The American Medical Association and about a dozen other health groups warned the Food and Drug Administration that giving cefquinome to animals would probably speed the emergence of microbes resistant to that important class of antibiotics, as has happened with other drugs. Those super-microbes could then spread to people.

Echoing those concerns, the FDA's advisory board last fall voted to reject the request by InterVet Inc. of Millsboro, Del., to market the drug for cattle.

Yet by all indications, the FDA will approve cefquinome this spring. That outcome is all but required, officials said, by a recently implemented "guidance document" that codifies how to weigh the threats to human health posed by proposed new animal drugs.

The wording of "Guidance for Industry #152" was crafted within the FDA after a long struggle. In the end, the agency adopted language that, for drugs like cefquinome, is more deferential to pharmaceutical companies than is recommended by the World Health Organization.

Cefquinome's seemingly inexorable march to market shows how a few words in an obscure regulatory document can sway the government's approach to protecting public health.

Industry representatives say they trust Guidance #152's calculation that cefquinome should be approved. "There is reasonable certainty of no harm to public health," Carl Johnson, InterVet's director of product development, told the FDA last fall.

Others say Guidance #152 makes it too difficult for the FDA to say no to some drugs.

"The industry says that 'until you show us a direct link to human mortality from the use of these drugs in animals, we don't think you should preclude their use,' " said Edward Belongia, an epidemiologist at the Marshfield Clinic Research Foundation in Wisconsin. "But do we really want to drive more resistance genes into the human population? It's easy to open the barn door, but it's hard to close the door once it's open."

The FDA knows how hard it can be to close that door. In the mid-1990s, overriding the objections of public health experts from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), the drug agency approved the marketing of two drugs, Baytril and SaraFlox, for use in poultry. Both are fluoroquinolones, a class of drugs important for their ability to fight the bioterror bacterium that causes anthrax and a food-borne bacterium called campylobacter, which causes a serious diarrheal disease in people.

Before long, doctors began finding fluoroquinolone-resistant strains of campylobacter in patients hospitalized with severe diarrhea. When studies showed a link to poultry, the FDA sought a ban. But while Abbott Laboratories, which made SaraFlox, pulled its product, Baytril's manufacturer, Bayer Corp., pushed back.

"They fought this tooth and nail. It took years," said Kirk Smith, an epidemiologist at the Minnesota Department of Health.

Finally, late in 2005, Bayer gave up, but not before fluoroquinolone resistance had spread even further.A Question of Resistance

Microbes are constantly mutating, and some of those mutations happen to confer immunity to one drug or another. Exacerbating the problem, bacteria constantly exchange bits of DNA with each other, spreading that resistance.

Given those realities, experts agree that all antibiotics should be used judiciously.

"If a drug is used less, then less resistance emerges," said Patricia Griffin, chief of intestinal disease epidemiology for the CDC.

Prudence is especially important for medicines of last resort, which is why the cefquinome application stirred such a storm.

Cefquinome is a fourth-generation cephalosporin, the most recent of several steadily improving versions of the cephalosporin family of antibiotics. Only one medicine from that family has been approved in the United States -- a powerful human drug called cefepime (brand name Maxipime), which is the only effective treatment for serious infections in cancer patients and a reliable lifesaver against several other nearly invincible infections.

DOJ_NMG_0139995

InterVet developed cefquinome to treat bovine respiratory disease, the most common disease in cattle. Recognizing the potential public health implications of using a close cousin of cefepime in animals, the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine, which oversees animal drug approvals, convened its expert advisers in September.

One of the first things the group learned was that more than a dozen medicines are already on the market for the respiratory syndrome, and all are still effective.

"If we have no susceptibility problem, why do we need one more new drug?" asked James E. Leggett Jr., a professor of medicine at Oregon Health & Science University, whom the FDA brought in as a consultant on the cefquinome question.

The panel also learned that the disease would be a relatively minor issue but for the stressful conditions under which U.S. cattle are raised, including high-density living spaces and routine shipment on crowded trains for hundreds or thousands of miles. Those "production dynamics" suppress the animals' immune systems, explained feedlot consultant Kelly Lechtenberg of Oakland, Neb., and virtually guarantee that bovine respiratory disease will be a major problem.

Yet Stephen Sundlof, head of the FDA's Veterinary Medicine Center, told the panel members that under agency rules they should ignore those issues and consider only the language in Guidance #152.Flaws Seen in Rules

Guidance #152 is essentially a checklist of points to consider when weighing the potential human impact of a new animal drug.

After the Baytril debacle, the public health community embraced the idea of a guidance document. A formalized risk-assessment process promised to minimize the chances of making a bad regulatory call.

But a struggle ensued when the FDA hosted meetings to spell out the criteria to be used for measuring risk, often with veterinarians and veterinary drug companies on one side and doctors and public health experts on the other.

When differences could not be resolved after repeated drafts and months of work, the agency sidestepped some tough issues and adopted language that both sides agree can block approval of the most worrisome drugs -- those such as Baytril that are put in animal feed or water, and so are easily overused. But public health experts say the wording tilts the playing field toward industry for other kinds of drugs. They want to see it revised.

Most glaring, they say, is that the guidance makes it almost impossible to say no to a new animal drug unless it is likely to threaten the effectiveness of an antibiotic that is a critical player against food-borne illnesses. By contrast, the World Health Organization recommends saying no if approval would spur resistance to any antibiotic that is important for fighting "serious human disease" -- not just food-borne illnesses.

Cefquinome's primary threat is that it may undermine the usefulness of the closely related human drug, cefepime. But as it turns out, the FDA does not consider cefepime a front-line drug against food-borne infections. So although it is a highly important drug in human medicine generally -- and although the Infectious Diseases Society of America even recommends it against some food-borne bacteria -- that risk does not count under the terms of Guidance #152.

A related problem is that the guidance's definition of "food-borne" is conservative, said Margaret Mellon of the Union of Concerned Scientists, a science policy advocacy group. For example, most urinary tract infections are caused by intestinal bacteria acquired from food, and cefepime is prescribed for those infections. If the FDA counted those infections as food-borne, then the guidance's formula would call for rejecting cefquinome for cattle.

"But FDA didn't do that," Mellon said. "That restricted the analysis right there."

Moreover, the guidance does not take into account that when microbes become resistant to fourth-generation cephalosporins, they often gain resistance to third-generation versions, too.

Third-generation cephalosporins are among the only effective therapies for serious gastrointestinal diseases in children and are the sole therapies for many cases of meningitis. That means the emergence of resistance to fourth-generation cephalosporins "could have a much more far-reaching effect" than is considered under the terms of Guidance #152, John H. Powers, a medical officer at the FDA's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research, told the agency's panel of experts.How Great a Risk?

Richard Carnevale, vice president for scientific and regulatory affairs at the Animal Health Institute, which represents veterinary drugmakers, said critics should not presume that a dozen drugs effective against bovine respiratory syndrome are enough.

"It's not a question of whether there is a need or not," Carnevale said. "The answer is, there's always a need."

The institute contends that the risk to human health posed by animal antibiotics has been overblown.

Officials at InterVet declined several requests to be interviewed. In a statement, the company said it "fully supports the prudent use of antibiotics in animals."

DOJ_NMG_0139996

The statement also said that in Europe, fourth-generation cephalosporins similar to cefquinome have been used in animals for the past decade "without compromising the interests of public health."

Yet recent European data indicate that resistance against this class of antibiotics is on the rise.

An analysis of E. coli bacteria in pigs and other animals in Spain, published in December, found high levels of the resistance that renders fourth-generation cephalosporins useless. A January report from Britain documented similar resistance patterns emerging at 10 farms.

Microbes resistant to fourth-generation cephalosporins have also begun to pop up in European patients. Such resistance is virtually unknown in the United States, where fourth-generation cefepime has been used in patients since 1997. That suggests that the resistance emerging in Europe is a result of veterinary use, said Steve Roach of the Food Animal Concerns Trust, a Chicago public interest group.

Roach says he is concerned that history is about to repeat itself. U.S. cattle were free of bacteria resistant to third-generation cephalosporins in 1997, but by 2003 one of every five samples was resistant. "This is exactly what should be avoided with cefquinome," he said.Merely Suggestions

At the FDA advisory meeting in September, the agency's experts defied Guidance #152 and voted 6 to 4 against approval of cefquinome. But that day, and in follow-up interviews, Sundlof, the agency's veterinary chief, made it plain that the vote was "not binding."

"I think we all agreed . . . that Guidance for Industry #152 would be the criteria against which we would base our decisions on safety," Sundlof said at the meeting.

Concerned that the FDA is poised to approve cefquinome, Congress's only microbiologist recently wrote to the agency.

"Given the recent outbreaks of E. coli and other food borne illnesses across the nation, it is hardly the time to ignore the advice of scientists, and potentially impair our ability to treat deadly infections," wrote Rep. Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.), who chairs the House Rules Committee.

Yet, being realists, the FDA advisers in September said more than just no. They told the FDA that if it approves cefquinome, then it should at least impose limits to minimize the potential consequences. One suggestion was to explicitly preclude "off label" use of the drug -- that is, to tell veterinarians that it can be used only for bovine respiratory disease.

But Sundlof said that, under FDA rules, those decisions must be left up to veterinarians unless there is clear evidence that wider use is causing harm.

"We have to take a fairly legal interpretation," Sundlof said in an interview. "If we have no evidence of a problem, or sparse evidence, we would not be able to make the prohibition prior to approval."

However, raising a point that opponents do not find very reassuring, he noted: "As soon as we have the first glimpse of evidence that off-label use of a drug is causing resistance, we have the authority to prohibit off-label use."

The advisers also urged that as a condition of approval, the FDA should demand that InterVet provide annual reports on how much cefquinome was used and in which animals -- data that would help scientists detect links between the drug's use and patterns of resistance that emerge in people.

"Without reliable, meaningful data on the quantity of use, the purpose of use, the type, number and location of animals treated, it will be exceedingly difficult to interpret fluctuations in rates of resistance," said Susan Prolman of the Union of Concerned Scientists.

But Sundlof offered little hope for that outcome.

"That is information that would be useful to have," he said. But the agency does not have the authority to demand it.

Public Health Agency Linked To Chemical Industry (LAT)

By Marla Cone

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

The work of a federal risk-assessment center is guided by a company with manufacturing ties. Some scientists see bias.

For nearly a decade, a federal agency has been responsible for assessing the dangers that chemicals pose to reproductive health. But much of the agency's work has been conducted by a private consulting company that has close ties to the chemical industry, including manufacturers of a compound in plastics that has been linked to reproductive damage.

In 1998, the Center for the Evaluation of Risks to Human Reproduction was established within the National Institutes of Health to assess the dangers of chemicals and help determine which ones should be regulated. Sciences International, an Alexandria, Va., consulting firm that has been funded by more than 50 industrial companies, has played a key role in the center's activities, reviewing the risks of chemicals, preparing reports, and helping select members of its scientific review panel and setting their agendas, according to government and company documents.

DOJ_NMG_0139997

The company produces the first draft of the center's reports on the risks of chemicals, including a new one on bisphenol A, a widely used compound in polycarbonate plastic food containers, including baby bottles, as well as lining for food cans.

The center's work is considered important to public health because people are exposed to hundreds of chemicals that have been shown to skew the reproductive systems of newborn lab animals and could be causing similar damage in humans. Chemical companies and industry groups have staunchly opposed regulation of the compounds and have developed their own research to dispute studies by government and university scientists.

The bisphenol A report, which some scientists say has a pro-industry bias, is a public document scheduled for review by the center's scientific panel on Monday. Employees of Sciences International involved in writing it will preside over the meeting.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) and Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles) in a Wednesday letter called for an explanation of the company's role and disclosure of its potential conflicts of interest before the panel convenes Monday. Boxer chairs the Senate's environmental committee and Waxman chairs the House's government oversight and reform committee.

Sciences International executives declined to comment to The Times, referring all questions to the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences.

Michael Shelby, director of the federal reproductive health center, which is based in North Carolina's Research Triangle Park, also declined to discuss Sciences International.

But Robin Mackar, a spokeswoman for the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, which oversees the reproductive center, said Sciences International "has worked for the center since 1998 without any problems" and has participated in reports on 17 chemicals.

"These contractors have no decision-making or analytical responsibilities," she said.

But according to company and government websites and Federal Register documents, Sciences International is involved in management and plays a principal scientific investigative role at the federal center. The company has a $5-million contract with the center, according to an NIEHS document.

"The most significant project at our firm is the management of the National Toxicology Program's Center for the Evaluation of Risks to Human Reproduction," the Sciences International website says. It says half its clients are from the private sector, but its health studies are independent and it "is proud of its reputation for objective science."

Its current website contains no list of industry clients. But a 2006 version names BASF and Dow Chemical — which manufacture the plastics compound BPA — as well as DuPont, Chevron, ExxonMobil, 3-M, Union Carbide, the National Assn. of Manufacturers, and 45 other manufacturing companies and industry groups.

In 1999, Sciences International represented R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. in fighting an Environmental Protection Agency proposal to regulate a pesticide used on tobacco crops. In 2004, its vice president, Dr. Anthony Scialli, who is identified as the federal center's "principal investigator," co-wrote a study with a Dow Chemical Co. researcher on how to extrapolate data from animal tests to humans.

In addition, another Sciences International employee who works at the federal agency, Gloria Jahnke, has collaborated nine times on chemicals research with another company that gets funding from the plastics industry, according to a Times review of medical publications.

Sciences International's president boasted about its close collaboration with the federal reproductive health center, as well as the EPA and other federal agencies, in a letter soliciting R.J. Reynolds as a client in 1999.

Signed by company founder Elizabeth Anderson, the letter stated that Sciences International "serves the private sector, including many trade associations, on a wide range of health and risk assessment issues. However, we are different from most other consulting firms in that we also currently serve government agencies," which, the letter said, gives the company "a unique credibility to negotiate with regulators on behalf of our private sector clients."

The role of Sciences International in the federal center's work came to the attention of Environmental Working Group, a nonprofit advocacy group focused on environmental health, last month after some scientists who saw the report on BPA complained that it was biased toward the industry's position that low doses have no effect.

"We are unaware of any other instance in which nearly all of the functions of a public health agency have been outsourced to a private entity," wrote Richard Wiles, the working group's executive director, in a letter to the director of the NIH's National Toxicology Program, which runs the reproductive health center. "Questions about the objectivity and adequacy of this review process and the reviewers must be resolved before a final decision on BPA is reached."

Debate over BPA is one of the most contentious environmental health issues faced by government and industry. Traces are found in the bodies of nearly all Americans tested, and low levels — similar to amounts that can leach from infant and water bottles — mimic estrogen and have caused genetic changes in animals that lead to prostate cancer, as well as decreased testosterone, low sperm counts and signs of early female puberty, according to more than 100 government-funded studies. About a dozen industry-funded studies found no effects.

DOJ_NMG_0139998

Fred vom Saal, a University of Missouri-Columbia scientist conducting NIH-funded BPA research, said the draft report written by Sciences International downplays the risks of the plastics chemical and makes critical mistakes.

"It's a combination of inaccurate information and blatant bias as it exists in its draft form," vom Saal said. "They specifically ignore fatal flaws in industry-sponsored publications." He said the 300-page report misrepresented government-funded studies that found effects by inaccurately portraying their findings, and failed to note industry funding of some studies cited.

Shelby, the center's director, in a late February memo to the Environmental Working Group, said Sciences International reviews the scientific literature on chemicals and writes the basic reports, but that conclusions are prepared by the center's panel of independent scientists, which "serves to minimize or eliminate any bias that might possibly be introduced by the contractor."

Shelby wrote that there are no requirements for Sciences International or other contractors to disclose financial conflicts of interest.

Mackar, of the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, said the chemical reviews are "all open and public" and "we're confident in our scientific panel."

But Vom Saal said that although the scientific panel includes many good, independent scientists, "none of them have expertise with this chemical."

A Federal Register document describing the center's creation in 1998 said scientists from Sciences International and the center "constitute a core committee" that "selects the expert panel membership and establishes the meeting agenda."

Why They Fight (NYT)

By Jacob Heilbrunn

The New York Times Book Review, March 4, 2007

George W. Bush, reviled by the left ever since he became president, has recently accomplished the feat of acquiring a new and unlikely set of detractors. The longer he flounders in domestic and foreign policy, the more a vocal contingent of intellectuals and columnists allied to the Republican Party is attacking him. Unlike that of most Bush critics, however, their complaint isn't that the president has veered too far to the right. It's that he isn't conservative enough.

In "Leviathan on the Right," Michael D. Tanner offers the fullest exposition of this line of reasoning to date. Tanner, the director of health and welfare studies at the libertarian Cato Institute, comes not to bury but to resurrect the conservative cause. By exposing Bush and the Republican leadership as apostates who foolishly believe big government can be employed for conservative ends, Tanner hopes to persuade the right to return to what he sees as its original ideals of limited government and individual responsibility.

To dramatize this fall from grace, Tanner evokes a lost conservative golden age that stretched from Barry Goldwater to Ronald Reagan. Goldwater, the founding father of modern conservatism, prepared the stage for the revolt against big government that eventually swept the country and allowed Reagan to win the presidency in 1980. Reagan, Tanner suggests, was a paragon of fiscal restraint: he boldly declared in his first Inaugural Address that he intended to "curb the size and influence of the federal establishment." Reagan's successes, though, were quickly frittered away by his pallid successor, George H. W. Bush — "a man of no discernible ideology, who allowed government to begin growing again."

This was not all. The Republican class of 1994, which had championed the rollback of the federal government, became the cat's-paw of K Street lobbyists. By 2006, Republican legislators were approving billions in pork barrel spending, thereby replicating the corruption of the Democrats that had originally allowed the Republican Party to take power. In Tanner's view, Bush himself has been no better: while his sweeping tax cuts are laudable, he has presided over the creation of new federal agencies like the Homeland Security Department and spent wildly.

Who are the intellectual authors of the Bush administration's deviation from free-market orthodoxy? Tanner fingers neoconservatives like Irving Kristol who he thinks have always been dangerously complacent about accepting the existence of the welfare state, hoping to reform rather than abolish it outright. Matters only worsened with the advent of a younger generation of neoconservatives led by the Weekly Standard editor William Kristol and the New York Times columnist David Brooks, who tout a "national greatness conservatism." Tanner rebukes them for being "suspicious of unfettered free-market capitalism" and for rejecting "the primacy of individual choice." As he sees it, the neoconservatives, like the religious right, are dangerously obsessed with trying to legislate morality through socially responsible government programs.

Tanner is a lucid writer and vigorous polemicist who scores a number of points against the Republican Party's fiscal transgressions, but he has ultimately produced a fairy tale. The notion that Reagan actually fought for small government is wishful thinking. The Gipper didn't abolish a single major federal agency, he strengthened Social Security by approving a payroll tax hike and he added $1.4 trillion to the national debt. It was Bill Clinton who left behind a $236 billion surplus in 2000, which Bush promptly squandered. Contrary to Tanner and many other Reagan idolaters, Bush hasn't forsaken Reagan's legacy; by engaging in simultaneous tax cuts, massive military spending and deficit spending, he has continued it.

DOJ_NMG_0139999

What's more, Tanner glides rather easily from linking the corruption of the Republican Congress to big government. There is no necessary connection between the two. The fact that a Republican Congress looted the government on behalf of big business and itself does not discredit Social Security, Medicare and a host of other programs. It simply testifies to the venality of the Republican Congress. Perhaps Tanner's most questionable claim is that "politically, for all the internal disagreements, support for a strong national defense remains the glue that holds the various wings of the Republican Party together. The debate that will truly matter is whether or not conservatives still believe in small government." Like it or not, conservatives such as Tanner will have to grapple with the political, moral and fiscal consequences of an imperial foreign policy.

At first glance, Joe Conason's "It Can Happen Here" — a play on the title of Sinclair Lewis's 1935 dystopian novel, "It Can't Happen Here" — might seem to provide a valuable opportunity to do just that. Conason, a liberal columnist for The New York Observer and the author of "Big Lies" and "The Raw Deal," surveys the concentration of corporate and political power in Washington. He ably catalogs the Bush administration's attempts to subvert civil liberties. But it soon becomes apparent that he has a proclivity for substituting hyperbole for insight.

Conason briskly arraigns the usual suspects: Bush and the neoconservatives, for conducting an Iraq war he believes was launched partly to deflect attention from mounting corporate scandals; the political theorist and neoconservative mentor Leo Strauss; and Roger Ailes of Fox News, which the author says has a "journalistically illicit relationship" with the Bush administration. In Conason's view, Bush and Dick Cheney relied on "an enormous organizational apparatus ... in and around the Republican Party" as they "swept aside law, liberty and tradition to implement their new order." In case that allusion to the Third Reich's "New Order" is too ambiguous, Conason also refers to "the direction of dictatorship" and "potential tyranny."

The Bush administration has trampled on the intelligence reforms that Congress passed in the mid-1970s. But Conason appears to view the administration's machinations with something approaching lascivious horror. His language is seldom less than apocalyptic: "It is possible that the future of democratic governance in America will be determined in the final two years of the Bush presidency, when the Republicans may yet secure a court majority that reinterprets the Constitution as a mandate for theocratic dominion and untrammeled presidential power. That would raise the real prospect of an authoritarian regime acting under color of the Constitution and the law while eviscerating both." In his zeal to indict the Republicans, Conason sounds as strident as Karl Rove depicting the Democrats as gutless appeasers.

It's also the case that Conason's alarmism inadvertently buys into Bush and Cheney's own hokum by attributing a kind of implacable and infallible power to the administration. Whatever its intentions, however, the hallmark of the administration hasn't turned out to be Machiavellian cunning but sheer ineptitude. Rather like the American cold warriors who insisted that the Soviet Union was vying for world domination even as it was going poof in the late 1980s, Conason seems reluctant to recognize that the conservative movement has been heading toward collapse. Far from consolidating a right-wing dictatorship, Bush's actual political legacy may well turn out to be resuscitating American liberalism.

OTHER NEWS:

The Return Of Volatility (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Investors may have the jitters, but politicians could always make it worse by overreacting to them.

THE REMARKABLE THING about last week's harrowing stock market plunge was how remarkable it was. And that's because for all the talk of the dangers of a post-9/11 world vulnerable to terrorism, oil shocks, warfare and rising anti-Americanism, the last few years have been unusually prosperous and stable for the global economy. Indeed, before Tuesday, when the Dow Jones industrial average fell 3.3%, the index was enjoying its longest run since 1954 without a 2% single-day decline.

Around the world, economic stability has made investors somewhat cavalier about risk. Lower-risk premiums required for everything from sovereign nations' bonds to margin stock trading in China and sub-prime mortgage lending in the United States have made this a time of plentiful, cheap capital. Last week's sell-off, triggered by the Shanghai exchange's 9% drop Tuesday, reintroduced investors to the concept of risk — fear even — and the dangers of getting overextended.

The U.S. economy remains solid, but a "soft landing" is still a landing. Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan pointed out last week that the slowdown in corporate profits is a sign that "we are in the later stages of a cycle."

Last week was also a reminder of the growing interdependence of global markets. Unfortunately, the days when President Clinton and Treasury Secretary Robert E. Rubin could quickly reassure markets as an overseas financial crises loomed, and reaffirm the desirability of stronger links between the U.S. and other economies, are long gone. In a far more protectionist climate that is wary of the outside world, there is a danger that both Republican and Democratic members of Congress will unleash a political backlash to relatively minor financial hiccups, which could trigger a financial panic or even a recession.

DOJ_NMG_0140000

It would be a disaster, for instance, if Congress allowed the president's trade promotion authority — under which he can negotiate trade deals that Congress must put to an up-or-down vote — to lapse, or if it persists in erecting new roadblocks to foreign investment in this country.

And then there is the incessant temptation to vilify China. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who should know better given the example set by her husband, used the Shanghai sell-off to issue a statement expressing concern about the amount of U.S. public debt owned by China and the ensuing "erosion of U.S. economic sovereignty." The fact that foreigners, including China's central bank, are eager to invest in the U.S. economy has been a huge benefit to American living standards and a win-win for the global economy. Pressed on CNBC whether she would propose limiting the amount of Treasury bills foreigners could purchase, Clinton said "not at this time."

Even assuming she was merely pandering to xenophobic voices in her party, it's not encouraging. If enough politicians follow her lead, modest financial corrections could turn into greater trouble for the U.S. economy.

Romney Wins Conservatives' Straw Poll (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Giuliani, Brownback Next in CPAC Vote

Presidential candidate and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney yesterday won a straw poll of conservative political activists gathered in Washington, a very early indication of how an important Republican constituency might vote.

Romney was the first choice for the GOP nomination, with 21 percent of the 1,705 activists who voted at the 34th annual Conservative Political Action Conference. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani came in second with 17 percent, and Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) was third with 15 percent.

Last year, the activists said they preferred as their presidential candidate then- senator George Allen (Va.). He lost his reelection bid in November.

The nation's first primary is more than 10 months away, making such votes little more than a popularity contest among a slice of the population that might not represent any electorate.

But the result underscored the difficulty that one GOP candidate, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), faces in drawing conservative support because of past views and statements. McCain -- who did not attend the convention, unlike Romney and Giuliani -- came in fifth in the straw poll, and the mention of his name yesterday drew boos from the crowd.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) brought the convention to a raucous close yesterday with a speech in which he urged conservatives not to compromise and called for a broader national debate about ideas.

He called on eventual presidential nominees to commit to nine, 90-minute debates after Labor Day 2008. "We need to find a way to have an honest dialogue that is far beyond the kind of baloney you get in nine-second sound bites," Gingrich said.

Gingrich, who has not yet said he is running for president, was virtually mobbed by the crowd as he entered the ballroom. He finished fourth in the straw poll, with 14 percent.

Conservatives Pick Romney In Straw Poll (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Despite his record on social issues, the former Massachusetts governor is the top choice for the GOP nomination.

WASHINGTON — Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney is struggling in national public opinion polls but, after a concerted effort, was named the winner Saturday of a straw poll of conservative activists at an annual gathering.

Despite skepticism about his record on social issues, the former Massachusetts governor received 21% of the 1,705 votes cast by paid attendees to the Conservative Political Action Conference who were asked to name their top choice for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, whose past positions on abortion and gay rights also stand at odds with social conservatives, came in second in the informal poll, with 17% of the votes.

Both men received standing ovations from the thousands of conservatives who gathered for three days to, among other things, assess damage to their once powerful movement inflicted by the increasingly costly war in Iraq and the 2006 election.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona, the only leading candidate who did not attend the event, received 12% of the votes, and the mention of his name drew occasional boos from the audience.

DOJ_NMG_0140001

McCain came in behind his Senate colleague Sam Brownback of Kansas. Backed enthusiastically by social conservatives who admire his strong opposition to abortion, Brownback received 15% of the votes.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia, who hasn't decided whether to run, also topped McCain, receiving 14% in the straw vote.

Romney's win among the conservatives gathered in Washington contrasts with his showing in other polls. A Newsweek poll released this weekend shows Giuliani surging ahead of McCain and Romney among Republican voters.

The former mayor led McCain 59% to 34% in the Newsweek poll. When matched against Romney in the poll, Giuliani led the former governor 70% to 20%. In a McCain-Romney matchup, respondents preferred McCain by 59% to 26%.

Giuliani also did well when pitted against Democrats. Giuliani was closely matched against Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York in the Newsweek poll, with 47% to her 46%. When paired up against Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, he led 48% to 43%. The margin of error for the poll was 3 percentage points.

The poll provided another, incidental boost for the former mayor: Eighty-two percent of registered Republicans surveyed said a candidate's marital history was not an important consideration for them. Giuliani has been married three times.

Though behind in the polls, Romney has racked up endorsements from prominent Republican officeholders and party leaders. He has been pushing to establish his bona fides among conservatives who have openly worried about his changing positions on abortion and gay rights issues.

Romney paid the registration fees of some student attendees, and his campaign's representatives were visible throughout the conference.

Giuliani has not disavowed his advocacy on some social issues but has pledged to appoint "strict constructionist judges" if elected.

He received a warm reception when he spoke.

A ballot that combined conference attendees' first and second choices for the Republican nomination in 2008 showed Giuliani coming in first with 34%, compared with Romney and Gingrich, who were tied for second with 30%. McCain received 20% in the combined category.

Conservatives pondering how to respond to the Democratic takeover on Capitol Hill received no shortage of recommendations during the three-day conference. Many speakers such as author and activist Richard Viguerie said party leaders had lost their way and had betrayed true conservatism.

Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty called on conservatives to address populist concerns such as healthcare, the environment and economic security.

This year's parade of candidates at the conservative gathering "is a reflection of the fact that there is no Reagan in the field," said David A. Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, which sponsored the convention. "It is not a slam dunk for anybody."

Keene said he detected a detached skepticism among this year's conventioneers.

"You see the attentiveness with which people are listening — it's not with adoration," he said. "They view themselves more as judges than advocates."

Not In Race, Gingrich Still Has Right Stuff (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow, Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

Newt Gingrich received a hero's welcome at the Conservative Political Action Conference yesterday, but it was Tom DeLay who gave the thousands of activists their marching orders: Unite conservative interest groups into a machine that can overpower the unity of their liberal counterparts.

Mr. Gingrich, who won't decide whether he will run for president until after September, tied former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney for second place in the conference's combined first- and second-choice straw poll with 30 percent each, trailing only former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who won with a combined 34 percent.

"We will not defeat the Clinton machine by being negative," Mr. Gingrich said, referring to Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. "We will defeat the Clinton machine by offering better solutions based on better values with a deeper reach into the American people's lives and psyche."

The former House speaker challenged all of the candidates to commit to a new way of conducting the last nine weeks of the presidential campaign: Forgo attack ads and meet once a week for 90-minute in-depth discussions, "no Mickey Mouse," with just a timekeeper, no moderator and no panel of questioners.

DOJ_NMG_0140002

In the straw poll of 1,705 CPAC attendees who voted, Mr. Romney was the top choice of 21 percent, followed by Mr. Giuliani at 17 percent, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas at 15 percent, then Mr. Gingrich at 14 percent and Sen. John McCain of Arizona at 12 percent.

But combined with second-choice ballots, Mr. Giuliani vaulted to the top -- followed by Mr. Romney and Mr. Gingrich. Mr. Brownback was fourth, Mr. McCain fifth, and Rep. Tom Tancredo sixth with 9 percent.

The combined choice is the most important yardstick because it measures depth of support, said J. William Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union, the conference's chief sponsor.

"The Romney [second choice] number was markedly shallow at 9 percent," he said.

Mr. McCain was the only major candidate not to attend CPAC. He told Mort Kondracke of the Fox News Channel he didn't need to attend because CPAC was mostly Washington insiders.

Conference organizers said yesterday that the 5,200 people who registered for CPAC, held at the Omni Shoreham hotel in Northwest, came from 49 states, and just 15 percent were from Maryland, Virginia and the District.

"Newt Gingrich is probably the only rock star in the conservative world right now," Georgia Republican activist Phil Kent said. "You saw the energy when he entered the ballroom. I didn't see that for any of the others."

Mr. DeLay, the former House majority leader, who left Congress under the cloud of an indictment in Texas, criticized CPAC and other conservative gatherings for never offering plans of action to defeat the left. He said he is forming a Coalition for a Conservative Majority that would unite the various conservative interest groups into a single message for the conservative cause.

"When I left Congress, I had two things to do: support the conservative cause and defend Israel," he said.

Mr. DeLay said conservatives must overcome their independent streak and match liberal groups' willingness to take up each other's goals.

"You'll get abortionists working on labor policy. You'll get unions working for abortionists," he said of the liberal machine. "We need to understand that all of these conservative groups out there need to come together and work together to maximize our resources."

But some conservatives are not yet ready to forgive Mr. DeLay for saying, during the spending spree after Hurricane Katrina, that the money should be added to the deficit because Republicans had pared the budget down so well already.

"As a conservative activist, I'm still hoping he is going to retract his comments that there is not any more fat in the federal budget," said George Primbs, 44, a database marketing manager from Woodbridge, who was attending his 20th CPAC.

Speaking earlier in the day, former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III called himself "the real conservative" in the race. He cited Mr. Romney's admission he voted for Democrat Paul Tsongas in 1992 and Mr. Giuliani's acknowledged vote for Democrat Mario Cuomo for New York governor in 1994 as evidence the others fall short.

"What are we expected to do?" Mr. Gilmore asked. "There is not a person in this room who was so confused in those days they would have voted for Paul Tsongas and Mario Cuomo."

He also attacked Mr. McCain, saying he fits the label "maverick" more than "conservative" for having opposed President Bush's tax cuts and supporting "amnesty" for illegal aliens.

"Gilmore had the best message, and he delivered it beautifully," said Donald J. Devine, who headed President Reagan's Office of Personnel Management.

The straw poll also made it clear that Mr. Bush is mostly irrelevant to the conservative movement. In the poll, 79 percent described themselves as a "Ronald Reagan Republican," but just 3 percent said they were a "George W. Bush Republican."

Romney Favored Among Conservatives In Straw Poll (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Mitt Romney won the most support for the Republican presidential nomination in a Saturday straw poll of GOP activists attending an annual conference.

Despite his record of inconsistency on some social issues, the former Massachusetts governor got 21 percent of the 1,705 votes cast by paid registrants to the three-day Conservative Political Action Conference.

They were asked who their first choice would be for the Republican nomination.

Rudy Giuliani, the former New York City mayor whose moderate stances on social issues irks the party's right wing, was second with 17 percent.

Both were among the more than half-dozen White House hopefuls who spoke at the conference.

Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who rounds out the top tier of serious GOP contenders, skipped the event -- and was punished for it. He got only 12 percent of the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0140003

Ahead of him were Romney, Giuliani and two others. Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, a favorite of religious conservatives, got 15 percent, while former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia, who says he won't decide whether to run until the fall, got 14 percent.

Others got 5 percent or less.

A year ago, then-Virginia Sen. George Allen received 22 percent of the vote. His presidential chances evaporated last year as he struggled to win -- and eventually lost -- his Senate re-election race.

In that CPAC poll last year, McCain had 20 percent, Giuliani had 12 percent, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had 10 percent, and Gingrich had 5 percent.

G.O.P. Candidates Criticize Slur By Conservative Author (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, March 3 — Three of the leading Republican presidential candidates on Saturday denounced one of their party's best-known conservative commentators for using an antigay epithet when discussing a Democratic presidential contender at a gathering of conservatives here.

The remarks by Ann Coulter, an author who regularly speaks at conservative events, were sharply denounced by the candidates, Senator John McCain of Arizona, Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York and Mitt Romney of Massachusetts. Their statements came after Democrats, gay rights groups and bloggers raised a storm of protest over the remarks.

Speaking at the Conservative Political Action Conference before an overflow crowd on Friday, Ms. Coulter said, "I was going to have a few comments on the other Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, but it turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I — so kind of an impasse, can't really talk about Edwards."

Mr. Edwards's aides responded with an e-mail message that attacked Ms. Coulter and urged supporters to donate to Mr. Edwards's campaign. "John was singled out for a personal attack because the Republican establishment knows he poses the greatest threat to their power," said his campaign manager, David E. Bonior. "Since they have nothing real to use against him, Coulter's resorting to the classic right-wing strategy of riling up hate to smear a progressive champion."

Ms. Coulter, asked for a reaction to the Republican criticism, said in an e-mail message: "C'mon, it was a joke. I would never insult gays by suggesting that they are like John Edwards. That would be mean."

At the conference, she said she was likely to support Mr. Romney.

The criticisms by the Republican candidates put them in a difficult position because the Conservative Political Action Conference has been gathering for conservative and Republican leaders for over 25 years.

The speakers this year included Vice President Dick Cheney and most of the presidential candidates, whose presence suggested the political influence the group holds in the party's nominating process. Mr. Cheney was not at the event on Friday.

Of the major Republican candidates, only Mr. McCain did not attend, but he denounced her remarks on Saturday morning. "The comments were wildly inappropriate," said his spokesman, Brian Jones.

Mr. Giuliani said, "The comments were completely inappropriate and there should be no place for such name-calling in political debate."

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mr. Romney, said: "It was an offensive remark. Governor Romney believes all people should be treated with dignity and respect."

Mr. Romney preceded Ms. Coulter at the event and mentioned that she was speaking later — he jokingly referred to her as a "moderate." But he was not in the room when she spoke, Mr. Madden said.

Coulter Drops F-bomb Onto Political Battlefield (CNN)

CNN.com, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Prominent politicians from both parties and a gay-rights group on Saturday condemned right-wing commentator Ann Coulter for her reference Friday to Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards as a "faggot."

"Ann Coulter's use of an anti-gay slur yesterday was un-American and indefensible," Edwards said in a posting on his Web site, www.johnedwards.com.

"In America, we strive for equality and embrace diversity. The kind of hateful language she used has no place in political debate or our society at large.

"I believe it is our moral responsibility to speak out against that kind of bigotry and prejudice every time we encounter it."

Edwards' campaign posted the video on their Web site, and asked readers to help them "raise $100,000 in 'Coulter Cash' this week to keep this campaign charging ahead and fight back against the politics of bigotry."

DOJ_NMG_0140004

Coulter made her comment in Washington during an address to the 34th annual meeting of the Conservative Political Action Conference, during which she gave her opinions about the Democrats' slate of presidential hopefuls.

"I was going to have a few comments on the other Democratic presidential candidate, John Edwards, but it turns out that you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I'm - so, kind of at an impasse, can't really talk about Edwards, so I think I'll just conclude here and take your questions," said Coulter, whose comment was followed by applause.

CNN has reached out to Coulter's representative, and received no response.

But the New York Times reported that she responded, in an e-mail, "C'mon, it was a joke. I would never insult gays by suggesting that they are like John Edwards. That would be mean."

A spokesman for Sen. John McCain, a Republican presidential candidate, called Coulter's comments to the conservative group "wildly inappropriate."

In a written statement, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said, "Ann Coulter's words of hate have no place in the public sphere much less our political discourse. Not only should she apologize but those who participated in the conference with her should denounce her shameful and divisive actions."

"Ann Coulter's use of this anti-gay slur is vile and unacceptable," said Neil G. Giuliano, president of the Gay & Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation, "and the applause from her audience is an important reminder that Coulter's ugly brand of bigotry is at the root of the discriminatory policies being promoted at this gathering."

In a written statement, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called on Republicans to denounce her remarks. "There is no place in political discourse for this kind of hate-filled and bigoted comments," he said.

During a question-and-answer session, Coulter referred back to the issue of gays by alluding to the bid for the Republican presidential nomination being made by former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

"I do want to point out one thing that has been driving me crazy with the media -- how they keep describing Mitt Romney's position as being pro-gays, and that's going to upset the right wingers," she said. "Well, you know, screw you! I'm not anti-gay. We're against gay marriage. I don't want gays to be discriminated against."

She added, "I don't know why all gays aren't Republican. I think we have the pro-gay positions, which is anti-crime and for tax cuts. Gays make a lot of money and they're victims of crime. No, they are! They should be with us."

A spokesman for Romney called Coulter's use of the slur "offensive."

Ann Coulter, You're No Sister Souljah (POL)

By Jennifer Rubin

The Politico, March 3, 2007

Ann Coulter is not African-American, does not sing and never said “If black people kill black people every day, why not have a week and kill white people?” However, she is the closest the Republicans will get to Sister Souljah.

Coulter has made a career of interspersing insightful and cutting political criticism with outrageous and morally repugnant remarks. She attracted considerable attention with her crack about the group of 9/11 widows dubbed the “Jersey girls,” with a line in one of her books, “These broads are millionaires, lionized on TV and in articles about them, reveling in their status as celebrities and stalked by grief-arazzis. These self-obsessed women seemed genuinely unaware that 9/11 was an attack on our nation and acted as if the terrorist attacks happened only to them. ... I’ve never seen people enjoying their husbands' deaths so much.”

Then, there was her crack about Muslims at last year’s Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC): “I think our motto should be post-9-11, ‘rag head talks tough, rag head faces consequences.’” At CPAC on Thursday, in endorsing Republican presidential aspirant Mitt Romney, who needs more bad press like a hole in the head, she piped up with this one: “I was going to say something about John Edwards, but it turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word ‘faggot.’”

It's about time for a presidential contender, perhaps all of them in the spirit of Newt Gingrich’s crusade for improving public discourse, to say “enough.” Coulter’s never-ending stream of venom is not amusing, unhelpful to Republicans, and not in keeping with the ideals of a party that fancies itself as the proponent of a colorblind society and heir to Lincoln.

It is not “caving” into political correctness to distance and indeed condemn such remarks as unworthy of a political event like CPAC. To the contrary, it is altogether fitting that a group that ostensibly searches for the best in conservative ideas, rewards political courage and encourages intellectual debate, should be able to differentiate the amusing from the offensive, and the clever from the vile.

Conservatives take great glee in condemning ideological opponents who share stages with Al Sharpton or give a convention seat to Michael Moore. It would certainly boost their credibility to toss their own baggage out.

Would it be a stunt to call out Coulter, who obviously revels in the attention of provocative pronouncements? No. Excommunication is not being suggested, just a public rebuke. By clearly stating her comments are beyond the bounds of civil discourse and her presence not a welcome addition to a mature political party, the Republicans could do themselves a world of good. How often does a party have the opportunity to display some measure of dignity, restraint and self-reflection.?

DOJ_NMG_0140005

So who will play the role of Bill Clinton to Coulter's Sister Souljah? It would be a sad commentary on the GOP if the answer is "no one."

Jennifer Rubin is a writer who lives in Virginia. Her columns appear in the Weekly Standard, the American Spectator, Human Events, abc.com and National Review Online.

Giuliani Has No Real Chance With GOP Voters... Or Does He? (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

The 2008 presidential campaign is just weeks old, but already an article of faith within the Republican Party -- the belief that no politician who favors abortion rights and gay rights can win the GOP nomination -- is being challenged by the candidacy of former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

The man who was named Time magazine's "Person of the Year" for his response to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks is now leading in a slew of national polls. He is testing whether cultural and religious conservatives in the GOP will support a candidate who offers strong leadership on security and terrorism rather than ideological purity on social issues.

"This is the first Republican presidential primary since Sept. 11," said Ed Gillespie, a former Republican National Committee chairman who is neutral in the nominating battle. "Rudy Giuliani is a candidate who can clearly test the proposition that a Republican who is more moderate on social issues can capture the nomination. He's testing it now."

Whit Ayres, a Georgia-based Republican pollster, said he has been struck by the number of conservatives he has encountered who disagree with Giuliani on abortion or gay rights but are still attracted to him as a possible Republican nominee. The issue is whether that appeal can survive a long campaign in which Giuliani's New York record, his position on issues, his three marriages and his complex business dealings will be subjected to withering scrutiny.

"It truly is the question in Republican presidential politics at the moment," Ayres said. "There are a lot of people with a more traditional view who think that his leading in the polls is just a mirage and that he has no real chance. I don't believe that. I think there's more to this than simply name ID. "

Many GOP strategists still question whether Giuliani can survive the scrutiny and develop a message that appeals to voters across the spectrum of Republican conservatism. Based on his speech Friday at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington, there are good reasons for doubt. Giuliani highlighted his record as a tax cutter, crime fighter and welfare reformer. But he offered little resembling a traditional conservative agenda for the future, other than saying the United States must remain on offense against terrorism. The speech won a polite but hardly enthusiastic response from the audience of activists.

Still, the former mayor's decision to show up at a conference that the other leading candidate for the nomination, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), skipped may earn some goodwill with an audience not predisposed to support him.

His strength in recent national polls and some state polls has already prompted many strategists, including some in rival camps, to reexamine their long-held assumptions about a party that is approaching not only its first nomination battle since the terrorist attacks but also the first since the 2006 midterm elections, which put Democrats back into power in Washington. With President Bush's approval ratings still low, Republicans are looking for a winner.

For many months, McCain has been seen as the closest thing there is to a front-runner in the Republican contest. But Giuliani has emerged not only as the popular choice for the GOP nomination but also as the Republican candidate who is currently most highly regarded by the American people -- Republicans, Democrats and independents alike.

The latest Washington Post-ABC News poll showed Giuliani leading McCain 44 percent to 21 percent, with former House speaker Newt Gingrich at 15 percent and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney at 4 percent. A month ago, Giuliani's lead was much narrower: 34 percent to 27 percent. Without Gingrich in the field, the most recent poll showed Giuliani's margin over McCain was 53 percent to 23 percent.

A veteran Republican strategist, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to candidly assess the situation, said he is among those who long believed that a Republican with Giuliani's profile would have no chance. He still believes the former mayor faces significant obstacles but said the odds of Giuliani winning the nomination are not as remote as they once seemed.

He gave three reasons: the absence of a strong, traditional conservative in the GOP field; continuing antipathy among many social and religious conservatives toward McCain; and the prospect of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) becoming the next president.

Giuliani "looks like he can beat Hillary, make the party competitive again in the Northeast, competitive again in California and allow us to keep our strong electoral advantage in the South and Rocky Mountain states," the strategist said.

DOJ_NMG_0140006

The former mayor's campaign team believes it has found a credible path to the nomination. Its foundation is a conclusion that while the overwhelming majority of Republicans differ with Giuliani on abortion, gay rights and gun control, a much smaller percentage of GOP primary voters -- perhaps no more than a quarter -- are single-issue voters who would never vote for him because of his views on those issues, a percentage borne out by the latest Post-ABC News poll.

Giuliani's advisers see that as a reason for optimism. They say those findings still leave a significant majority of the party beginning the campaign open to his candidacy, and they think the more he can emphasize his conservatism on issues such as taxes, welfare and crime, as well as his leadership on national security issues, the more voters are likely to back him.

"Rudy Giuliani and Republican voters are going to find a tremendous amount of common ground on a wide variety of issues important to Republican voters," said Mike DuHaime, Giuliani's campaign manager.

That raises the question of what it would say about the Republican Party if Giuliani were to become the nominee. Joe Gaylord, a GOP strategist close to Gingrich, said Giuliani's well-deserved celebrity appeal from his Sept. 11 response is a powerful attribute in the current environment. But he gave voice to something other Republican strategists are saying, which is that if Giuliani were to win the nomination, "this is a different Republican Party than I know."

Giuliani's advisers also challenge the assumption that he is doing well among Republicans because they remember his post-Sept. 11 job performance but know little about his positions on social issues. They believe that many Republicans are aware of both sides of the story and still find him an attractive candidate. Even some strategists in rival campaigns share that view, based on their own analyses.

Another factor may be working in Giuliani's favor. Many big states -- California, New Jersey and Florida among them -- could hold their primaries Feb. 5. If the former mayor survives early tests in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, his advisers argue, he will be positioned to do well in the larger states.

Social conservatives make up a significant portion of the GOP primary and caucus electorates in South Carolina and Iowa -- about two-thirds of South Carolina Republican voters oppose abortion, for example. The role of social conservatives is considered to be less decisive in New Hampshire, where low taxes are a bigger priority among GOP voters than abortion.

"I believe the compression [of the nomination] calendar helps us," DuHaime said.

All that assumes that Giuliani's early strength is not a mirage and that he finds a way to transcend his disagreements with conservatives. GOP strategists say he cannot change his positions, as Romney has done in some cases, but Giuliani's advisers believe he can reassure conservatives that he is not bent on a change in party orthodoxy.

On social issues, Giuliani has tried to shift the focus from his positions on abortion and gay rights to his argument that, as president, he would appoint federal judges akin to Supreme Court Justices Antonin Scalia and Samuel A. Alito Jr. His record in New York does not necessarily support that, according to an analysis recently published in the Politico, but a Giuliani adviser said the selection process there is quite different.

Giuliani's having been married three times could hamper his efforts to appeal to culturally conservative voters, although Gingrich faces the same issue if he enters the race. Similarly, Giuliani may have to answer for his past association with former New York police commissioner Bernard B. Kerik, who was forced to withdraw as Bush's nominee to be secretary of homeland security.

Other Republicans will be watching for signs that Giuliani's candidacy is built for the long haul. Right now, he trails McCain and Romney in building a national network of organizations. Giuliani has substantial fundraising appeal, but his first-quarter numbers, due at the end of this month, will be an indicator of whether he can tap his full potential. His skills as a campaigner will undergo continual examination.

"I think that people like him, and likeability is a big, big factor in presidential politics," a senior Republican strategist said. "Right now, I think his numbers reflect that. As you get closer to the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary, likeability may give way to vote-determinative issues, like abortion."

Said Ayres: "I don't think there's any question those issues will come into play. The question is, will they get traction?"

Romney Values Old Time Religion (NHUL)

By Garry Rayno

New Hampshire Union Leader, March 4, 2007

MANCHESTER – Presidential candidate Mitt Romney said the Judeo Christian values that helped found America continue to guide the country today.

On the campaign trail and in the media, Romney has faced questions about his Mormon faith and whether it could hurt his chances to win the Republican Party's nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0140007

"The fundamental principle of faith of Judeo Christian (belief) is there is a God, who is our heavenly Father and all the people on this earth and every speck of humanity on this earth is a creation of God ... And every creation of humanity is a child of God," Romney told the New Hampshire Union Leader and Sunday News in an interview last week.

While this country welcomes Muslims, Hindus, Buddhists and other faiths, he said, the Judeo Christian tradition remains its foundation.

Romney's positions on abortion, same-sex marriages and stem cell research have changed and are now in line with religious conservatives. Once a moderate on social issues, Romney now says: "If you had somebody in the private sector who didn't change their mind when they knew they were wrong, you fired them because they were stubborn.

"I'm happy to admit when I make mistakes and go on. And my experience is that to the voters, the response is overwhelmingly positive: 'We've got a guy who'll admit his mistakes, tell us what he's going to do and he'll honor that,'" Romney told the Associated Press after an appearance in Concord Thursday.

Having Judeo Christian values also means as a people, Americans reach out to people in need, he said at the New Hampshire Union Leader and Sunday News offices. "When we see people suffering, we feel as though it's a brother or a sister suffering," said Romney, who has a vacation home in Wolfeboro.

Seeing what is going on in Darfur, Sudan, brings pain to people's hearts, he said, just as the world's problems cause concerns.

Romney said he believes the First Amendment of the Constitution has been misinterpreted to mean that no religion should be established. Instead, he said, some believe that means establishing secularism, which is not a religion.

Romney said he would retain the word "God" in the Pledge of Allegiance to the flag, on U.S. money and in public places. "They give us a sense of remembrance of who we are and we are all related through our Divine heritage," he said. "There is a creator, and we are the family of humankind."

America's culture is what has made the country successful and the power it is, Romney said. "By in large, we are a God-fearing people."

But he noted, American culture is under attack by radical Islamists, by the economies of China and India and from within by problems such as out-of-control immigration and too many people without access to health care.

"The family structure is critical to our society. We will not succeed if 60 percent of our children are born out of wedlock," he said.

But, he added, "I'm not wringing my hands with worry. America does well when faced by challenges ... Washington is the problem. It's not a Republican or a Democratic thing."

Romney portrayed himself as an outsider who is not a career politician and is willing to work in a bipartisan manner to make needed changes.

"I am not a life-long politician. I'm in this because I care about my kids and my grandkids and I care about your kids and grandkids," Romney said.

He said he does not want America to become the "France of the 21st century," noting that France began the 20th century as a world power, but lost that designation by the end of the century.

America still has time to deal with the issues that must be addressed in order to avoid a similar fate, Romney said.

He said the United States needs to do more to free itself from the grip of oil-producing countries, many of which are not friendly. "It's like paying the cannibals to eat you last," he said.

Romney, who as Massachusetts governor opposed a proposed wind farm off Cape Cod, said he would favor such a proposal in Buzzard's Bay. "I'd be happy to have a wind farm, but not in Nantucket Sound, or the Grand Canyon, or Chesapeake Bay or the Bay of Fundy," he said.

Along with alternative energy sources, the country needs to strive for greater energy efficiencies, Romney said. This country has yet to make a real effort to save energy, he noted, saying it cannot be done in 10 years, but could be accomplished in 20 years.

If the country becomes energy independent, he noted, it would not have to deal with someone like Hugo Chavez, the president of Venezuela, who is providing cheap heating oil to low-income residents of many Northeastern states, while severely criticizing the Bush administration.

"We have stopped thinking about Latin America in this country and we need to change that," Romney said.

He first gained national recognition for his role in turning around the 2002 Winter Olympics.

From 1978 to 1984, Romney was vice president at Bain & Company, Inc. In 1984, he founded Bain Capital, a venture capital and investment company.

Romney received his B.A. from Brigham Young University in 1971, and was awarded an MBA from Harvard Business School, and received his law degree, cum laude, from Harvard Law School.

DOJ_NMG_0140008

Auditor Kicked Off Campaign (TSSC)

The State, March 4, 2007

MYRTLE BEACH — Lois Eargle felt the sting of the political whip this week when she was one of two people cut from a presidential campaign for making unpopular remarks.

Eargle, the Horry County auditor, knows she'll be taking the lashes for a long time just by looking at the fate of the other person dropped by the Duncan Hunter campaign — Henry Jordan, whose words have stuck with him for a decade.

"I guess, darling, just to put it in a nutshell, that's politics," she said.

Ten years ago during a school board meeting, former board member Jordan said, "Screw the Buddhists and kill the Muslims," adding, "And put that in the minutes." He said it was a joke.

Last week, Eargle said she told a woman looking for free legal help for her abused child "to get back to Mexico."

Eargle later said she was misquoted, but in further interviews she restated her view that the woman should return to Mexico.

The campaign took the pair off its list of a fistful of state co-chairmen — honorary titles for regional supporters — because it feared the increasing scrutiny from bloggers and media, said Ron Tyler, Hunter's spokesman.

"It'll never die, so it doesn't matter if she made an error," Tyler said. "For the campaign, it was a fatal error."

But Eargle said she was sure it would not affect her popularity at home.

"That's not going to have anything to do with me, honey, because the people in Horry County know who I am and know I'll stand up for what's right," she said. "I have enough backbone to stand up and say something that other politicians are thinking but won't say."

Eargle went on to rip Hunter, a California Republican, dismissing him as a viable candidate.

"He's not even going to win South Carolina," the former supporter said. "He lied to me. ... A politician is fake. There's a difference between a politician and a statesman. He is no statesman — he's a politician."

Jordan blamed his woes on the media, which he said paid more attention to things conservatives said than liberals.

"Let me tell you how I feel," he said. "The daggum news media's got nothing to write about. I made a joke about Muslims and the daggum news media won't forget it. They keep bringing it up and bringing it up."

Jordan said Hunter had told him some bloggers in California had already begun bringing up his infamous remarks. "He said he thought it might be an issue," Jordan said. "The last thing we want to do is hurt his campaign."

Former Wisconsin Governor Campaigns In Iowa (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

MOUNT PLEASANT, Iowa -- Former Wisconsin Governor Tommy Thompson may not have drawn huge crowds during campaign stops across southern Iowa today, but some of the Iowans who saw him liked what they heard.

Thompson covered several domestic issues and detailed his plan for handling the Iraq war to about three dozen people at a Mount Pleasant restaurant.

Mount Pleasant Republican Bill Layne says Thompson has qualities the country needs in a president including intelligent leadership.Diane Brinkmeyer, of New London, says she liked Thompson's solutions to welfare reform in Wisconsin. And, she says he's personable, which a politician must be to win today.

Thompson criticized health care policy in the United States as stupid, saying it spends almost all the money on care after people are sick instead of prevention.He offered a three-part plan on Iraq including an Iraqi parliament vote on whether the U.S. military should remain in the country, establishment of 18 territories in Iraq and giving one-third of the revenue from the country's oil industry directly to the people.

Thompson also campaigned in Burlington, Ottumwa and Fairfield today.

Recalling Civil Rights, Democrats Seek Black Votes (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

SELMA, Ala., March 3 — Representative John Lewis, whose political career grew out of the civil rights movement, had longed for the day he could vote for someone that he believed could become the nation's first black president. So when Senator Barack Obama entered the race, he was on the cusp of declaring his support.

Until Bill Clinton called.

Now, Mr. Lewis said, he is agonizing over whether to choose Mr. Obama, whom he once described as "the future of the Democratic Party," or Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0140009

"One day I lean one way, the next day I lean another way," said Mr. Lewis, Democrat of Georgia. "Sometimes, you have to have what I call an executive session with yourself, a come-to-Jesus meeting, and somehow, some way we will all have to make a decision."

In the opening stretch of the 2008 Democratic presidential contest, Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, are embroiled in what party officials believe is one of the most competitive scrambles for black supporters since the Voting Rights Act was passed four decades ago. The chief rivals will be here on Sunday when the Clintons and Mr. Obama commemorate the 42nd anniversary of Bloody Sunday, when hundreds of activists — Mr. Lewis among them — crossed the Edmund Pettus Bridge during a civil rights march from Selma to Montgomery.

Representative Artur Davis, Democrat of Alabama, invited Mr. Obama to deliver the keynote address at the historic Brown Chapel on Sunday. After Mr. Obama agreed, Mr. Davis said, Mrs. Clinton accepted an invitation to speak at a church just down the street. And two days ago, Mr. Clinton said he would join his wife in Selma, the first time since she formally entered the race that he has been called on to use his clout so directly to give her a hand.

"Her timing speaks for itself," said Mr. Davis, who supports Mr. Obama.

It will be the first time Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama share the same campaign turf, and curiosity was building Saturday evening as hundreds gathered in the historic district for the weekend festival. Aides to Mrs. Clinton dismissed suggestions that they were following Mr. Obama, but members of Congress traveling to Selma said they were encouraged by her allies to attend her speech, not his.

Mr. Obama also adjusted his schedule, a spokesman said, postponing a fund-raiser in Boston on Sunday evening after learning that the Clintons would be attending the daylong series of events here.

Mr. Edwards declined an invitation. He plans to be in California on Sunday to deliver a speech — about Selma and civil rights — at the University of California, Berkeley.

Black voters are a crucial component of the Democratic electorate. In 2004, despite intensive efforts by President Bush to break the Democratic dominance, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts won about 89 percent of the black vote.

In contested primaries, particularly in South Carolina, black support could be vital to the Democratic nominee. About 50 percent of the primary voters in South Carolina are black, and the state is fourth in line on the nominating calendar. Alabama, where about 60 percent of the primary voters are black, is making plans to move its contest to Feb. 2. And at least 16 states are considering voting on Feb. 5, including Florida, California, Illinois, New York and Texas, all states where black voters could hold considerable sway.

But the weekend appearances also offer a window into a broader struggle among the candidates to define themselves to the country and to associate themselves with the legacy of the civil rights movement in a way that could help them appeal not only to blacks but also to white Democratic voters who are proud of their party's role in that struggle.

Mr. Obama, who was born in 1961, four years before the Selma march, grew up in Hawaii and Indonesia, far from the civil rights battles that played out in the American South. While he plunged into racial issues as a young adult, he has traveled to the region only in recent years, beginning to build relationships with older leaders of the movement.

Mrs. Clinton, who was born in 1947, had her political sensibilities forged during the tumult of the late 1960s. She has benefited from her husband's immense popularity among black voters, built gradually during their years in Arkansas and then the White House. Mr. Clinton will be in Selma to be inducted into the Voting Rights Hall of Fame.

Mr. Edwards, who was born in 1953 and raised in North Carolina, often discusses growing up in the segregated South and the obligation that brings him to address issues of race and class. He has courted black support in both of his presidential campaigns.

For Mrs. Clinton, the Selma appearance could be a test of her ability to connect with black audiences, and of Mr. Clinton's ability to transfer his political aura to his wife.

It also gives Mr. Obama a chance to show he can compete with the Clintons, both in connecting the language and themes of the civil rights movement to the politics of today and in keeping the spotlight on himself in the middle of a head-to-head political spectacle.

"President Clinton remains popular and Senator Clinton will benefit a lot from that, but there are a lot of African-Americans who see the possibility of this," said Representative Elijah E. Cummings, Democrat of Maryland, who supports Mr. Obama. "People say, 'He's like my son or my grandson, and before I die, I'd like to have a chance to vote for someone who can win.' "

Clinton advisers said they were not concerned about polls showing some early signs of a tightened race for black support. They have been honing both a public message and a private political strategy to deal with what they acknowledge is the unmatchable personal appeal of Mr. Obama as a black candidate courting black voters.

DOJ_NMG_0140010

"African-Americans historically align with people based on issues, not personality," said Minyon Moore, a senior Clinton adviser who, among other things, has focused on building support in the black community. "People will look at her record, look at her biography, look at her experience, and support her as a real champion of their issues."

Asked how Mrs. Clinton would compete for black votes with Mr. Obama Ms. Moore said: "It's probably a proud moment for us all. But there's so much history to be made this time around — having the first woman president, having the first African-American nominee, having the first Latino nominee." The latter was a reference to Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, another Democratic candidate.

Ertharin Cousin, a senior adviser to the Obama campaign, said Mr. Obama needed to introduce himself to all voters, including blacks. "We have a responsibility to tell his story, to paint his narrative," Ms. Cousin said. "He may not be of the civil rights era, but he is definitely an extension of the work that was done of that era."

While Mr. Obama must appear credible to civil rights leaders, he is also looking beyond the establishment of black political leaders. He is seeking to give voters a deeper look at him, advisers said, hoping to drive home the notion that a black candidate can win the presidency.

For Mrs. Clinton, the strategy for reaching black voters at this early stage of the campaign involves strong outreach to black elected officials, business leaders and others, followed by phone calls to reinforce her candidacy from her husband and supporters like Robert L. Johnson, who founded Black Entertainment Television.

Mrs. Clinton is seeking to deepen her own relationships with black voters, Mr. Johnson said. "When she's running for president, it's far more important that someone say, 'Gee, it's Hillary Clinton on the phone,' and not, 'President Clinton's calling to ask if we can support his wife,' " Mr. Johnson said. "Hillary knows the black community's attachment to her husband doesn't transfer to her."

It may, however, buy her time to win over voters on her own.

Mr. Lewis, one of the few icons of the civil rights era still active in politics, has been enamored with Mr. Obama since he arrived in Washington. Long before Mr. Lewis knew Mr. Obama would run for president, he invited him to headline a 40th anniversary gala of the Voting Rights Act, saying, "I think the hopes and dreams and aspirations of so many of us are riding on this one man."

Nevertheless, his strong sentiment toward Mr. Clinton has been enough for him to remain neutral in the presidential race.

"I talked with President Clinton. I know him a little better than I know Mrs. Clinton," Mr. Lewis said. "Some of us are caught in between, but isn't it healthy that we have the luxury to choose between two wonderful, gifted politicians?"

The Bridge From Selma, 42 Years Down The Road (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Forty-two years after a 25-year-old activist named John Lewis led voting-rights marchers onto the Edmund Pettus Bridge outside Selma, Ala., only to be beaten and tear-gassed by state troopers on what became known as Bloody Sunday, the bridge is the scene of another kind of showdown. Today, Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton are joining Lewis, now a Democratic congressman from Georgia, and thousands of participants in the annual commemoration of the march from Selma to Montgomery, which was finally completed two weeks after Bloody Sunday with the Rev. Martin Luther King.

In an interview yesterday, Lewis reflected on how history might dignify politics -- and whether politics could cheapen history.

-- David Montgomery

Q. Can this annual pilgrimage to keep the memory of Bloody Sunday alive inform the political discourse of today?

A.It is important to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge again . . . People must never forget that 42 years ago, all across the South, people of color could not participate in the democratic process. It was very hard, almost impossible, to become a registered voter. In Selma, 2.1 percent of African Americans were registered to vote. . . . The journey is to remind us what happened and how it happened. And to try to get the nation to take lessons from the past and build on those lessons and go forward.

Do you fear that the political attention will take away from the historical memory, that the anniversary will be over-politicized?

When we go to Selma and walk across the river, we will be traveling across a very special place where people gave a little blood. I think Senator Clinton and Senator Obama will be mindful that this is not some political march or political gathering. This is a gathering to commemorate, to pay tribute, but to also say to another generation they too can make a difference by getting involved in their own communities.

Do you worry that you and the marchers and these sacred places -- that bridge -- will end up being used as props?

DOJ_NMG_0140011

It is my hope and my prayer that with the presence of the media and the presence of these two candidates for the Democratic nomination, that bridge will not become a prop. People want to be identified with these sacred places. It's like going to the Holy Land, going to Mecca, going to some shrine.

Do you expect Clinton and Obama to put aside their rivalry, link arms and walk together across the bridge?

If you have Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama in a formal presence there on the bridge walking together, I think it will send a strong message of people coming together. It will be beyond politics. What happened in Selma 42 years ago, and what I hope will happen [today], transcends politics. It says something about the distance we've come and the progress we've made as a nation and a people, to have the top two contenders for the nomination for president to be a woman and an African American.

What will you be thinking about as you cross the bridge?

As I walked across that bridge 42 years ago, it was so quiet, so peaceful, so orderly, no one was saying a word. . . . When we got to the highest point on the Edmund Pettus Bridge, looking down across the river, we could see a sea of blue: Alabama state troopers. . . . You saw these guys putting on gas masks, they came toward us, beating us with nightsticks, trampling us with horses and releasing tear gas. . . . I was hit in the head by a state trooper with a nightstick, I thought I was going to die, I had a concussion on the bridge. Forty-two years later, I don't recall how I made it back across the bridge to the streets of Selma to the [Brown Chapel AME] church. Seventeen of us were hospitalized. . . . As I walk across the bridge, I will be reliving those moments.

Will Clinton's speaking simultaneously at First Baptist Church take away from Obama's keynote address at Brown Chapel AME Church?

I don't think it will take away. The churches are so close, both are on the same street. During the height of the movement, during the height of the whole struggle in Selma, Brown Chapel would be full sometimes to capacity, and First Baptist would be full, and the speakers would rotate. We would leave Brown Chapel and go to First Baptist. It's going to be a large crowd [at the anniversary]. They won't all be able to get into Brown Chapel, some people will go to First Baptist.

How will you decide whom to vote for?

Senator Obama is a friend, a wonderful friend. Mrs. Clinton is a friend. Her husband is a friend. . . . It's a luxury, in a sense, it's a good thing to have two strong viable candidates vying for the Democratic nomination, and one happens to be a woman and one happens to be African American. During the movement, from time to time, I would have an "executive session" with myself. I think I'll do that.

Clinton Courts Black Support Amid Obama Surge (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- At 21, South Carolina State Rep. Bakari Sellers is the youngest legislator in the United States and one of the African-American Democrats most rabidly courted by the 2008 presidential contenders.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton personally lobbied Sellers, the son of 1960s civil rights activists, who defeated an incumbent six decades his senior last year.

But he's about to endorse Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and offered some friendly advice for the former first lady about winning the African-American vote.

"For her sake, she needs to get Bill Clinton out there a lot more," said Sellers, one of a half-dozen South Carolina politicians set to endorse Obama.

Her advisers had planned to hold Bill Clinton off the campaign trail until later in the race. But a stunning surge by Obama among black voters in recent weeks has made the former president's help "all the more pressing," according to a person close to the campaign.

That may explain the rushed scheduling of the Clintons at today's anniversary commemoration of the 1965 civil rights march in Selma, Ala., which is shaping up to be a political showdown between political pioneers Obama and Clinton.

Obama confirmed that he'd be attending the event about two weeks ago, followed a week later by Hillary Clinton, who was to accept an award for her husband. In an increasingly claustrophobic race, they'll both be delivering sermons about 11 a.m. to churches scarcely a block apart.

Clinton aides insisted her trip wasn't a me-too excursion -- even though she had to wedge it between a round-trip schlep to California on Saturday and Sunday night-to-Monday swing through Iowa.

On Thursday, the campaign announced that Bill Clinton would also be flying down to Alabama.

The timing aroused suspicion. On Tuesday an eye-popping ABC News/Washington Post poll showed Obama had erased Clinton's 40-point lead among blacks in the past month, jumping out to an 11-point lead.

DOJ_NMG_0140012

Despite Obama's gains, the former first lady is entering friendly territory in Alabama. She holds a 34 to 19 percent lead over Obama among Alabama Democrats, according to a Feb. 28 poll making the rounds among party leaders, with John Edwards finishing third with 10 percent.

But longer-term problems loom, exacerbated by the Clintons' own push to create a 20-state super primary on Feb. 5, 2008. Many of the states scheduled to take part -- including Alabama, Mississippi and Florida and Georgia -- are dominated by black voters. That was fine in pre-Obama days, but now she's in for a fight against a racial native son.

"[The Feb. 5 primary] amplifies the Democratic vote in the South, and this is a region where blacks play a very, very strong role," said Joe Reed, a Democratic National Committee member who runs the influential Alabama Teachers Association.

It's not clear if Clinton needs to win a majority of African-American primary voters to take the nomination, but she has to fight, aides say. And that's why Bill Clinton -- famously mothballed by Al Gore in 2000 -- is coming back to center stage so quickly in the campaign.

"Hillary's in a battle and she needs her best artillery," said New York-based political consultant Hank Sheinkopf, who advises Alabama Democrats. "Bill's the best artillery."

Hillary's Snipe At Obama Erodes Standing In Polls (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

Front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton's decline in the polls stems partly from her attack on Sen. Barack Obama, her chief rival for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, political pollsters said.

The poll numbers changed after the senators traded political blows through their spokesmen when movie mogul David Geffen called Mrs. Clinton a disingenuous, "incredibly polarizing figure" who isn't electable and appeared to allude to her husband's past infidelity. Mr. Geffen, a former Clinton ally, is now backing Mr. Obama.

A Fox News survey of 900 registered voters nationwide conducted Feb. 27-28 found Mrs. Clinton's support had fallen to 34 percent, down from 43 percent the month before. Mr. Obama's support, however, climbed to 23 percent from 15 percent.

"From a national perspective, there has been an erosion in Hillary's support among Democrats and especially among independents, while Obama's numbers have risen among these voters," said pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, a media polling firm based in Rockville.

"I think the attack by her campaign on Obama was a negative for her because of a perception that it was calculated, that it was an attempt to break Obama's momentum. Second, whether fair or unfair, it was seen as the typical Clinton attack machine, where she doesn't do the attacking, but her surrogates do," Mr. Ali said.

An ABC News/Washington Post poll completed four days after the attack story broke showed Mrs. Clinton's support dropping to 36 percent from 41 percent in January, while Mr. Obama's numbers rose to 24 percent from 17 percent.

The poll also showed that voters overall had a less favorable opinion of Mrs. Clinton, with 49 percent holding a positive impression of her, down from 54 percent.

Pollster David Johnson of Strategic Vision, a Republican media marketing firm, said that his polls in key states -- including Florida, Iowa, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Washington and Wisconsin -- showed Mrs. Clinton had "a basic support level of between 30 percent and 35 percent, but she's never been able to go much beyond that."

The Clinton campaign's attacks on Mr. Obama changed the complexion of the campaign and the way some voters perceived her candidacy, Mr. Johnson said.

"The feud knocked the Clintons off their pedestal and affected the polling numbers somewhat," he said. "She's still in first place, but there definitely has been erosion in her support among the Democrats."

Pollsters also say that Mr. Obama's candidacy has hurt Mrs. Clinton's campaign among black voters, who were among her husband's most loyal Democratic supporters during his two terms in office.

Mrs. Clinton had led among black voters in January by 60 percent to 20 percent, but the latest ABC/Washington Post poll shows Mr. Obama leading among blacks, 44 percent to 33 percent.

"Of course, 44 percent is a far cry from the 85 percent of the black vote he will need to win, but it's quite a turnaround in the past month," former Clinton campaign adviser Dick Morris wrote Friday on the Townhall.com political Web site.

Mr. Obama's surge in the polls was especially impressive in Georgia, where increased support from a large black vote has helped to push his approval numbers higher.

"Obama has gone from 18 percent support to 25 percent. Hillary has fallen from 35 percent to 28 percent. He's really surged in that state," Mr. Johnson said.

Geffen, Clinton Were Often At Odds (LAT)

By Stephen Braun, Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

The billionaire shocked many when he criticized the former first lady. But his friendship with the former president was rocky.

WASHINGTON — Long before the fractious public airing of their poisoned relations, the political friendship between David Geffen and Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton was an unconventional alliance with a cloudy future.

The outspoken Hollywood mogul Geffen lavished nearly $1.2 million on the Clintons and other Democrats during the Clinton White House years, gaining extraordinary access to the president while hosting the couple at intimate dinners at his Malibu beachfront home and sleepovers at his estate in Beverly Hills.

But their relations were in constant flux. Intimates of the two said that flashpoints surfaced often: Clinton's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays in the military. The president's scolding of Hollywood after the Columbine school massacre. The Monica S. Lewinsky affair and Clinton's impeachment. And finally, the 11th-hour flurry of controversial pardons that excluded a convicted murderer whose release Geffen had championed.

Their alliance was marked by genuine affection, colleagues say, and a large measure of self-interest. Whether its meltdown has any lasting significance remains to be seen, but Geffen's recent broadside against the Clintons left the political world agape.

Aimed chiefly at Hillary Clinton, who was mostly a bystander to the friendship, Geffen's waspish comments to a New York Times columnist gave voice to the kind of sentiments — that she is polarizing, dishonest, far too ambitious — that her presidential campaign expected from the right, not from a political soul mate.

Geffen has since retreated into silence. He declined to comment for this account, as did spokesmen for both Clintons.

But others who know the principals well described the arc of the star-crossed friendship. Most would only speak anonymously, fearful of risking Geffen's legendary ire and political retribution from the Clintons.

Timely alliance

Geffen first joined forces with Bill Clinton in 1992, soon after becoming a billionaire from the sale of his record company to MCA. Nearing 50, he was about to openly acknowledge his homosexuality.

Several intimates said he grew unnerved by the sway of social and religious conservatives backing the reelection campaign of President George H.W. Bush. Conservative Pat Buchanan's call to arms for a "cultural war," and his mocking that Democrats were radicals posing as moderates in an "exhibition of cross-dressing," nudged Geffen toward a high-profile role in funding the Clinton ticket.

"They were talking about an America that was about being white, Christian, heterosexual male," Geffen said in a 1993 Times interview. "Well, you know there are people who just don't fit into that category."

Eagerly assuming the role of campaign benefactor, Geffen was a leading light among 150 guests who paid $5,000 to honor Clinton at the Beverly Hills home of MCA mogul Lew Wasserman. By the time Clinton won in November, Geffen had donated nearly $100,000 to the campaign and other Democratic causes.

Geffen didn't attend the inaugural festivities. But he joined Clinton at an economic summit in Los Angeles. The agenda was dry financial policy — not Geffen's cup of tea. But the invitation from the White House had thrilled him.

"I can't imagine him doing it for anyone else," the associate said. "But for Clinton, he sat there and got into it. Or at least he pretended to."

The associate said that Geffen openly admired Clinton, intrigued by his mix of Arkansas informality, wonkish fluency and political shrewdness. But at the same time, "David was pretty level-headed about the relationship. He wasn't a showoff about it … you didn't see him dial him up in front of other people to show what kind of access he had."

Geffen had joined a rarified group of Hollywood liberals shepherding millions to campaign coffers, including director Steven Spielberg and film executive Jeffrey Katzenberg, who would become Geffen's partners in founding DreamWorks SKG, the film studio.

One former White House aide said Clinton was particularly "star-struck" by Spielberg and Katzenberg, and eagerly rubbed elbows with them. He roomed overnight at their sumptuous Los Angeles homes, in the Hamptons and in ski country. Geffen opened his beachfront home to Clinton and, on occasion, the first lady.

Several former Clinton aides and fundraisers said that although Geffen could be counted on to open his checkbook, he was prickly and not easily pleased. White House aides "thought of him as high-maintenance," said one Clintonista. Another called him a "whiner." A veteran fundraiser watched Geffen stand on a dining room chair at one event to lecture top Democrats on social policy.

"He's a passionate guy, and he's not cowed by anyone," the fundraiser said. "He'll give you anything you ask for if he thinks it's in his interest. And he'll decide on a dime to dry up that support if he's mad at you."

Friendship tested

DOJ_NMG_0140014

Almost from the start, Geffen's presidential friendship was tested by political tensions of the day. Once elected, Clinton retreated from a promise to allow acknowledged homosexuals to serve in the military. Instead, he adopted a "don't ask, don't tell" policy of letting gays remain in the military as long as they kept their sexual orientation quiet.

Geffen helped bankroll a media campaign led by gay activists to pressure Clinton. "No one in Hollywood did more on gays and lesbians in the military than David Geffen," said David Mixner, an old Clinton friend. But Clinton stuck with his compromise. For gay leaders like Mixner, this led to a severing of ties. Geffen remained a Clinton ally.

"He consciously decided he didn't want it to be a rupture point," an associate said. "David's tendency was to get mad, but he realized he had larger fish to fry, and why give up a good relationship?"

"They had a deep friendship. You could see it," said former Clinton White House Chief of Staff Leon E. Panetta, who joined Geffen and the president at a private Malibu dinner in 1994.

Geffen took care not to neglect the first lady. He co-chaired a January 1994 banquet for AIDS Project Los Angeles where she was feted for her support of AIDS programs. Geffen intimates say that he saw Hillary Clinton as a benign figure on the periphery of his friendship with the president. "She wasn't a political candidate then; she was the first lady," a Geffen colleague pointed out.

Bill Clinton's affair with Lewinsky in 1998 and the impeachment crisis that followed was another test of Geffen's loyalty. At the time, associates say, Geffen privately advised Clinton on how to deal with the media and the public. "They were still close, and they spoke," one Geffen colleague said. "They discussed the issues that were confronting the president."

But Geffen's outlook on Clinton "began to sour," the colleague said. Clinton had also found a new pal in Los Angeles: supermarket magnate Ron Burkle, a political supporter who became a close personal friend.

During one of Clinton's visits to the West Coast in 1999, according to a California Democrat, Geffen insisted that Clinton stay at his home even though Geffen would be out of town. Clinton spent much of the evening at an event at Burkle's 8-bedroom, 13-bath mansion in Beverly Hills, but then dutifully went around the block to neighbor Geffen's estate (8 bedrooms, 9 baths) for the night.

In April 1999, after the Columbine High School rampage, Clinton surprised Hollywood by ordering a commission to investigate how the entertainment industry marketed violent video games to teenagers.

DreamWorks called it "finger-pointing," and Geffen questioned what he perceived as the administration's failure to press hard for tougher firearms controls.

Still, Geffen joined Spielberg and Katzenberg that May in hosting the Clintons at a fete in Beverly Hills. While tenor Andrea Bocelli serenaded the attendees, more than $1.5 million in checks was written to pump up the Democratic Party's 2000 Senate campaigns. One of the new candidates was Hillary Clinton.

If Geffen had become skeptical of the first lady, it didn't prevent him from backing her. Geffen donated $2,000 to her campaign and $13,000 to party political committees that aided her. Geffen also promised $1 million toward the planned Clinton library in Little Rock, Ark., and sent $200,000 as a down payment.

No special favor

As the Clinton presidency neared its end, Geffen also pressed for a favor. He had become a supporter of a campaign to win a presidential pardon for Leonard Peltier, a Native American activist serving a life sentence in the shooting deaths of two FBI agents in 1975 at the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota. Peltier's advocates say he was wrongly convicted.

A pardon was a long shot. Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) was opposed, and more than 500 federal agents and their families protested outside the White House.

According to Geffen associates, DreamWorks corporate spokesman Andy Spahn contacted the White House three times on Peltier's behalf, and Geffen spoke to Clinton about it. Clinton associates recalled only that there were "general contacts." Clinton was "noncommittal," a Geffen intimate said.

When Clinton denied Peltier's petition, Geffen told an aide, "This guy's a politician; you know what they're like."

Geffen's disappointment turned to ire when he learned who did win pardons. They included Marc Rich, a wealthy commodities trader who had fled to Switzerland after he was indicted in 1983 for tax evasion, and convicted Los Angeles drug dealer Carlos Vignali, whose case was pressed by Hugh Rodham, Hillary Clinton's brother.

Several Geffen intimates say he was most angered by a Time magazine article quoting Clinton as telling friends that his denial of the Peltier pardon showed he had not traded pardons for money. "David Geffen will barely talk to me!" Clinton reportedly said.

"That sent him up the wall," an associate said of Geffen. "He had a thing about people who used him to prop themselves up."

DOJ_NMG_0140015

Their friendship dissolved overnight. The DreamWorks executive sent a final $800,000 to honor his pledge to the Clinton library, but that was his last stipend. Geffen remained a loyal benefactor to other Democrats, even donating $5,000 to a PAC that aided Daschle, despite his opposition to the Peltier pardon.

Geffen shut down his donations to Hillary Clinton's Senate campaign and began saying she had no future as a presidential candidate. His recent criticisms of her were not the first.

"She can't win," Geffen said during a public forum at the 92nd Street Y in New York in 2002. "She's an incredibly polarizing figure. I think ambition is not a good enough reason."

By then, Geffen had met with a new Senate hopeful, Barack Obama of Illinois. DreamWorks' Spahn had been impressed and urged the two men to meet, so Geffen invited Obama to his Malibu home for a private dinner with several other Democratic Party supporters.

"They hit it off," Spahn recalled.

Meanwhile, Geffen had ended all contact with the Clintons.

According to one Clinton intimate, the former president tried to keep the relationship alive. "He called a bunch of times, but Geffen never called back," the Clinton associate said. "Eventually, he stopped trying."

Tripping Over The Inevitable (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

The Coming Backlash Against the Clintons

In the 1920s, the Brooklyn Dodgers finished in sixth place seven times in eight years. Late in that unfortunate period, a droll sportswriter, noting the team's listless play, wrote, "Overconfidence may yet cost Brooklyn sixth place."

Hillary Clinton's campaign did not display overconfidence when it directed the recent fusillade at Barack Obama. Her campaign's rhetorical megatonnage was in response to a prominent Obama contributor saying rude things about her. Her overreaction was one of several developments that have clarified the Democratic contest.

Bill Clinton has said, regarding presidential candidates, that Republicans like to fall in line and Democrats like to fall in love. Which explains the Clinton campaign's palpable panic: Democrats have fallen in love, but not with her.

Republicans tend to nominate the next person in line: Vice President Richard Nixon, not Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, to follow President Dwight Eisenhower in 1960; Vice President George H.W. Bush, not Sen. Robert Dole, to follow President Ronald Reagan in 1988; Dole rather than Lamar Alexander or any other contender in 1996; Gov. George W. Bush, whose dynastic lineage propelled him past Sen. John McCain in 2000.

There is a Republican tinge to Sen. Clinton's campaign: She is next in line. That fact -- combined with the Clintons' (how often the plural is pertinent) money machine, combined with the Clintons' earned reputation for ferocity -- is supposed to impart to her an aura of inevitability.

But such an aura annoys voters by telling them that they really have no choice. And that can provoke them to play the game that G.K. Chesterton called "Cheat the Prophet": The players listen politely to explanations of what is inevitable, then they make something else happen, which defeats boredom.

Boredom, the sociologist Robert Nisbet wrote, is among the universal and insistent forces driving human behavior. Mankind's nervous system evolved during millions of dangerous years (saber-toothed tigers, etc.). Now, however, mankind has suddenly, in a few millennia, encountered the monotony of orderly life, which bothers human brains formed by and for hazardous circumstances.

Among the cures of boredom that Nisbet listed are war, murder, revolution, suicide, alcohol, narcotics and pornography. He might have added presidential politics. Memo to the Clinton campaign: Inevitability is boring.

So is a narrow range of choices. Democrats have many interesting candidates, but governors often are the most plausible candidates to be the nation's chief executive and only one remains in the Democratic race -- New Mexico's Bill Richardson. Three former governors -- Virginia's Mark Warner, Indiana's Evan Bayh and Iowa's Tom Vilsack -- have left the field.

Vilsack said the demise of his candidacy was determined by " money and only money." Well, yes, but there were reasons, political and ideological, why he could not find buyers for what he was selling. Nevertheless, his statement triggered the usual laments about the determinative role of money in politics. This year we are told to be horrified by the fact that by November 2008 the presidential contest will have cost $1 billion. Which means that the two-year process will cost half as much as Americans spend every year on Easter candy.

Candidates do have to spend too much time raising money. But that is because the government, by banning large campaign contributions, has transformed a huge American surplus -- money -- into an artificial scarcity. The government began to do this for anti-competitive purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0140016

The modern drive for campaign finance "reforms" is usually said to have been initiated by Democrats in response to Watergate. Democrats did start it, but before Watergate, in response to their traumas of 1968.

That year, Sen. Gene McCarthy's anti-Vietnam insurgency disturbed the Democratic Party's equilibrium by mounting a serious challenge to the renomination of President Lyndon Johnson. McCarthy was able to do that only because a few wealthy people gave him large contributions. Democrats also were alarmed by former Alabama governor George Wallace's success in 1968, and they mistakenly assumed that Wallace, too, was mostly funded by a few very large contributions.

According to John Samples of the Cato Institute (in his book " The Fallacy of Campaign Finance Reform"), congressional Democrats began the process that culminated in criminalizing large contributions -- the kind that can give long-shot candidates, such as Vilsack, a chance to become competitive. Yes, the initial aim of campaign "reforms" was less the proclaimed purpose of combating corruption or "the appearance" thereof than it was to impede the entry of inconvenient candidates into presidential campaigns. In that sense, campaign reform is a government program that has actually worked, unfortunately.

Bring Back The Politics Of Personal Destruction (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

IF you had to put a date on when the Iraq war did in the Bush administration, it would be late summer 2005. That's when the bungled federal response to Hurricane Katrina re-enacted the White House bungling of the war, this time with Americans as the principal victims. The stuff happening on Brownie's watch in New Orleans was recognizably the same stuff that had happened on Donald Rumsfeld's watch in Baghdad. Television viewers connected the dots and the president's poll numbers fell into the 30s. There they have largely remained — at least until Friday, when the latest New York Times-CBS News Poll put him at 29.

Now this pattern is repeating itself: a searing re-enactment of the Iraq war's lethal mismanagement is playing out on the home front, again with potentially grave political consequences. The Washington Post's exposé of the squalor at Walter Reed Army Medical Center — where some of our most grievously wounded troops were treated less like patients than detainees — has kicked off the same spiral of high-level lying and blame-shifting that followed FEMA's Katrina disasters.

Just as the debacle on the gulf was a call to arms for NBC's Brian Williams and CNN's Anderson Cooper, so the former ABC anchor Bob Woodruff has returned from his own near-death experience in Iraq to champion wounded troops let down by their government. And not just at Walter Reed. His powerful ABC News special last week unearthed both a systemic national breakdown in veterans' medical care and a cover-up. The Veterans Affairs Department keeps "two sets of books" — one telling the public that the official count of nonfatal battlefield casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan stands at 23,000, the other showing an actual patient count of 205,000. Why the discrepancy? A new Brownie — Jim Nicholson, the former Republican National Committee hack whom President Bush installed as veterans affairs secretary — tells Mr. Woodruff "a lot of them come in for dental problems."

Yet 2007 is not 2005, and little more damage can be inflicted on the lame-duck Bush White House. The long-running Iraq catastrophe is now poised to mow down a second generation of political prey: presidential hopefuls who might have strongly challenged Bush war policy when it counted and didn't. That list starts with the candidates long regarded as their parties' 2008 favorites, John McCain and Hillary Clinton.

Senator McCain, who, unlike Senator Clinton, fervently supports the war and the surge, is morbidly aware of his predicament. This once-ebullient politician has been off his game since a conspicuously listless January "Meet the Press" appearance; on Thursday, he had to publicly apologize after telling David Letterman, in an unguarded moment of genuine straight talk, that American lives were being "wasted" in Iraq. (Barack Obama had already spoken the same truth and given the same pro forma apology.) Last week a Washington Post-ABC News Poll confirmed Mr. McCain's worst political fears. Rudy Giuliani now leads him two to one among Republicans, a tripling of Mr. Giuliani's lead in a single month.

Mr. Giuliani is also a war supporter and even contributed a Brownie of his own to the fiasco, the now disgraced Bernard Kerik, who helped botch the training of the Iraqi police. But, unlike Mr. McCain, Mr. Giuliani isn't dogged by questions about Iraq. To voters, his war history begins and ends with the war against the enemy that actually attacked America on 9/11. He wasn't a cheerleader for the subsequent detour into Iraq, wasn't in office once the war started, and actively avoids speaking about it in any detail.

What makes Mr. Giuliani's rise particularly startling is that his liberal views and messy personal history are thought to make him a nonstarter with his own party faithful. These handicaps haven't kicked in, the Beltway explanation has it, because benighted Republican voters don't yet really know that "America's mayor" once married a cousin or that he describes himself as "pro-choice." But perhaps these voters aren't as ignorant as Washington thinks. After the flameouts of Tom DeLay, Bill Frist, Rick Santorum, Ralph Reed and other Bible-thumping politicos who threw themselves on the altars of Terri Schiavo or Jack Abramoff, maybe most Republicans could use a rest from the moral brigade. Maybe these voters, too, care more about the right to life of troops thrust into an Iraqi civil war than that of discarded embryos used in stem-cell research.

DOJ_NMG_0140017

The same cultural dynamic is playing out among Democrats, though Mrs. Clinton doesn't seem to know it. Her poll numbers, too, are showing erosion — some of it because of Mr. Obama's growing profile among African-Americans, but some of it (in a Time survey) after her dust-up with the Hollywood tycoon David Geffen. Most Washington hands declared Mrs. Clinton the winner in that spat because she had forced Mr. Obama off his high horse of "hope." But there's no evidence to support this theory. In the real world, most Americans don't know who Mr. Geffen is. There wasn't even any video of him to run on "Hardball," where the Clinton campaign spokesman's Jim Cramer-esque hyperbole made him look threatened by Mr. Obama's rising popularity.

The most revealing aspect of the incident was not in any case the who's-up-who's-down prognostications for a primary process some 10 months away. Rather, it was the fervor with which the Clinton campaign accused Mr. Geffen and Mr. Obama of practicing "the politics of personal destruction." This over-the-top reaction seemed detached from reality, almost as if the Clinton camp were nostalgically wishing it could refight the last political war — and once again clobber repellent old impeachment nemeses. But that battle may not be in the offing. Anti-Clinton rage has cooled, and the Clinton hating industry ain't what it used to be. As The Times reported last month, even Richard Mellon Scaife, who bankrolled much of the vast right-wing conspiracy, has moved on. As with Mr. Giuliani's marital history, any scandalous new revelation about the Clintons' private lives might play out less momentously in post-9/11 America than it did in the last century.

You can't blame the Clinton campaign for praying it had Kenneth Starr and The American Spectator to kick around again. It would be easier to fight that war than confront the one in Iraq. Far easier. Senator Clinton's words about the war still don't parse. When I made this point previously, a Clinton ally phoned to say that whatever the senator's Iraq statements, she is an exceptionally smart and capable leader by any presidential standard. I agree, and besides, Iraq isn't the only issue in 2008. But Iraq will overshadow every candidate and every other subject as long as the war grinds gruesomely on, whether in Baghdad or at a V.A. hospital.

The issue is not that Mrs. Clinton voted for the war authorization in 2002 or that she refuses to call it a mistake in 2007. Those are footnotes. The larger issue is judgment, then and now. Take her most persistent current formulation on Iraq: "Obviously, if we knew then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote and I certainly wouldn't have voted that way." It's fair to ask: Knew what then? Not everyone was so easily misled by the White House's manipulated intelligence and propaganda campaign. Some of her fellow leaders in Washington — not just Mr. Obama out in Illinois, not just Al Gore out of power — knew plenty in the fall of 2002. Why didn't she?

Bob Graham, then Senate Intelligence Committee chairman, was publicly and privately questioning the W.M.D. intelligence. So was Nancy Pelosi. Chuck Hagel warned that the war was understaffed, that an Iraq distraction might cause Afghanistan "to go down again" and that the toppling of Saddam could be followed by chaos. Joe Biden convened hearings to warn of the perils of an ill-planned post-Saddam Iraq.

Some of these politicians ended up voting to authorize war exactly as Mrs. Clinton did (Senators Hagel and Biden). Some didn't. But all of them — and there were others as well — asked tougher questions and exerted more leadership. John Edwards, by the way, did not: he was as trigger-happy about speeding up the war authorization then ("The time has come for decisive action") as he is gung-ho about withdrawal now, despite being an Intelligence Committee member when Mr. Graham sounded alarms about the Bush administration's W.M.D. claims.

Another fair question is what Mrs. Clinton learned once the war began. Even in the summer of 2003 — after the insurgency had started, after the W.M.D. had failed to materialize, after the White House had retracted the president's 16 words about "uranium from Africa," more than two months after "Mission Accomplished" had failed to end major combat operations — she phoned a reporter at The Daily News, James Gordon Meek, to reiterate that she still had no second thoughts about the war. (Mr. Meek first wrote about this July 14, 2003, conversation in December 2005.) Was that what this smart woman really believed then, or political calculation?

Either way, she made a judgment, and she will not be able to spend month after month explaining it away to voters with glib, lawyerly statements. The politics of personal destruction, should they actually visit the Clintons once more, will not take America's mind off the politics of mass destruction in Iraq.

Politics Means Sometimes Having To Say You're Sorry (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

O.K., so Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton won't accede to demands from some Democrats to apologize for her 2002 vote authorizing military action in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0140018

But that doesn't mean she has an allergy to apologizing.

She just does it in her own, very Hillary way, as a review of her apologies shows.

Mrs. Clinton can be rather artful, for instance, at turning around her apologies to generate sympathy for herself. During her husband's campaign against President George H. W. Bush in 1992, amid the Gennifer Flowers fracas, Mrs. Clinton casually mentioned to a journalist rumors that Mr. Bush had engaged in extramarital "carrying on." She soon paid penance for her gossiping this way:

"It was a mistake. People were asking me questions at the time and I responded. But nobody knows better than I the pain that can be caused by even discussing rumors in private conversation, and I did not mean to be hurtful to anyone."

Said Mary Matalin, a Bush campaign aide at the time: "They call that an apology?"

Self-deprecation is another trademark. After a head-shaker of a line in 2004 — that Gandhi used to run a gas station in St. Louis — she poked at herself by saying: "I have admired the work and life of Mahatma Gandhi. I truly regret if a lame attempt at humor suggested otherwise."

Like many talented politicians, on matters of state — such as the 1994 defeat of the health care reform effort she led — her admission of error can be so nuanced that listeners may wonder if an apology was really her point.

"I'm not bitter," she said in the fall of 1994. "We made mistakes. But I actually feel good about the way we ended up. We got people talking about national health care. People say, 'Don't give up.' So I won't."

Thus, people who say that Senator Clinton is too self-righteous to admit fault on Iraq are at least half-wrong. There are plenty of examples of her saying she was wrong. And sometimes she does it quickly, as she did in 1992 to the country singer Tammy Wynette, famous for the 1969 hit, "Stand by Your Man," after saying that she was not "some little woman standing by my man like Tammy Wynette."

She can also drag her heels on admitting a mistake — and has regretted it. She says in her autobiography that she did not appreciate the political toll of the Whitewater scandal, and that, as a result, public relations mistakes were made. At a Whitewater news conference in 1994, she said that one of her biggest regrets was that her reluctance to provide information to the news media had fed an image that she was hiding something.

Some of her Democratic rivals are thirstily trying to make a character issue out of her refusal to apologize on Iraq. Twice in the last two weeks, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, has said that voters want a president "to tell the truth when you believe you have made a mistake," as he put it during a visit to New York.

But beyond the fact that Mrs. Clinton says she has nothing to apologize for, she knows, as with Whitewater, that apologizing in the midst of political warfare is risky. Indeed, she has said that she is willing to lose voters rather than make an apology she does not believe in.

"In politics, people demand an apology from an opponent in order to humiliate them," said Deborah Tannen, a linguistics professor at Georgetown who has written on apologies.

Many Americans don't love leaders who apologize willy-nilly. In 2004, voters chose a Republican for president who stood his ground on the war against all critics instead of a Democrat who sounded apologetic when he said that he voted for $87 billion in troop funding before he voted against it.

And President Clinton was derided in some quarters as the apologizer in chief, not just for personal foibles (see Lewinsky, Monica) but for a whole history book of national wrongs (from the slave trade to Rwanda).

Graham Dodds, a political scientist at Concordia University in Montreal, who has studied political apologies, said of Mrs. Clinton, "She comes from a household that is well versed in the art of political apology, and, I'm sure, knows the risks in coming off as overly apologetic." .

On foreign affairs, beyond Iraq, Mrs. Clinton hasn't been much of a target for apology-seekers. She speaks with precise care on national security matters.

In a review of her history of apologizing, only one mea culpa on the international stage stands out: That she did not immediately reject remarks by Suha Arafat, wife of the Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat, at a joint event where Mrs. Arafat suggested that Israel had used poison gas to control Palestinians. Mrs. Clinton denounced the remark a day later, saying she had gotten an incomplete translation.

Conventional wisdom holds that a commander in chief cannot look weak, and a female candidate for the office faces an even stricter standard for toughness.

"We're a very macho culture, and I think every women in public office has to find her path to negotiate that," Ms. Tannen said. "To the extent she's a woman and has to prove she's tough, standing her ground is the best thing to do. And to the extent she's a woman and people don't tolerate toughness in women, she's going to be faulted for that."

Professor Tannen sees four elements to a good apology: You admit fault; you express regret; you acknowledge the damage done; and you either promise to make amends, or promise not to make the same mistake again.

DOJ_NMG_0140019

On the matter of her 2002 Iraq vote, Senator Clinton has put the fault on President Bush. She has expressed regret that he used the 2002 Senate vote as a means for war, acknowledged that the war was poorly conducted, and promised that she would not vote the same way again. Not exactly a rationale for an apology.

In this regard, Professor Dodds said, she is more like President Bush than her husband.

"It's a hallmark of Bush that he sticks to his guns no matter what," Mr. Dodds said. "If she were to apologize now, she would open herself up to the charge of flip-flopping."

Phony apologies, too, can easily fail the smell test. So do half-way admissions of remorse.

"The thing about an apology is that it can make powerful people look weak, such as if Hillary admitted mistakes on Iraq and Democrats didn't accept that," Mr. Dodds said. "An apology does not always work."

Obama Headlines Labor Rally (CHIT)

By John McCormick

Chicago Tribune, March 4, 2007

With Democrats in control of Congress and seeking to boost a struggling labor movement, national union leaders joined Illinois' two senators at a rally Saturday in Chicago to promote legislation to make it easier for workers to join a union against the wishes of their employers.

"We will pass the Employee Free Choice Act. It's not a matter of if, it's a matter of when," said Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). "We may have to wait for the next president to sign it, but we will get this thing done."

The Democratic presidential candidate headlined the rally before traveling to Alabama for a Sunday event commemorating the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march, an occasion that also will attract Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and her husband.

In his speech to about 1,500 labor activists at the Hyatt Regency Chicago, Obama reflected on the crusades of Martin Luther King in support of the labor movement.

"He didn't just march for justice that day," he said. "They were marching for jobs."

Two protesters briefly interrupted Obama's speech. One of them carried a large sign that appeared to be critical of statements the senator made Friday to a pro-Israel group in Chicago where he said he would not rule out military action against Iran because of its uranium-enrichment program.

"OK. We appreciate that," Obama said, trying to deflect the situation, as the protesters were escorted from the ballroom. "I oppose the war in Iraq."

For the second day, Obama made no mention of Friday's Baltimore Sun report that some of his mother's ancestors owned slaves. Despite a crush of local reporters seeking comment, he exited the ballroom without answering any questions after several minutes of shaking hands, posing for photos and signing books.

The labor rally followed a vote Thursday in the House, where Democrats, in a nod to organized labor for its help in retaking control of Congress, approved a bill that would take away the right of employers to demand secret balloting by workers before unions could be recognized.

Under the bill, the National Labor Relations Board would certify a union if it wins a majority of cards signed by workers. Currently, the NLRB calls for a secret vote if more than 30 percent of workers say they support a union. In order to win the election, the union must garner the majority of the workers' votes.

Unions argue that change is needed because employers intimidate workers before voting and by legally battling elections for so long that the victories become meaningless.

Should the legislation pass both chambers of Congress, President Bush would almost certainly veto it. The rally was sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Council 31, which has 100,000 active and retired members.

As part of the event, the local union received a check from its national parent for $1 million to aid an ongoing labor-organizing effort involving Chicago-area hospital operator Resurrection Health Care. AFSCME President Gerald McEntee, who was joined on stage by AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, delivered the check for what is the largest private-sector union drive in the nation.

In his address at the rally, Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) lamented the movement of American jobs overseas and pledged his support in the Senate for the bill.

"If we're going to end this race to the bottom … we need to restore balance in the American workplace," he said. "Workers need to be free to choose whether they want to be in a union."

Durbin also reiterated his support for his junior senator's campaign. "You can tell your papa. You can tell your mama. This voter is for President Barack Obama," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0140020

Obama: Senate Will Pass Labor Union-backed Measure (AP)

AP, March 3, 2007

CHICAGO – Democratic Presidential candidate Barack Obama said yesterday that the Senate would pass legislation making it easier for workers to start unions against companies' wishes. Getting it past President Bush is another matter, he said.

"We may have to wait for the next President to sign it, but we will pass it," the Illinois senator told a cheering crowd of more than 1,000 people at a labor rally. "We will get this thing done."

Despite Obama's optimism, the Senate's Republican leader, Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, has said he will block the measure and the White House says Bush will veto it if it gets to him.

The House passed the Employee Free Choice Act on Thursday.

Obama headlined a rally that included national and local labor leaders, and state politicians. The event was sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Council 31, which has 100,000 active and retired members in Illinois.

It was Obama's second major public appearance in his hometown in as many days. The state's junior senator did not take questions from reporters at either event.

On Friday, Obama told the American Israel Public Affairs Committee that he was committed to the security of Israel.

He also criticized the Bush administration for what he said were failings in Iraq that have strengthened Iran's position in the region.

The senator said he planned to be in Selma, Ala., today to commemorate the 42nd anniversary of the civil rights march that helped end segregation in the South.

Richardson Vows To Outwork Rivals (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, March 3, 2007

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said Friday on his first trip to Iowa as a presidential candidate that he will challenge the better-known Democrats running for the 2008 nomination by working harder to reach party activists in the leadoff caucus state.

"My campaign mode is shaking hands, meeting people, being scrutinized, talking issues," Richardson said in a Des Moines Register interview at the outset of his two-day campaign swing. "Iowans, I understand, like to decide. They like to decide, not who the pundits and the polls decide."

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's withdrawal from the race last week leaves Richardson the only governor in the large Democratic field. The rest of the better-known candidates are members or former members of Congress.

Richardson served seven terms in the U.S. House, but his executive experience, plus past work as U.S. energy secretary and ambassador to the United Nations, makes him the most qualified, he said.

Getting U.S. troops out of Iraq within a year and dramatically diminishing the nation's use of petroleum in 10 years are Richardson's top priorities, he said during appearances in Des Moines.

"Bill Richardson is not a rock star," Richardson said during a taping of Iowa Press, a public affairs program on Iowa Public Television. "Bill Richardson is a grass-roots candidate."

A national Fox News poll published Friday showed Richardson with support from 1 percent of Democrats. The poll's leaders were New York Sen. Hillary Clinton with 34 percent, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama with 23 percent and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards with 12 percent.

As Clinton planned to return to Iowa on Sunday for a quick overnight visit, Richardson was making several stops throughout central Iowa on Friday and today.

Richardson met with about two-dozen Democratic elected officials from Polk County at an east-side restaurant in Des Moines before attending a reception with students at Drake University. He also planned to attend a reception at the home of state Rep. Mark Davitt in Indianola, the first of several similar receptions he was scheduled to attend during his two-day trip.

Thursday's blizzard threatened the trip, and forced him to wait until Friday morning to take off from Santa Fe, N.M.

"It was a little dicey," Richardson said about his arrival in Iowa on a small private jet. "Like, zero visibility and 40-mile-per-hour winds."

Richardson plans to meet with a group of Democratic women, then with union leaders in Des Moines today before headlining local party gatherings in Marshalltown, Ames and Boone.

While Richardson has registered in the low single digits in early Iowa polls, he has signed as a top consultant one of the party's most notable veteran organizers with Iowa experience. Steve Murphy, who managed former U.S. Rep. Dick Gephardt's 1988 and 2004 presidential campaigns, is signed on with Richardson.

DOJ_NMG_0140021

Richardson's national success relies on doing well in the Nevada caucuses, scheduled for five days after Iowa's. But Iowa, scheduled to host the first nominating event of 2008 on Jan. 14, could give him a boost before heading to the first Western contest.

"It's probably hard to win here, but I've got to break through here," Richardson said. "What I don't want is to get buried here, so I'm going to be here a lot."

Neither Clinton, Nor Obama (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

So there I was, sitting in my office, quietly contemplating suicide. I was watching a cattle call of Democratic presidential candidates on C-Span. In their five-minute speeches, they were laying it on thick with poll-tested, consultant-driven clichés of the Our Children Are Our Future variety. The thought of having to spend the next two years listening to this drivel set me wondering if it was literally possible to be bored to death.

Then Bill Richardson walked onstage. He was dressed differently — in slacks and a sports jacket. He told jokes that didn't seem repeated for the 5,000th time. He seemed recognizably human, unlike some of his overpolished peers. He gave the best presentation, by far.

Then a heretical question entered my head: What if Richardson does this well at forums for the next 10 months? Is it possible to imagine him as a leading candidate for the nomination?

When you think that way, it becomes absurdly easy to picture him rising toward the top. He is, after all, the most experienced person running for president. He served in Congress for 14 years. He was the energy secretary (energy's kind of vital).

He's a successful two-term governor who was re-elected with 69 percent of the vote in New Mexico, a red state. Moreover, he's a governor with foreign policy experience. He was U.N. ambassador. He worked in the State Department. He's made a second career of negotiating on special assignments with dictators like Saddam, Castro and Kim Jong Il. He negotiated a truce in Sudan.

Most of all, he's not a senator. Since 1961, 40 senators have run for president and their record is 0-40. A senator may win this year, but you'd be foolish to assume it.

When it comes to policy positions, he's perfectly positioned — not by accident — to carry liberals and independents. As governor, he's covered the normal Democratic bases: he raised teacher pay, he expanded children's health insurance, he began programs to stall global warming, he built a light rail line.

But he also cut New Mexico's top income tax rate from 8.2 percent to 4.9 percent. He handed out tax credits to stimulate economic growth. (He's the only Democrat completely invulnerable on the tax cut issue.) He supports free trade, with reservations. And he not only balanced the budget — he also ran a surplus.

On cultural issues, Richardson has the distinct advantage of not setting off any culture war vibes. He was in college in the late 1960s, but he was listening to the Beach Boys, not Janis Joplin. He was playing baseball in the Cape Cod League, not going to Woodstock. He idolized Humphrey, not McCarthy.

Richardson is actually something of a throwback pol — a Daley or La Guardia who doesn't treat politics as a moral crusade. That might appeal this year.

On the nuts and bolts of the campaign, he has some advantages as well. He won't have the $150 million war chests that Clinton and Obama will have. On the other hand, he won't have the gigantic apparatuses that fund-raising on that scale requires. While those campaigns may be bloated, overmanaged and remote, Richardson has the potential to be small and nimble.

Furthermore, he could generate waves of free media the way John McCain did in 2000. He's a reporters' favorite — candid, accessible and fun to be around. "I'm a real person, not canned. I don't have a whole bunch of advisers. I'm a little overweight, though I'm trying to dress better," he told me last week. So far, rumors of personal peccadilloes are unfounded.

Finally, there is the matter of his personal style. This is his biggest drawback. He's baggy-faced, sloppy (we like our leaders well groomed), shamelessly ambitious and inelegant. On the other hand, once a century or so the Democratic Party actually nominates somebody the average person would like to have a beer with. Bill Richardson is that kind of guy.

He is garrulous, amusing, touchy-feely (to a fault), a little rough-edged and comfortably mass-market. He's Budweiser, not microbrew. It doesn't hurt that he's Hispanic and Western.

In short, when you try to think forward to next winter, you see that this campaign will at some point leave the "American Idol"/"Celebrity Deathmatch" phase. The Clinton-Obama psychodrama may cease to fascinate while the sheer intensity of coverage will create a topsy-turvy series of revolutions.

DOJ_NMG_0140022

I wouldn't bet a paycheck on Richardson. But I wouldn't count him out. At the moment, he's the candidate most likely to rise.

Kucinich Outlines Plan For Iraq Withdrawal (NHUL)

By Jim Kozubek

New Hampshire Union Leader, March 4, 2007

MERRIMACK – Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich outlined his 12-point plan for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq during a meeting with residents in the basement of the Merrimack Public Library yesterday.

The initial and perhaps most important step for a stable Iraq is to stop funding military operations that are contributing to a civil war, insurgency and more casualties, said Kucinich, a Democratic candidate for President.

Congress is preparing to vote for $100 billion in supplemental funding for the operation, money that he said might be used for military strikes in Iran, covert operations, and what some suspect, funding for insurgencies to maintain a balance of power in the region.

The executive branch has exploited the War Powers Act, and Congress has tacitly supported the war every step of the way by rubber-stamping funding, he said.

"The funding of this war has been voted on at least 12 or 13 times, and Congress keeps reauthorizing the war all over again," he said, adding that candidates Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards have repeatedly voted to renew funding.

Kucinich said the government often does not even have a record for how funds are spent, and corrupt contractors and enemies might end up with money with no specified earmarks.

"Iraqi holdings were originally taken and shipped to the United States and converted into $10.8 billion in hundred dollar bills, shrink-wrapped, put on pallets and loaded on a cargo plane, and nobody knows what happened to that money," he said.

Kucinich said the United States should turn Iraq and its oil reserves back over to its countrymen to restore accountability and enable them to control their own assets.

The U.S. has an obligation to pay reparations to the families of the 650,000 collateral deaths caused since the start of the war, and to provide some backing to an Iraqi government that will gradually begin to take on international loans, he said.

The U.S. subsequently has a responsibility to ensure that loans granted by the World Bank are negotiated fairly, without conditions that in return impose corporate interests such as the privatization of oil on the country, he said.

Corporate-dominated trade negotiations have already compromised domestic policies and economic prospects, he said.

"I want to restore bilateral trade for worker rights, human rights and the environment," he said. "Before NAFTA and other such trade agreements, there was more of a balance, but since these agreements, we have seen a trade deficit and wages depressed."

Kucinich also said one out of every four dollars currently paid for health care was going for profit, and he would like to develop a non-profit health care system with savings that could easily cover the expense of modern medicine.

Andy Sylvia, chairman of the Merrimack Democratic Committee, said he wasn't sure who he was going to vote for yet, but was especially impressed with Kucinich's stance on Iraq.

"I appreciate the clarity he has brought to the Iraq issue," Sylvia said. "We were kind of railroaded into this and he stood up to that."

Ex-GOP Candidates Turn Attacks Back On National Panel (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- One advertisement accused the rival candidate of billing taxpayers for a call to a phone-sex line. One alleged that a candidate "fixed" his daughter's speeding tickets. Still others stated that a candidate endorsed a "coffee talk with the Taliban," and that another was supported by the Communist Party.

Each charge was misleading at best, demonstrably false at worst. Yet the National Republican Congressional Committee paid for each of those ads last year, and its leaders said they could do nothing to pull them, even after some of the Republicans whom the ads were designed to help demanded that they come down.

Now, four months after Republicans lost control of Congress, many of their former candidates are calling for major changes at the NRCC. They depict the committee as a rogue attack-ad shop that shielded party leaders from having to account for the claims in their ads -- encouraging over-the-top accusations that often hurt GOP candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0140023

"They weren't just attacking my opponent -- they were, bit by bit, destroying a reputation that I had spent years and years building," said Ray Meier, a Republican candidate in upstate New York whose Democratic opponent was wrongly accused of making adult fantasy calls.

The NRCC funneled more than $83 million through a special "independent expenditure" arm that made all decisions regarding ads.

The creation of the independent entity meant that when candidates such as Meier called NRCC headquarters to complain about the ads, committee officials said they couldn't discuss them, much less yank them from the air, without violating campaign-finance law.

The law places strict limits on how much help national parties can offer candidates; in 2006, they were limited to about $80,000 in direct support of each House candidate. But court rulings have established the right of independent groups to spend unlimited sums.

Thus, national parties have been funneling their giant war chests into independent committees -- putting vast resources behind ads of a type that used to exist only on the political fringes.

The 1988 "Willie Horton" ad aimed at Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis, for instance, was run by an independent group that had no ties to the Bush-Quayle campaign. Likewise, the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth attacked Democrat John F. Kerry in 2004, but was independent of President Bush's campaign.

But now, taking advantage of the latest loophole in the campaign-finance system, the national parties have started putting most of their advertising money into independent groups of their own creation. In 2006, spending by the Democratic and Republican parties' independent expenditure arms jumped 65 percent from 2004, to $202.4 million, according to Federal Election Commission data.

The parties have essentially created their own version of the Swift Boat Veterans -- entities that operate outside the normal political apparatus, said Fred Wertheimer, president of the government watchdog group Democracy 21.

"There's no accountability," he said. "When you have unaccountability on this stuff, people start overreaching. And this idea of creating a Chinese wall within the party, where the people who are doing the ads are kept separate from the people who are doing the expenditures, is a fiction."

Though both parties spent heavily on negative ads through their independent expenditure arms, the NRCC was by far the biggest spender last year, spreading around $20 million more than its Democratic counterpart. And watchdog groups have tagged the Republicans -- and the NRCC in particular -- as the worst offenders in stretching the truth.

Annenberg Political Fact Check, a nonpartisan group that studies campaign advertisements, called the NRCC's ads "the very definition of political mudslinging."

"The National Republican [Congressional] Committee's work stands out this year for the sheer volume of assaults on the personal character of Democratic House challengers," stated the Fact Check report, which also cited one Democratic ad as based on "flimsy evidence at best."

Representative Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican who is among the 2006 candidates who feel the NRCC's actions hurt his campaign, said he plans to file a bill that would allow candidates in both parties to prohibit the national parties from advertising on their behalf.

"I would have been better off if they didn't spend one penny on my race," said Shays. "The least we should do is give a candidate the ability to say no. "

The NRCC's chairman during the 2006 elections, Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, defended the ads, saying they were well-documented and generally effective. He conceded that his independent expenditure arm "took a lot of liberties," but said Democratic committees also stretched the truth.

NRCC ads saved 10 to 20 Republican-held seats, Reynolds said. "Everybody has an opinion, and hindsight after an election is about 20-20," he said.

Last year, Reynolds put a veteran NRCC operative, Carl Forti, in charge of the party's independent committee. Reynolds said that, in keeping with the law, Forti made all advertising decisions and had no contact with his bosses at the NRCC while working on independent ads.

Forti, who now works as political director of the presidential campaign of former governor Mitt Romney, declined to comment, citing the NRCC's policy of not discussing independent expenditure operations publicly.

The independent expenditure operation spent $77 million attacking Democratic House candidates, while spending $6.6 million in positive ads boosting Republicans, according to FEC disclosures.

Among the attack ads was the television spot in Meier's race against Michael Arcuri, a former county district attorney. Arcuri's hotel bill from a business trip included a one-minute call to an adult talk service, which cost taxpayers $1.25. Immediately thereafter, another call was placed to a number that was identical except for the area code: the number for the state Department of Criminal Justice Services.

DOJ_NMG_0140024

It was clearly a wrong number, but the NRCC stood by the ad. Arcuri won the race.

Similar alleged misstatements reverberated in races across the country. In North Carolina, an NRCC ad said that Democrat Heath Shuler was "caught again not paying his taxes on time." But Shuler had sold his majority stake in the business referenced in the ad in 2003. Shuler won his race, defeating an incumbent Republican.

In Indiana, Democrat Brad Ellsworth was accused of "fixing" his daughter's speeding tickets while serving as a county sheriff, though Annenberg Political Fact Check found the ticket was paid in full. Ellsworth also unseated an incumbent Republican.

In Iowa, an NRCC ad suggested that Democrat Bruce Braley was backed by the Communist Party, citing the fact that a party newspaper labeled Braley a "peace candidate." Republican candidate Mike Whalen said he immediately called friends in Washington to pressure the NRCC to take the ad down, but was told that nothing could be done because it was a product of the independent expenditure arm.

"I went ballistic, desperately trying to send the message through back channels," Whalen said. "They didn't care. They said, 'We don't have any control over it.' . . . That ad in particular I think sullied my reputation, and I will always resent that ad."

Braley beat Whalen by 12 percentage points in a district that had long been a GOP stronghold.

Voters in Connecticut received an NRCC mailing that accused Democrat Diane Farrell of wanting to have a "coffee talk with the Taliban." The NRCC's evidence: Farrell accepted a campaign contribution from a group that included a board member who had once suggested establishing talks with the Taliban.

Farrell's Republican opponent -- Shays -- said he called allies at the White House and the Republican National Committee to press the NRCC to repudiate the mailing.

But NRCC officials, Shays said, prevented him from speaking directly with Reynolds. Reynolds defended that move, saying the committee would have been violating the law if it permitted candidates to coordinate with the independent expenditure arm.

But some campaign-finance specialists dispute the claim that party committees couldn't stop ads they were paying for. While the law prevents party leaders from coordinating messages with their independent arms, they could have refused to pay for ads they disapproved of, said Paul S. Ryan, associate legal counsel at the Campaign Legal Center, a nonpartisan group.

"The party leadership can close the purse strings when and if they don't like the ad coming out of their independent expenditure arm," Ryan said.

Because the Supreme Court has affirmed parties' rights to set up independent committees, party leaders say, they are likely to continue the practice .

Nonetheless, the NRCC's new leaders say they are listening to candidates' complaints. The new NRCC chairman, Representative Tom Cole of Oklahoma, appointed a task force to reevaluate the party's independent expenditure strategy.

Acknowledging lapses in "political judgment" last year, Cole said he wants assurances that his committee's ads will be factual as well as politically wise.

"When you get a lot of consultants in a hothouse, late in the campaign, and people really aren't responsible [for the message] because you're not working for the candidate, it's really easy to take a flier," Cole said.

Until party leaders take more responsibility for their ads, they are likely to frustrate more candidates. Meier, who gave up his state Senate seat to run for Congress, said he found it maddening to watch the campaign he waged on local issues make a sudden turn to the gutter.

"These scandalous and slanderous ads became the topic of conversation," Meier said. "Never having run for national office before, you know this is a mean business. You have no idea how mean."

The Power Player (WP)

By Robert G. Kaiser

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

How the Rise of One Lobbying Firm Helped Transform the Way Washington Works

For Gerald Sylvester Joseph Cassidy, creator and proprietor of the most lucrative lobbying firm in Washington, May 17, 2005, was a day to exult. That bright, clear spring Tuesday marked the 30th birthday of Cassidy & Associates, and an impressive crowd had come to pay tribute to a godfather of the influence business.

Hundreds of guests gathered on the rooftop terrace of a handsome new office building at the foot of Capitol Hill, 13 stories above Constitution Avenue. A vivid orange sun descended gently behind the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial at the western end of the Mall, casting angular beams of light across the assembled throng. The guests' view from the roof was filled by the United States Capitol, which from this startling vantage point could be seen, from end to end, in a single field of vision. The Capitol looked contained and compact, almost a plaything within easy reach.

DOJ_NMG_0140025

As the setting sun illuminated the scene, the party illuminated a new Washington -- a capital transformed by big money in the 30 years since Cassidy became a lobbyist. This new Washington operated on new ethical norms, embraced new standards of risk and reward and offered tempting new career choices for former officials, members of Congress, their spouses and their aides.

Cassidy helped invent the new Washington, which had made him seriously rich. His personal fortune exceeded $125 million. He and his original partner, whom he forced out of the firm 20 years earlier, devised a new kind of business, subsequently mimicked by many others. Their innovation was the first modern "earmarked appropriations" -- federal funds directed by Congress to both public and private institutions when no federal agency had proposed spending the money. Over the subsequent three decades, the government dispensed billions of dollars in "earmarks," and lobbying for such appropriations became a booming Washington industry.

Cassidy may be the richest Washington lobbyist, but he is far from the best-known. Since a scandal erupted that bears his name, that title belongs to Jack Abramoff, the confessed felon, bribe-payer and tax evader who is now an inmate in the federal prison camp in Cumberland, Md. He is still cooperating in a widening federal probe of corruption on Capitol Hill.

Abramoff's brazen behavior fit a stereotypical caricature of the Washington lobbyist as a willful rogue eager to corrupt members of Congress. The Abramoff story is a crude pulp thriller punctuated by free dinners, lavish golfing outings, big campaign contributions, arm-twisting and old-fashioned bribery.

Cassidy's is a subtler epic that probably reveals more about the culture of Washington, D.C. It, too, involves favors, gifts and contributions, but they are supplemented by the disciplined application of intellect, hard work, salesmanship and connections. In Cassidy's story, all these can influence the decisions of government to the benefit of private parties -- Cassidy's clients.

On a personal level, Cassidy's saga is a variation on the classic American myth: A determined man from nowhere accumulates great wealth and rises to the top. At different moments it evokes Charles Foster Kane, Jay Gatsby or a character from a Horatio Alger tale. Like them, Cassidy is a self-made man who fulfilled many of his most ambitious dreams. But material success has not pacified all of his personal demons. He is tough, temperamental, driven and, according to many around him, rather lonely.

Over the next five weeks, The Washington Post will tell Gerald Cassidy's story in a unique way. On Monday, the series will jump to the newspaper's Web site, washingtonpost.com, to begin a 25-chapter serial narrative that will describe how Cassidy built his business, how he made the deals that earned his millions, and how he and his fellow lobbyists influenced decisions of government and helped create the money-centric culture of modern Washington.A Gatsbyesque Affair

Charlie Palmer Steak, the gleaming Washington outpost of a famous Las Vegas restaurant, had catered Cassidy's party. Restaurant staff circulated with platters of miniature hamburgers and tartlets of goat cheese and mushrooms. The restaurant occupies much of the ground floor of the building at 101 Constitution Ave., where the rooftop party was held. One of the restaurant's owners is the same Gerald Cassidy, a man of many investments.

He had turned 65 a month before the party, and he looked spiffing. His full beard of uniformly short whiskers was trimmed to a triangle of white. His fullback's frame was perfectly draped in a dark gray, double-breasted and pin-striped suit made by Alan Flusser in New York, Cassidy's home town. Flusser's custom suits start at $3,800. A white shirt with French cuffs and a silk tie in a pattern of black and white checks completed the ensemble. The checked tie set against the suit's prominent pin stripes evoked a Las Vegas defense attorney.

The outfit advertised the distance Cassidy had come from his difficult childhood in a troubled Irish American family. None of its other members, denizens of Brooklyn and Queens, wore custom-made suits; none had even graduated from college before Cassidy did in 1963. Cassidy's memories of his youth are short on nostalgia, long on deprivation. "I remember evictions, repossessions, things you never forget." Jack Cassidy, his stepfather, was a pugnacious Navy veteran and former boxer who sometimes threw a punch at his son.

At his big party Cassidy's shyness was displaced by pride; he was virtually preening. He presided with a certain dignified formality, greeting guests with a warm smile but never slipping out of character. Like Gatsby, F. Scott Fitzgerald's self-invented tycoon, Cassidy seemed to enjoy the idea of the party at least as much as the party itself.

Gatsby sought riches to reclaim a lost love who had rejected him when he was young and poor; Cassidy, too, sought riches as armor against poverty and rejection. Both were dreamers who would be forced by circumstances to become realists.

For Cassidy, the urge to accumulate money drove him to succeed. "I'm a big fan of financial security," he said in one of numerous extended interviews. "I didn't have a lot of it as a kid, so I wanted to be successful and financially secure." He never pretended not to be interested in money nor tried to deny who he was or how he made his cash. He proudly, though quietly, made large donations to numerous charities.

DOJ_NMG_0140026

His candor about his business and his pursuit of wealth set him apart from the most successful lobbyists of earlier generations, who often were reticent about their trade. Washington powerbroker Clark Clifford was a good example; he never registered as a lobbyist and would deny heatedly that he was one, even as he helped his law firm's corporate clients solve problems in Washington for handsome fees. Clifford wanted to be known as an elder statesman.

Cassidy made no bones about his work. He liked to talk about his ability to get things done: winning hundreds of millions in federal dollars for his university clients, getting Ocean Spray Cranberry juice into school lunches, helping General Dynamics save the billion-dollar Seawolf submarine, smoothing the way for the president of Taiwan to make a speech at Cornell despite a U.S. ban on such visits.

Cassidy's career has spanned an astounding boom in the lobbying business. When Cassidy became a lobbyist in 1975, the total revenue of Washington lobbyists was less than $100 million a year. In 2006 the fees paid to registered lobbyists surpassed $2.5 billion; the Cassidy firm's 51 lobbyists earned about $29 million. In 1975 the rare hiring of a former member of Congress as a lobbyist made eyebrows rise. Today 200 former members of the House and Senate are registered lobbyists. Two of them, tall, gregarious men named Marty Russo and Jack Quinn, work for Cassidy, and at the 30th birthday party they worked the crowd with relish.

The business involves giving as well as receiving. As lobbying became more and more lucrative, Cassidy realized that members of Congress who helped his clients could be thanked with campaign contributions. "You can't be in this business and not give," he once explained.

He encouraged his colleagues to give, and he gave prolifically himself. In the quarter century leading up to his party, Cassidy, his employees and their spouses had personally given at least $5.3 million to candidates for the House and Senate and to the two major parties. Cassidy and his wife, Loretta, donated more than a million of that themselves. The lobbyists of Cassidy & Associates had received many times that much in fees from their clients -- almost always in the form of monthly retainers. The clients had received hundreds of millions in earmarked appropriations and other benefits worth hundreds of millions more.

Cassidy's appetite for lobbying revenue could lead him into trouble. It was the cause of one of the few public mistakes of his career: his 2004 offer to the soon-to-be notorious Abramoff to join Cassidy & Associates as a consultant just after the law firm of Greenberg Traurig had fired him. Abramoff accepted the offer, but then Cassidy had to withdraw it. Abramoff was not invited to the 30th birthday party.Starting with McGovern

The party crowd looked like a typical A-List Washington gathering, sprinkled with past and present senators, House members and Washington hangers-on of many varieties. But there was a story up on the roof that evening that wasn't obvious to most of the guests -- the story of Gerry Cassidy's remarkable career.

The crowd included figures from every stage of Cassidy's life in Washington, beginning with George McGovern.

The long-retired Senator and 1972 Democratic presidential nominee had flown in from South Dakota to toast Cassidy, whom he had first met 36 years earlier in Immokalee, Fla., when McGovern chaired the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs.

In 1969, Cassidy, then a young legal aid lawyer for migrant workers, helped McGovern's staff organize hearings in Immokalee on hunger among those workers. Cassidy then escorted the senator around one of the most impoverished areas in the United States. The hearings drew extensive television and newspaper coverage, one of McGovern's first moments in a national spotlight. Just two months later, Cassidy made his way to Washington and knocked on the nutrition committee's door. Could he have a job? In April 1969, Gerry Cassidy arrived in the nation's capital to join the staff of McGovern's committee. He has been here ever since.

When Cassidy moved up from Florida, he and Loretta rented a small apartment in Arlington. Today, they own grand houses in McLean and on the Eastern Shore and a condo on Key West.

Cassidy and McGovern have maintained friendly if not close relations over the years -- a typical pattern for Cassidy, who has many acquaintances but few real friends. McGovern expresses personal amazement at Cassidy's financial success, and also gratitude for it. The lobbyist has contributed $100,000 to the George and Eleanor McGovern Library, which was dedicated in October at Dakota Wesleyan University in Mitchell, S.D.

Both men say they have forgotten that McGovern fired Cassidy from the nutrition committee in early 1975 to make room on the staff for Bob Shrum, at the time a young political operative who McGovern hoped could help him run for president again in 1976. Shrum went on to advise eight losing Democratic presidential candidates.

McGovern's order to fire Cassidy, in a letter to Kenneth S. Schlossberg, staff director of the nutrition committee, can be found in McGovern's papers at Princeton University. Schlossberg interpreted that letter as a cue that it was also time for him to find a new job. He proposed to Cassidy that they start a consulting business, he recalled in an interview. They became 50-50 partners in a firm called Schlossberg-Cassidy & Associates, though they had no associates.

DOJ_NMG_0140027

When they first set up shop in a tiny, one-room office, Schlossberg and Cassidy sent letters to everyone they knew offering to provide whatever assistance might be needed in Washington. One of the first to respond was Jean Mayer, a renowned nutritionist, who had just become president of Tufts University in Medford, Mass., outside Boston. Mayer summoned Schlossberg to Tufts to talk about his dream of building a human nutrition research center. He recounted how House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill had once told him about the childhood days when he and his brother sneaked onto Tufts' playing fields to play ball. "If I can do anything to help you, let me know," O'Neill had said.

Mayer hired Schlossberg-Cassidy to figure out how O'Neill might help him. And they did. After two years of work by the young lobbyists, Congress appropriated $27 million for the human nutrition center. Over the course of the next three decades, that $27 million would be followed by hundreds of millions more in directed, earmarked appropriations to Cassidy clients -- colleges, universities, hospitals, corporations and state and local governments.The Absent Alumni

Many of Cassidy's Democratic friends were in attendance at the rooftop party. Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), for example, came prancing across the canvas "carpet" that had been laid on the roof to greet his host: "My Cassidy!" he proclaimed with a mischievous Irish grin, "I'm a fan of yours!"

Cassidy has long had good relations with members of the Massachusetts delegation, going back to his friend O'Neill, the speaker from 1977 to 1987, boom years for Cassidy's firm. Many of the early clients were Massachusetts institutions. By the end of that period, Cassidy was paying himself as much as $5 million a year, several times more than the earnings of even Washington's fanciest lawyers.

One of the loudest guests at the party was Russo, the former Congressman from the suburbs of Chicago who was defeated in 1992 and joined Cassidy the next year. At the party, Russo greeted his pals from the House with a booming voice, and had hugs and pats on the back for many -- a Chicago pol of the old school. On his Cassidy & Associates calling card, Russo has put an embossed, golden Seal of the United States and identifies himself as "Marty Russo, Member of Congress, Retired."

The guest list for the party was long, but so was the list of people who had played a prominent part in building the Cassidy firm but had not been invited. Many of the professional and personal relationships Cassidy developed over three decades had not survived. His mercurial personality and sometimes violent temper put an end to some of them; his ways of doing business ended others. Some left him for greener pastures.

Members of a large Cassidy alumni association could be found in lobby shops and public relations firms all around town. When someone left the firm, Cassidy tended to take it badly. He got into a prolonged legal action with one former employee and forced him into a settlement, a story that quickly made the rounds and had the desired effect. Only a fraction of the former employees was invited to the party on the roof, though the event had been the talk of the alumni for weeks.

The uninvited included some of the most important people in the history of the firm -- first of all James P. Fabiani. Fabiani was the third person to join the firm, after Schlossberg and Cassidy. He designed many of its procedures; he became its most successful marketer, luring in dozens of clients. But he and Cassidy fell out after 15 years of working together. Fabiani thought the firm had changed: "It went from . . . hard-charging, driven, we're-going-to-succeed-for-our-clients to a company preoccupied with money."

Schlossberg was absent, too, an ironic status for the actual founder of the firm -- despite many references in the firm's literature and on its Web site to Cassidy as its founder. The two men's gradual estrangement had culminated in 1984, when they agreed on a settlement that dissolved their partnership. Schlossberg left with $812,600 as his share of the enterprise. Today he runs a family business, the Schlossberg Memorial Chapel, providing funeral services to the Jewish community on Boston's South Shore. He and Cassidy haven't spoken in 22 years.

The two had an achingly complicated relationship. "He only agreed to the deal we finally settled on," Schlossberg said recently of Cassidy, "because he knew that if we actually ended up in court I would make sure the whole city knew every last detail about our business and no clients would be left after that." The money Schlossberg received proved to be a piddling amount. Eventually, in a series of complicated financial transactions from 1989 to 1999, Cassidy sold his interest in the firm for a total of $30 million, while staying in place to run the business for a handsome salary.Ten-Percenters

One of the alumni who did make it to the rooftop terrace was William F. Cloherty, a feisty little fireplug of a man who came up with an idea that helped Cassidy soar. Cloherty had been working in the Tufts administration when Cassidy and Schlossberg won that first earmark for Jean Mayer. He quickly grasped that what Schlossberg-Cassidy had accomplished for Tufts could become the basis of a real business.

Through a connection with John Silber, the resourceful president of Boston University, Cloherty got to know Cassidy. Intense, bright, disheveled and hopelessly disorganized, Cloherty quickly bonded with Cassidy, a fellow hustling Irishman.

DOJ_NMG_0140028

Cloherty proposed to work for Cassidy on a commission basis. He would receive ten percent of whatever fees the clients he brought in paid to the firm. By 1985 Cloherty had signed up 10 clients, eight of them universities. Over the years Cloherty collected hundreds of thousands of dollars in commissions without doing any lobbying himself. Cloherty's success prompted Cassidy and Fabiani to build a large stable of "ten-percenters," who became critical to the firm's early growth.

At the party, Cloherty spent a long time chatting with Silber, who had flown to Washington for the occasion. Prior to joining Cassidy, Cloherty had worked for Silber as BU's government liaison. Over a quarter century, BU has paid Cassidy millions of dollars in lobbying fees, and the school has received $106.5 million in earmarks from the federal government.

Cloherty's success reflected the firm's. For years in the 1980s, Cassidy and his colleagues could truthfully tell prospective clients that they never failed to win an earmark for an institution that had retained them. "Sometimes it took longer than we expected," admitted Elliott Fiedler, who worked at the firm from 1987 to 1995, "and sometimes the client had to settle for a good deal less than it hoped for. But for years every client eventually got something."

From its inception the firm also represented businesses. One of Cassidy's earliest corporate clients was the Ocean Spray Cranberry cooperative, a national organization of cranberry and grapefruit growers. Ocean Spray got him into the political contributions business; he set up a political action committee for the group and decided which members of Congress would receive its largesse. That only increased Cassidy's influence.

His firm has also organized hundreds of fundraisers for members of Congress, many of them breakfasts in the firm's conference room. Cassidy believes in giving money to his friends for their election campaigns. The system doesn't bother him in the least.

"Lobbyists have always been contributors; they always will be," he said in an interview. "It's like if you lived in a rural community and you wanted to be part of that community, and they had a volunteer fire department. If you didn't participate, you wouldn't be very well accepted in the community. It's as simple as that."Selling the Firm Again and Again

In the decade that began in 1989, Cassidy & Associates was transformed. Cassidy was able to fulfill his dream of becoming not just prosperous and successful, but rich. In two stages, he sold a portion of the firm to an Employee Stock Ownership Plan, an unusual financial transaction that put $15 million in his pocket.

He used some of the money to greatly expand his business. He created Powell-Tate, a public relations firm named for its key partners, Jody Powell, President Jimmy Carter's press secretary, and Sheila Tate, press secretary to first lady Nancy Reagan. Cassidy also acquired a Republican lobbying firm, a polling firm and a grass-roots lobbying firm.

The Republican victory in 1994, taking control of Congress from the Democrats whom Cassidy had spent more than 20 years befriending, cost the firm about $6 million in revenue, or roughly 20 percent of what it had been making. Cassidy cut his own salary way back; for a couple of years he earned no bonus. But he survived, and business slowly picked up again.

In 1999, Cassidy sold the firm to InterPublic Group (IPG), a British advertising and public relations conglomerate, in a stock transaction that netted about $60 million. Cassidy's share would total just over $15 million. His timing was impeccable; he used a financial device called a collar to sell the IPG shares he received in the deal at what turned out to be a historic high. Within months, the IPG shares lost half their value. Most of Cassidy's associates held on to their shares and suffered heavy losses.

For an entrepreneur who had created a business and shaped it in his own image, becoming the property of an international conglomerate was not easy. At first Cassidy's relationship with IPG was rocky. Some executives working for the new owner thought it might be best to ease Cassidy out of the firm and turn it over to his longtime associate, Fabiani. The gambit failed with the new owner, and Cassidy remained the boss. But the firm fell on hard times. Fabiani left, and the earmarked appropriations business was suddenly crowded with new competitors. And Congress, which loved earmarks, loved them so well that their number burgeoned, but their average size shrank radically.'A Republican Lobbying Firm'

Another guest at the 30th birthday party was Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, the Republican whip in the House. Ten years earlier, a Republican as important as Blunt probably would not have attended an event honoring a Democratic lobbyist. But times changed after the Republicans took control of Congress in 1994, forcing Cassidy to adapt to Republican tastes.

His latest adaptation had been the hiring of Gregg Hartley, an open, friendly Missourian like Blunt, who had worked as Blunt's right-hand man for nearly all his political career. In 2003, following a path trod by countless other Congressional aides, Hartley had decided to "go downtown" -- to become a lobbyist. A bidding war for his services ensued. Cassidy won it with an offer of just under $1 million a year plus a substantial percentage of the lobbying fees paid by clients Hartley could bring to the firm.

Hartley had earned $150,000 as Blunt's senior aide. Now he was the chief operating officer of Cassidy & Associates. Hartley worked the crowd at the party with a friendly, low-key style. A number of the guests represented corporate clients he had attracted to the firm.

DOJ_NMG_0140029

Blunt was a nice catch for the Cassidy party, but not in the class of the man who arrived soon afterward, surrounded by a bustling entourage. That was Tom DeLay of Texas, then still the House majority leader. His presence was probably a favor to Hartley, who had belonged to the House leadership's inner circle.

To have someone with Hartley's connections essentially running Cassidy's firm, as he has since 2005, showed how the times had changed Cassidy. "I'm running a Republican lobbying firm," Cassidy quipped sheepishly to an old friend.

* * *

One of the most influential guests at the party was a senior senator who once went after Cassidy in public -- Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.), ranking Democratic member of the Senate Appropriations Committee. In 1989, just after Byrd became that committee's chairman, he threw a theatrical temper tantrum when The Washington Post reported that the University of West Virginia had hired the Cassidy firm to help win an earmarked appropriation for an $18 million facility to study the uses of coal. When this became public knowledge, Byrd decided he was furious. He actually blocked the $18 million, which the House had already approved, and forced his home state university to fire Cassidy. In a speech on the Senate floor he denounced "lobbyists who collect exorbitant fees to create projects and have them earmarked in appropriation bills . . . for the benefit of their clients," a thinly veiled reference to Cassidy.

The episode created a political opportunity, prompting Byrd to draft the "Byrd Amendment," putting new restrictions on all lobbyists. It appeared to be a memorial to his anger at Cassidy.

So why, 16 years later, when he was 87 and frail, had Byrd come to a party to celebrate Cassidy? He responded to that question a little testily: "I'm here because I'm here. I was invited, and I decided to come."

Soon after the party another successful Washington lobbyist ventured an explanation: "That's simple. It's his cycle. He's up." Indeed he was. Republicans thought Byrd might be vulnerable, and they had targeted him in 2006. He was busily raising money to defend his seat, and Cassidy, it turned out, was doing his best to help.

Byrd's re-election committee later reported to the Federal Elections Commission that six weeks before his party, Gerald Cassidy had made a $2,000 contribution.

Then in November 2006, six months after the 30th birthday party, Cassidy & Associates' Political Action Committee made a $938 "in-kind" contribution to organize and pay the tab for a Byrd fundraiser at Finemondo, an Italian restaurant downtown. That event raised $16,645 more for Byrd, nearly all of it from employees of the Cassidy firm. One $2,000 donation was recorded in the name of Loretta Cassidy, the lobbyist's wife, whose pretty smile and high spirits lit up the party on the roof on May 17.

* * *

As the sun set and the party wound down, Cassidy took a microphone and spoke, very briefly:

"All I want to say is it's been a great time, I've enjoyed it. . . . I've had a great time over the years because of all of you. . . . I've loved being in Washington working on important issues. . . . My boss is here, Senator McGovern. He brought me to Washington 35 years ago and opened the door to a great life. Thank you."

Your Tax Dollars At Work: Buckytubes And RedOwls (WP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Last week, the Washington group Taxpayers for Common Sense released a compendium of 2,646 spending projects earmarked for lawmakers' home states and congressional districts in the 2007 defense appropriations bill. In many cases, the legislation itself provides only a vague description of the project, and omits the name of the company or community that would benefit. Taxpayers for Common Sense filled in the details by using lobbying disclosure databases, congressional news releases and Internet sites.

New measures passed by Congress this year will require detailed disclosure in future legislation of the recipient of such earmarks, as well as the identity of the member seeking them. The following is a sample from the conference report:

p. 243. $1.6 million for the "Weapons of Mass Destruction Marking Set."

Explanation: Rep. David Obey (Wis.), then-ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, obtained this for Rex Systems, Inc., of Chippewa Falls. The system is a mobile laboratory that samples air, water and soil for signs of WMD. The lobbyist is JEH Government Consulting of Chippewa Falls. An Obey news release also announced that Pliant Corp., employing 182, would receive $2.4 million to continue to develop better packaging for military rations -- known as meals ready to eat (MREs).

* * *

p. 303. $2 million for "Electronic Type-specific Buckytubes for Next Generation Defense Electronics."

Explanation: Then-House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) obtained this for Carbon Nanotechnologies Inc. and Brewer Science (both of Springfield) for work to be done on failure-resistant electronics at Missouri State University's Roy Blunt Jordan Valley Innovation Center. The Washington lobbying firm of Fabiani and Co. represents Brewer Science.

p. 98. $4.5 million for "Golden Hour Technology Containers."

Explanation: Minnesota Sens. Norm Coleman (R) and Mark Dayton (D) obtained this earmark for Minnesota Thermal Science Co. in Plymouth. The containers are temperature-controlled devices for transporting blood products. The lobbyist is mCapitol Management.

* * *

p. 243. $2.25 million for "Electroconversion of Energetic Materials."

Explanation: Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) obtained this earmark for Nanomaterials Discovery Corp. of Cheyenne.

* * *

p. 216. $3.2 million for "Palmtop Emergency Action for Chemicals (PEAC)."

Explanation: Sen. Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) obtained this earmark for AristaTek of Laramie, which is developing the software system capable of detecting up to 10,000 chemicals. The company's lobbyist is American Business Development Group in Arlington.

* * *

p. 241. $1 million for "Defect-Free Commercially Viable Si/C Semiconductors Using Superlattice Technology."

Explanation: Rep. Michael R. McNulty (D-N.Y.) obtained this for C9 Corp. in Kingston.

* * *

p. 327. $2 million for a "Secure Advanced Electronics Fabrication Facility."

Explanation: This earmark, for a facility at the University of Albany, was obtained by Rep. Michael R. McNulty (D-N.Y.).

* * *

p. 276. $5 million for the "Thermal Management Systems for High-Density Electronics. "

Explanation: This earmark for Rocky Research Inc. of Boulder City was obtained by Nevada Sens. Harry M. Reid (D) and John Ensign (R). The company's lobbyist is Stirling Strategic Services.

* * *

p. 240: $4.5 million for the "RedOwl Acoustic Targeting Device/Photonics Center."

Explanation: Development of the sniper detecting sensor system at Boston University, represented by Cassidy & Associates, was backed by Massachusetts's senators.

Bush Shows New Willingness To Reverse Course (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

He was against it before he was for it.

The same president who mocked the idea of talking with Iran and Syria as recently as two weeks ago is now sending emissaries to a regional conference to talk with Iran and Syria.

For President Bush, last week's decision was the latest of several reversals on issues on which he once refused to budge. Since Democrats captured Congress, Bush has fired Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, authorized direct talks with North Korea, sent more troops to Iraq, agreed to discuss the contours of a Palestinian state in Middle East peace negotiations, and even proposed a tax increase for millions of Americans -- all ideas he rejected earlier.

"It's not really surprising to me that they're beginning to change," said former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, whose report in December recommended opening talks with Iran and Syria. "The realities of the situation are becoming more apparent to them. . . . Presidents begin to focus very much on their legacy, and he recognizes that insufficient progress has been made on some of these international issues."

Some of Bush's shifts are being welcomed by Democrats and some Republicans, although often with the caveat that, in their view, he has not gone far enough. "Any administration, including this one, has to face reality that changes over time," said former senator Warren B. Rudman (R-N.H.), an ally of the president's father. "They should. Circumstances change. I'd hate to see an administration that was so rigid that it didn't react to that."

But it can be a bitter pill for a politician who got to the nation's highest office by stressing his unwavering fidelity to core principles and painting his opponents -- first Al Gore, then John F. Kerry -- as flip-floppers who changed their minds depending on the political currents. Now, suddenly, it is George W. Bush -- the stubborn, resolute, "never give in" leader -- who finds himself explaining how he can reject a position one moment and embrace it the next.

All politicians flip-flop at times, of course, though few characterize it that way. Governance sometimes requires it and, if skillfully presented, it can be seen as thoughtfulness or growth in office. As Gore and Kerry showed, though, it can be a political killer if it becomes central to one's image. That's why Republican Mitt Romney is struggling to explain his changing positions on abortion and gay rights, while Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton refuses to apologize for her 2002 vote for the Iraq war despite pressure from liberal activists.

In Bush's case, he sometimes acknowledges a shift and attributes it to evolving conditions, such as his decision to increase the number of troops in Iraq after years of insisting he had sent enough to do the job. In other instances, though, the White House denies any change of position at all, offering nuanced arguments for why the latest move is consistent with past statements.

Bush's new health-care plan, for example, would raise taxes on 30 million Americans. The White House says this is not a real tax increase, because the proceeds would finance tax cuts for 100 million other Americans and the overall plan would be revenue-neutral.

Likewise, after the announcement that U.S. envoys will attend an Iraqi-sponsored conference of its neighbors, White House spokesman Tony Snow complained that the move was being portrayed as a policy switch. At a briefing, he read a list of multinational meetings attended by U.S. and Iranian diplomats in the past and chastised reporters for mischaracterizing the situation.

"You guys are getting it wrong, and I don't know how to get you to get it through your heads that it's not new," Snow said. "I mean, it's not new. What's going on here is something that has a long-seated precedence. There are multilateral forums where, if the Iranians are there, we're not going to walk out."

The same list of past meetings, though, has been cited repeatedly by critics in recent months in asking why Bush has refused to talk with Iran and Syria lately. Until last week, the president had said he would not talk with either until Tehran suspended its uranium enrichment, Damascus stopped interfering in Lebanon, and both dropped support for terrorist groups.

He made his attitude abundantly clear at a news conference last month when he mocked those calling for him to negotiate. "This is a world in which people say, 'Meet! Sit down and meet!' " Bush said in a sarcastic tone. "And my answer is: If it yields results, that's what I'm interested in." Just two weeks later, he agreed to sit down and meet in the context of a conference of Iraq's neighbors and major powers -- even though none of his previous conditions has been met.

Conservatives expressed exasperation. "I have never seen an administration with such an enormous gulf between the president's public statements and its actions," said Michael A. Ledeen, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "Presidential statements should reflect policy. They don't seem to in this administration."

Ledeen said Bush should not talk with Iran, given the charges that it is arming Iraqi militants: "They're killing our kids. They're in open warfare against us. So we're going to sit around a conference table with them to talk about the security of Iraq, which they have no interest in?"

Other Bush allies say that the president flip-flopped on North Korea's nuclear program. Whereas he used to reject one-on-one talks with Pyongyang, insisting that negotiations take place in a six-nation forum, he reversed himself and authorized direct talks in Berlin in January, which ultimately led to a breakthrough agreement.

John R. Bolton, Bush's former ambassador to the United Nations, said the Berlin meeting "was clearly a shift" that yielded a deal rewarding North Korea for bad behavior.

Bolton was further disturbed by reports last week about administration officials backing off assertions about North Korea's uranium enrichment. "There's a risk that the administration looks weak through the media spin," Bolton said, "and if the president doesn't like the media spin, he should correct it immediately."

Bush has strategically changed positions in the past when it suited him, perhaps most notably when he embraced the creation of a Department of Homeland Security after initially opposing it. But he has cultivated an image of a leader who rarely veers from course -- to the point of irritating many who wish he would, particularly on Iraq.

That could immunize him now to an extent from charges of flip-flopping. "It actually may be greeted warmly, and you may see his poll numbers tick up," said Scott Reed, who ran Republican Robert J. Dole's 1996 presidential campaign.

More important to Bush, Reed added, is burnishing the record before his term expires: "They're really playing for the history books now."

Chavez's Influence Hovers Over Bush Trip To Latin America (HC)

By Dudley Althaus, John Otis, Patty Reinert

Houston Chronicle, March 4, 2007

U.S. is hoping Latin American tour tempers the leftist, shores up allies' support

MEXICO CITY — Like many Americans at this time of year, President Bush is striking out for southern climes.

Packing strategies for fostering trade, fighting drug-traffickers and fending off the regionwide shift to the political left, Bush flies out Thursday to start a swing through the friendlier parts of Latin America.

DOJ_NMG_0140032

He'll talk energy and free trade in Brazil and Uruguay. Those topics — as well as crime, punishment and border jumping — will dominate the conversations in Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico.

At every turn, Bush almost certainly will work to counter Hugo Chavez, Venezuela's leftist president. Chavez ranks among the world's more vocal and influential Bush-bashers, and his aura hovers over Bush's trip like a holiday-spoiling drizzle.

"It's a very calculated effort to become more proactive in confronting Chavez and shoring up U.S. allies in the region," said Cynthia Arnson, who heads the Latin America program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, D.C.

Brazil and Uruguay are governed by moderate leftists inclined to support market economics and trade. Colombia, Guatemala and Mexico have elected conservative presidents who probably would feel among brethren at a GOP fundraiser.

Still, the trip's rhetoric likely will exceed its reach, Arnson and other analysts say.

"He's coming at a time of extreme vulnerability," said Rafael Fernandez de Castro, who teaches foreign relations at ITAM, a leading Mexico City university.

What Bush is up againstThe White House world view remains centered on the Iraq war and its consequences. The 2008 U.S. presidential campaign already has begun, sapping some of Bush's domestic influence. Latin America continues both veering left and riding a commodities boom that has loosened its dependence on the Bush administration's economic policies.

For its part, Washington is trying to portray the seven-day, five-country trip — Bush's eighth to Latin America since taking office — as a show of support for democratic governments. But the visit also is meant to deliver the message that the governments must lift up their poor and vulnerable, said the administration's top diplomat for the region, Thomas Shannon.

The foray is Bush's first extended trip to the region since a September 2005 visit to Argentina and Brazil that many analysts rate a disaster. Attending a regional summit, Bush weathered large street protests — some led by Chavez — that denounced the Iraq war and Washington-sponsored free trade.

Emphasizing his continued opposition to Bush, Chavez plans to visit Argentina at the same time Bush is touring neighboring Brazil and Uruguay. At a recent news conference in Venezuela, Chavez said Bush's swing through the region is an attempt to divide the loyalties of its leaders and public. He called for street protests at every stop.

Chavez's role in regionBankrolled by more than $50 billion a year in oil earnings, much of it from sales to U.S. consumers, Chavez has been throwing money in the region like a rich uncle.

He's bought up more than $3 billion worth of risky debt in Argentina, built roads and schools in Bolivia, promised electricity plants in Nicaragua and sold oil on the cheap to many friendly countries.

In contrast, the Bush administration often has seemed like a tight-fisted distant relative. U.S. aid to the region totals $1.7 billion this year — nearly half of that going to Colombia — and will drop to about $300 million in 2008.

Not surprisingly, Argentine President Nestor Kirchner has been cozy with Chavez, and Bolivia's Evo Morales, Ecuador's Rafael Correa and Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega appear to be ardent allies.

"Free trade and counternarcotics have always been the Bush administration's agenda, and these are things that — with a few notable exceptions — Latin America does not see as a priority," said Arnson, the Washington analyst.

"Poverty, inequality and exclusion constitute the social agenda of the hemisphere and explain the rise of so many leftist governments," she said.

Then there's the moderatesStill, Brazil's president — Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, who's universally called Lula — and Uruguay's Tabare Vazquez have proved more moderate leftists, publicly expressing their friendship with Chavez while maintaining cordial ties to the Bush administration.

Although Lula trends left, Brazil remains a functioning democracy with a stable economy that offers an alternative to Chavez-style politics.

"This is precisely the type of government the United States would like to see in South America," said Paolo Sotero, a Brazilian analyst at the Wilson Center. "Brazil is a natural ally."

In addition, Brazil and the United States are the world leaders in producing ethanol, the plant-based fuel being used as a blend with gasoline in cars. Combined, the two countries could expand and dominate the world ethanol market, Sotero said.

Closer to home, the Bush administration sees Mexico as another foil to Chavez in the region, a key trading partner and as a crucial ally in the drug war. Few were more relieved than the White House when Calderon won a controversial squeaker election over leftist rival Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador in the summer.

Both Calderon and the White House intend to push for an overhaul of immigration law this year, of which Mexico would be the prime beneficiary. And Calderon has moved in his first three months in office to strengthen cooperation with the United States in narcotics enforcement.

"The administration really wants Calderon to succeed," said Pamela Starr, a Mexico analyst with the Eurasia Group risk-analysis firm in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0140033

Dealing with ColombiaEn route to meeting Calderon in Mexico, Bush will make a short layover in Colombia, where President Alvaro Uribe has become embroiled in a scandal linking senior members of his government with right-wing militias that finance themselves in part through the cocaine trade.

But Uribe strongly supported the Iraq war and is a no-holds-barred anti-drug warrior. That ranks him among Washington's closest allies in the region.

Uribe wants a new package of nearly $750 million in mostly military aid and is pushing for a longer-term commitment of U.S. support. A U.S.-Colombia trade agreement remains pending in the Congress.

On a two-day visit to Guatemala, Bush will meet with President Oscar Berger, also a conservative, in what one analyst called payback for that country's challenge last year to Chavez's failed bid for a rotating seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Like most winter sojourns, Bush's tour may prove a pleasant respite from the pressures at home. But analysts say that like a hastily acquired suntan, the trip's impact, for both the White House and Latin America, will soon fade.

"There isn't time to do anything," Fernandez de Castro said, referring to Bush's remaining months in office. "He will be just another president who came into office promising to pay attention to the region who ended up not doing that."

Iran President Meets Saudi To Discuss Mideast Issues (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, Sunday, March 4 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran met with King Abdullah here in the Saudi capital on Saturday to address the Middle East's growing sectarian and political crises.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who arrived in Riyadh in the afternoon, was greeted at the airport by King Abdullah, a rare honor from the aging monarch, and talks began shortly afterward, the official Saudi Press Agency reported. Later, he was the guest of honor at a state dinner put on by the king and attended by top Saudi officials and dignitaries, and he held further meetings with the king.

Without elaboration, Prince Saud al-Faisal, the Saudi foreign minister, told [a news organization], "The two parties have agreed to stop any attempt aimed at spreading sectarian strife in the region."

The trip was Mr. Ahmadinejad's first official visit to the Saudi kingdom, and is widely believed to have been set up at the behest of the Iranians. It was the culmination of months of diplomatic efforts by the two regional powers, as well as other Arab countries.

The two leaders met just as diplomats from Germany and the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council talked Saturday about tougher sanctions on Iran for its continued uranium enrichment efforts in defiance of the Council. The diplomats, speaking in a conference call, ended their discussion without an agreement.

King Abdullah and Mr. Ahmadinejad were believed to be focused on finding ways to end the political standoff in Lebanon between Hezbollah, backed by Iran, and the government of Fouad Siniora, supported by the United States. Saudi Arabia and Iran have expressed alarm at the sectarian violence in Iraq, worrying that it could fuel similar tensions throughout the Middle East.

Saudi Arabia has in recent months led an aggressive diplomatic effort to counterbalance Iran's growing influence in the region, most recently playing host in Mecca to the warring Palestinian organizations, Hamas and Fattah, to resolve their differences and to arrive at a government of national unity. Saudi Arabia is also said to be working to bring Lebanese parties together to reach a peaceful settlement of the three-month crisis.

But many analysts also expected Mr. Ahmadinejad to offer a more stark message warning to Arab governments that everyone would be harmed by any possible United States attack on Iran. The United States has been expanding its naval presence in the Persian Gulf in recent weeks, with a second aircraft carrier group now in the region.

Mr. Ahmadinejad departed late Saturday night, the Saudi Press Agency reported, after about eight hours on the ground, despite initial plans for him to leave on Sunday.

Iran's Ahmadinejad Visits Saudi Amid Regional Crises (AFP)

By Lydia Georgi

AFP, March 3, 2007

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad left Saudi Arabia late Saturday after talks with King Abdullah which had been expected to focus on the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq, the crisis in Lebanon and Tehran's nuclear row with the West.

Saudi officials said Ahmadinejad departed after spending some seven hours in the kingdom, but did not give details about the talks, which lasted around two hours.

DOJ_NMG_0140034

The Saudi monarch hosted a dinner for the Iranian leader, whom he greeted earlier at an airbase in Riyadh in a red-carpet but brief ceremony which underlined the working nature of the visit.

Ahmadinejad, who previously saw the king at an Islamic summit in Mecca in December 2005, said before leaving Tehran that he would discuss how Iran and the kingdom could work together to reduce tensions in the Middle East.

"We will discuss with King Abdullah the joint work that we have to carry out in the Islamic world and the region," he told reporters.

"Iran and Saudi Arabia are two significant countries whose relations in recent years have been expanding and developing, and we are interested in expanding our stable ties," he said.

Relations between the two regional heavyweights have been strained over non-Arab Iran's growing influence in Iraq and its perceived backing of Shiite militias battling the once-ruling Sunni minority there.

The Iranian president, whose country has been accused by the United States of meddling in the region, also said Iran was ready to do all it could to reduce political tensions in Lebanon.

"If Lebanon requests the Islamic Republic of Iran to assist its national unity and independence then we are ready to help," he said.

Lebanon has severely tested ties between predominantly Shiite Iran and Sunni-dominated Saudi Arabia, a key US ally which provides substantial financial aid to Beirut and which has close links with the Western-backed government of Sunni Prime Minister Fuad Siniora.

The anti-Syrian Lebanese administration has been crippled by an opposition ministerial walkout and an open-ended protest spearheaded by the Iranian-backed Shiite movement Hezbollah, raising fears of Sunni-Shiite clashes.

Lebanon's parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri arrived in Riyadh earlier on Saturday. A source close to Hariri told AFP he would have contacts with Saudi officials on issues connected to Lebanon and the region.

Iran is also accused by the United States, Riyadh's top Western ally, of arming Shiite militants attacking US forces in Iraq -- a charge that Tehran vehemently denies.

"We should allow the Iraqis to implement their decisions and enforce security themselves," Ahmadinejad said on Saturday.

In December, King Abdullah likened the situation in the Arab world to "a powder keg waiting for a spark to explode," and Riyadh and Tehran recently began working together to reduce tensions in Lebanon.

The two oil powerhouses have sought to contain differences over Iraq, which at one point saw Saudi Arabia accusing the United States of effectively handing the country to Iran and triggered reports -- swiftly denied by Riyadh -- of possible Saudi intervention on behalf of Sunnis.

Saudi commentators saw Ahmadinejad's visit as a sign that the two countries are pooling efforts to ease regional crises at a time when Tehran is under heavy Western pressure over its nuclear ambitions and Riyadh is keen to avert a US-Iran military showdown which could destabilise the entire Gulf region.

The visit "might yield a joint initiative" to break the deadlock in Lebanon and lead to "an understanding that will ease the conflict in Iraq," analyst Anwar Eshki told AFP.

The leading daily Al-Riyadh said a "half success" of the Saudi-Iranian summit would be "better than the continuation of crises" in regional trouble spots.

"Mr President," said the Saudi Gazette, "your visit in this darkest hour yet for our region offers hope" of achieving Muslim unity.

"As we people of the desert know, it's always darkest before dawn."

Ahmadinejad's moderate predecessor, Mohammad Khatami, visited Saudi Arabia in 1999 and 2002, repairing relations which had nosedived after Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution.

Mid-East Vow To Curb Sectarianism (BBC)

BBC.com, March 4, 2007

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah have agreed to work together to fight sectarian strife in the Middle East.

The announcement followed a visit by Mr Ahmadinejad to Riyadh for rare talks.

Speaking on his return to Tehran, he said the two countries would stand together against "enemy plots" seeking to divide the Muslim world.

The summit comes at a time of sectarian division and tension between Saudis and Iran over events in Iraq and Lebanon.

Saudi Arabia, a major Sunni power in the region, and Iran, an important Shia power, have found themselves aligned with groups on opposing political sides.

DOJ_NMG_0140035

Correspondents say Saudi Arabia has led a diplomatic drive in recent months to counterbalance what it sees as Iran's growing influence in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

Closing ranks

An account of the talks was issued by the official Saudi Press Agency early on Sunday, shortly after Mr Ahmadinejad left Riyadh to return home to Tehran.

Iran and Saudi Arabia oppose the dominance of enemies over the region and their conspiracies. During this trip, we tried to devise some measures to prevent the enemies from harming the Muslim world and to foil their plots

President Ahmadinejad "The two leaders asserted that the greatest danger threatening the Muslim nation at the present time is the attempt to spread strife between Sunni and Shia Muslims and that efforts should be exerted to stop such attempts and close ranks," it said.

The agency quoted Mr Ahmadinejad as saying he supported Saudi attempts to calm the situation in Lebanon and resolve the political crisis there.

There has been a recent flurry of contacts between Saudi Arabia, which is influential with Lebanon's Sunnis, and Iran, which backs Hezbollah and is also allied to Syria.

The two leaders also reportedly stressed the importance of Palestinian unity and the need to safeguard Iraq's independence and integrity.

'Common views'

Speaking in Tehran after the talks, Mr Ahmadinejad said: "We discussed the Palestinian and Iraq issues comprehensively. We have common views in this regard."

He also said that "plots carried out by the enemies in order to divide the world of Islam were discussed" and that the Saudis had joined Iran in condemning them, the AFP news agency reports.

Mr Ahmadinejad said he supported Saudi efforts to calm Lebanon "Iran and Saudi Arabia oppose the dominance of enemies over the region and their conspiracies. During this trip, we tried to devise some measures to prevent the enemies from harming the Muslim world and to foil their plots," Mr Ahmadinejad said.

Mr Ahmadinejad's trip to Riyadh came as Iran is under growing pressure from the West over its refusal to halt its uranium enrichment programme.

The US has also claimed that the "highest levels" of Iran's government are supplying arms used by Shia militants in Iraq.

Watching anxiously

Iran is a rising power bolstered by the removal by the US of its two great enemies - the Taleban in Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq - the BBC's diplomatic correspondent Jonathan Marcus says.

Iran's Shia allies are now the dominant force in Iraq, while Tehran's influence is spreading more widely into Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

Sunni-ruled states like Jordan and Saudi Arabia are watching Iran's rise with a degree of anxiety, our correspondent adds.

It makes sense for the Saudis and the Iranians to talk as neither country has an interest in a Sunni-Shia rivalry in the region getting out of control, our correspondent says.

Indeed, the fact that this bilateral meeting has come ahead of a wider multilateral gathering on Iraq suggests that some sort of new understanding just might be in the works, he says.

North Korea Inspections Will Put U.S. To The Test Too (LAT)

By Bob Drogin

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

The return of U.N. monitors could disprove White House assertions about Pyongyang's nuclear program.

WASHINGTON — North Korea's unexpected promise last month to open its nuclear weapons arsenals and production facilities to U.N. inspectors provided a welcome foreign policy success for the White House, but may prove embarrassing as well.

At stake is whether the Bush administration overstated a purported secret North Korean program to produce highly enriched uranium for nuclear bombs in 2002. President Bush's charges that autumn about the alleged program helped derail an accord intended to freeze the weapons effort before it could produce fissile material for a bomb.

North Korea tossed out United Nations nuclear inspectors, built up a stockpile of plutonium and finally tested a small nuclear device last October, using plutonium rather than enriched uranium as fuel.

Under last month's agreement among North Korea, the U.S. and four other countries, the U.N.'s chief nuclear inspector, Mohamed ElBaradei, has scheduled a three-day visit to Pyongyang, the North Korean capital, beginning March 13 to arrange the inspectors' return. The inspectors could validate the U.S. suspicions, or could prove them unfounded.

Questions about the uranium enrichment effort emerged last week when the chief U.S. intelligence officer for North Korea, Joseph R. DeTrani, appeared to suggest during a congressional hearing that intelligence authorities had backtracked from their original classified assessments.

Afterward, senior intelligence officials argued that their assessments had not changed.

They said the evidence was clear that in mid-2002, North Korea obtained uranium-spinning centrifuges and other tools and components necessary for an illicit enrichment program. However, they said, the evidence has always appeared far less conclusive as to whether Pyongyang procured enough equipment to start industrial-scale enrichment of uranium, whether it installed and operated any of the machinery or whether it has sought additional supplies.

The intelligence officials and some others spoke on condition of anonymity when discussing internal interpretations of intelligence assessments.

John D. Negroponte, deputy secretary of State, said Friday that inspections should resolve the questions. The recent accord calls for a "full and complete" accounting of North Korea's nuclear programs, including "its uranium enrichment activities," he told reporters in Tokyo.

Negroponte, the former director of national intelligence, said the judgment of the intelligence community "is that they are very confident that North Korea had an enrichment program in the past, and they are moderately confident that this program still continues."

A U.S. intelligence official in Washington said the apparent shift in language is "not a change in what the confidence level was. It's not an effort to look back at what we thought of the program. It's an effort to look at where it is in the present."

Another U.S. intelligence official said the question of what North Korea did with its centrifuges, and how far or how quickly it progressed in uranium enrichment, "was always presented as murky and with caveats. Nothing has changed. We are absolutely not backtracking or changing the judgment."

But a U.S. diplomat with access to the intelligence said the administration was "trying to walk back some of the rhetoric."

"The problem is they've opened up a can of worms," the diplomat said. "Was this another case of faulty intelligence, like Iraq? Or is it possible they cooked the books?"

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) sought clarification from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, asking them in a letter whether any intelligence assessments on North Korea's programs had changed since 2002. "If so, when did it change, why did it change and how did it change?" he wrote.

The Senate Intelligence Committee also is "taking steps to understand the evolution" of the assessments on North Korea since 2002, an aide said.

Few doubts appeared in White House statements and public CIA reports on the enrichment program in 2002.

At a news conference in November that year, President Bush said: "We discovered that, contrary to an agreement they had with the United States, they're enriching uranium, with a desire of developing a weapon."

In an unclassified estimate for Congress that month, the CIA wrote that North Korea "is constructing a plant that could produce enough weapons-grade uranium for two or more nuclear weapons per year when fully operational — which could be as soon as mid-decade."

Robert Gallucci, who was the chief U.S. negotiator with North Korea in the mid-1990s, called the mid-decade conjecture a "worst-case scenario."

"It could also be 10 to 20 years," he said last week. "The estimates were a wild guess."

David Albright, an arms expert who heads the Institute for Science and International Security, a nonprofit group that tracks nuclear issues and opposes arms proliferation, said the U.S. assessments of North Korea's uranium enrichment effort "appear to be flawed." He compared them to prewar misjudgments on Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction.

"I think there were deliberate attempts to hype all this," Albright said. "Now that the administration has got a deal with North Korea, they're on the other side. They don't want to slit their own throats with things they said back in 2002."

N. Korea Talks May Lead To New Era (MCT)

McClatchy, March 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As North Korean and U.S. officials sit down Monday to begin mending fences after 55 years of hot war and cold peace, it will be a turning point for both countries -- and it could be the beginning of a transformation for President Bush.

Republican presidents in the past have made policy shifts that Democrats feared to take. Dwight Eisenhower ended the Korean War, and Richard Nixon opened relations with communist China.

There's also a bipartisan tradition of two-term presidents turning to diplomacy in their final years in office.

DOJ_NMG_0140037

Ronald Reagan railed against the Soviet "Evil Empire" in his first term, then cut nuclear arms deals with Mikhail Gorbachev in his second, opening the way to ending the Cold War. Bill Clinton mostly ignored foreign policy in his first term, then threw himself into Middle East peacemaking as his days in office drew to a close, although he came up short.

But one big question about Bush's opening to North Korea and steps last week that could lead to a dialogue with Iran and Syria is whether a vision of peace is the driving force or desperation over a string of diplomatic failures, last fall's elections and a failing war in Iraq.

The other big question is whether the administration is sincerely interested in negotiating normal relations with North Korea, Iran and Syria or remains interested in overthrowing them.

The talks in New York between U.S. envoy Chris Hill and North Korean Vice Minister Kim Kye Gwan will occur a week after the United States agreed to sit down at an international conference on Iraq with representatives of Iran and Syria.

Many foreign-policy observers say the decisions add up to a major turn, or at least the start of one.

"The point is, it's an important shift. But it's only a start," said Daniel Serwer of the U.S. Institute of Peace. Serwer was the executive director of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which urged Bush to launch a diplomatic initiative on Iraq that included Iran and Syria.

"You have to have sincere talks with these people," he said. "Getting results is going to be tough. Let's face it, America is much weakened by this experience" in Iraq.

Vision doesn't seem to be the prime motivator of Bush's shift on North Korea: It may have been more a shift of advisers. Confrontation with North Korea, advocated by a hard-line faction in the administration, may have helped provoke Pyongyang into developing and testing a nuclear weapon, the opposite of U.S. intent.

But now the hard-line faction, led by Vice President Dick Cheney, has been weakened by the U.S. failure in Iraq, the perjury trial of Cheney's former chief of staff and the departure of some of his allies in the administration, among them Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary and John Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. This has worked to the advantage of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was facing a grim final two years in office with little to show for it.

Her own official version is that the openings to Iran, Syria and North Korea are part of a well-planned strategy.

"What you have to understand is, this didn't happen overnight. OK? These policies have been put in place over a period of years," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "Now you are seeing the administration in a position to be able to reap some of the benefits of the diplomatic groundwork that has been laid."

There's little evidence that Bush, who usually portrays himself more as a rough and tumble politician than as a visionary, undertook the opening to Iran and Syria with a long-term aim of normalizing relations.

The talks in Iraq won't be direct negotiations, and the only real development will be that U.S. officials will sit at the same table with Iranian and Syrian officials at talks hosted by the government of Iraq.

Some suspect that Rice's announcement before a Senate committee was aimed mostly at defusing rising congressional criticism of Bush's Iraq policy.

"A lot of our discussions and the votes over the last several weeks, I think, have prompted the administration to begin a diplomatic effort, which is long overdue," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I.

The toughest critics of the president's shift are conservatives, who fear that U.S. adversaries will see the administration as severely weakened by the war in Iraq.

"Negotiating with bad guys from a position of weakness is not the right place to start," said Danielle Pletka, the vice president of the conservative American Enterprise Institute.

U.S. Urged To Reject Taiwan Missile Sale (AP)

By Joe McDonald, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 4, 2007

China pressed visiting Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte on Saturday to reject a proposed sale of missiles to Taiwan, the self-ruled island that Beijing claims as its own territory.

Negroponte was visiting Beijing on a three-nation Asian tour focused on North Korea and regional security.

In his meetings with Chinese officials, "the Chinese side expressed that it is firmly opposed to the export and sale of weapons to Taiwan and the United States maintaining official relations with Taiwan," said Qin Gang, a Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman.

An American Embassy spokeswoman said the U.S. government had no comment on the meetings.

China and Taiwan separated in 1949 but the communist Beijing government claims the island as part of its territory and has threatened repeatedly to attack. The United States is Taiwan's main arms supplier, though Beijing vehemently objects to such sales.

DOJ_NMG_0140038

Taiwan is trying to buy 218 AMRAAM medium range air-to-air missiles and another 235 Maverick missiles at an estimated cost of $421 million.

"China is improving its military power and we treat that as a threat," Rear Adm. Wu Chi-fang, a Taiwanese Defense Ministry spokesman, said Saturday.

A statement on the proposed sale issued earlier this week said it would improve Taiwan's security and promote "political stability, military balance and economic progress in the region."

Negroponte met with Chinese Foreign Ministers Yang Jiechi and Dai Bingguo after arriving Saturday from Tokyo. He was due to meet later with Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan.

The sides did not discuss Iran or North Korea but might later, Qin said.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry said earlier that the proposed missile sale would "seriously violate" previous commitments made by Washington to reduce arms sales to Taiwan and be a "rude interference into China's internal affairs."

"The Chinese side hopes that the United States can definitively keep its promise to work with the Chinese side together and fight and contain Taiwan independence in order to maintain peace and stability across the Taiwan Strait," Qin said.

Negroponte's tour of Japan, China and South Korea is his first foreign trip since being confirmed last month as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy.

A focus of the trip is relations with China, a major U.S. trading partner and key player on such diplomatic issues as North Korea, Iran and Sudan.

___

Associated Press Writer Eric Talmadge contributed to this report from Taipei, Taiwan.

China Warns Negroponte On Taiwan Arms Sales (AFP)

By Dan Martin

AFP, March 4, 2007

China warned visiting US Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte that plans to sell American missiles to Taiwan threatened to harm Sino-US ties, a Chinese spokesman said Saturday.

Negroponte arrived Saturday for a three-day visit and met with Deputy Foreign Minister Dai Bingguo for talks the US State Department had said would touch on a range of issues including Iran, Iraq, the North Korean nuclear pact and trade.

But they spent Saturday explaining their positions on touchy bilateral topics such as the perceived threat of China's military rise and US plans to sell 450 air and ground missiles to Taiwan, Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang told reporters.

The planned purchase by democratic Taiwan has upset the leaders of China's Communist Party, which views the island as a renegade province to be reunited with the motherland.

"In order to ensure the healthy development of China-US relations, China resolutely opposes US weapons sales to Taiwan," Qin quoted Dai as telling Negroponte during their two-hour meeting.

Ties had already cooled somewhat after US Vice President Dick Cheney's comments, on a trip to Australia, that China's military growth and recent test of a satellite-killer missile did not jibe with its stated peaceful aims.

Qin said Dai told Negroponte that China was not to be feared.

"China will always adhere to the path of peaceful development. In international affairs it will continue to be a constructive and cooperative participant. China's development is peaceful and poses no threat to the United States or to the world," Qin said.

Negroponte's stop in Beijing is the second leg of a trip that has already taken him to Japan and will include a stop next week in South Korea.

All three are US partners in the six-nation effort to get North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons and part of his trip is expected to focus on how to make sure Pyongyang holds up its end of the deal.

After exhaustive negotiations, the United States and North Korea signed a new six-nation agreement last month under which Pyongyang agreed to give up its nuclear weapons programmes in exchange for economic and energy aid.

Negroponte, formerly the top US spy chief and installed last month as number two to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, told the Senate during his confirmation hearings that the US should pursue a policy of engagement with China "on all levels," rather than one of confrontation.

China and the US had worked closely together on hammering out the North Korea nuclear deal.

China To Increase Its Military Budget (AP)

AP, March 4, 2007

China's military spending, a point of contention with the United States, will jump 17.8 percent this year, the spokesman for the National People's Congress said Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0140039

Jiang Enzhu told a news conference on the eve of the annual meeting of China's legislature that military spending would hit $44.94 billion in 2007 — an increase of $6.84 billion over last year, though experts believe the true figure of China's military spending could be several times the amount that it reports.

Jiang said most of the money would be spent on boosting wages and living allowances for the 2.5 million-member People's Liberation Army, and on upgrading armaments. He did not give any other details.

The announcement of the increased budget comes as China's leaders display renewed confidence in their ability to control divisive political debate, putting to a vote a toughly contested bill on property rights at this year's session of the national legislature.

The proposed property rights law and an uncontroversial corporate tax bill are the only pieces of legislation before the congress in its 12-day session which opens Monday. The two measures are all but certain to pass, legal scholars and Chinese political watchers said.

Such certainty says much about change in a political system in which the Communist Party tightly controls the reins of power but ordinary Chinese, emboldened by economic and social changes, feel increasingly free to voice opinions.

Dominated by the party, the congress is largely powerless. Still, a year ago an angry campaign by conservative communists that portrayed the property bill as a sellout of popular interests to a corrupt business elite — and that was amplified by fiery Internet postings — forced leaders to scuttle plans to put the measure before the congress.

Now, "the central leadership is quite comfortable with the debate because they can control it," said Cheng Li, a Chinese politics specialist at Washington's Brookings Institute. At the congress session, "they want to create a kind of atmosphere. They want to show there's some openness."

In power for nearly five years, ever-cautious party chief Hu Jintao, Premier Wen Jiabao and other leaders are coming into their own, putting their stamp on policies to spread the benefits of economic growth more evenly across a society with a large rich-poor gap. The initiatives, though still works in progress, have proven popular.

Heavy politicking is always the main agenda at the congress, which is comprised of nearly 3,000 members drawn mainly from provincial political notables and military commanders. This year's session is more so, with Hu and his allies seeking support for a renewed mandate at a pivotal once-in-five-years party conclave to be held later this year.

Congress deputies are to pass the government's budget, including the hefty increase in military spending, and endorse policies to keep the economy humming along at a slightly moderated pace from its double-digit growth of the past four years.

China's increased military spending has drawn comments from the United States, most recently from Vice President Dick Cheney, who on a swing through Asia last month said some of Beijing's actions were at odds with its words about its military expansion being peaceful.

In smaller groups, the deputies are also expected to discuss pressing social issues — extending health care insurance to rural Chinese, avoiding volatility in the high-flying stock markets, and excising the rampant corruption that excites public anger.

Hu and his colleagues have in the past year launched a robust anti-corruption campaign, cashiering a handful of top officials and tens of thousands of lower-level ones.

Jiang said Sunday that former Shanghai party chief Chen Liangyu, who is under arrest for a pension scandal in China's financial capital, would not be attending the legislature.

The pending property law, drafted and redrafted over eight years, could also set off passions. The lack of clear ownership rights and protections is a crucial impediment to further market reforms, complicating business mergers and leaving ordinary Chinese at risk of land seizures by local governments.

But Jiang rejected criticism the property law went against China's Constitution, saying it gave equal protection to public and private property. He said that "under a socialist market economy," state, collective and private property should be entitled to equal rights.

China's Quirky Stock Market Finally Matters (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Its Problems Become the World's

SHANGHAI -- Looking at the facts, the past year seems to have been disastrous for Worldbest Pharmaceutical. First, there were reports of accounting irregularities and exaggerated profit. Half the managers were fired. Then, in the summer, six people died and at least 80 fell ill after receiving an antibiotic injection manufactured by a subsidiary. Most recently, the company warned investors that it was likely to report its third consecutive year of losses.

None of that cooled the enthusiasm of investors on China's Shanghai Stock Exchange, who since the end of March 2006 have driven the value of Worldbest's shares up 44 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0140040

The Shanghai exchange and its smaller counterpart in Shenzhen, near the country's extreme southern border, have long been viewed skeptically by global capitalists, even those enthusiastic about the broader Chinese economy. The markets were considered too new, too small, too closed and too quirky to matter.

That attitude was put to a test last week when, for the first time, a big drop in the Chinese markets helped spark a global stock sell-off. Suddenly, it seemed, the views of Chinese investors mattered to the rest of the world.

And as the Chinese government takes steps to clean up market practices and allow more foreign investments, the rest of the world's markets are likely to continue to feel its growing pains.

Though China's is one of the fastest-growing economies in the world, it remains heavily influenced by the Communist state. The stock markets are not the main source of capital in China -- that role is played by banks, all of them controlled or heavily influenced by the Chinese government. Many analysts also see the stock markets as subject to more government manipulation than is the norm in capitalist countries.

It remains murky exactly what role the Chinese government played last week, when the Shanghai composite index fell 9 percent, either in setting off the panic by talking about new regulations or in countering it after it started by buying securities.

"There were some reports of state buying -- I don't know how reliable those are. But it's also possible people may have decided 9 percent in one day was too much and they are still bullish on stocks," said Stephen Green, senior economist at Standard Chartered Bank in Shanghai. "I don't think anyone really knows where we go from here."

The Chinese markets made up half of Tuesday's losses in Wednesday's rebound. The Shanghai composite index ended the week down about 4 percent, at 2831.53. Global markets also stabilized after Tuesday's drop and then rose modestly. But the fall left investors wondering whether China's new influence over stock markets adds fresh risks to a global financial picture already plagued by huge trade imbalances and bubbles in the prices of many assets.

China's strict capital controls -- the fact that it is hard to convert the yuan into other currencies and vice versa -- for years insulated its stock markets from outside tremors. Concerns about transparency and corruption have also kept some investors away. Although foreign institutional investors have increased the number of shares of Chinese-listed companies they own in recent years, they still hold less than 4 percent in the Shanghai and Shenzhen markets.

"When you think of the Shanghai market, it's best to think of it as another continent or even another planet," said Jonathan Anderson, UBS chief economist for Asia.

Concerned that isolation would stall its economic transformation, China has introduced a number of reforms in recent years. As a result, China's equity market is becoming increasingly integrated into the rest of the world's. Dual listings of Chinese companies have meant that rumors that start on the mainland can jump to Hong Kong. London companies with large shares in public Chinese companies mean that their bottom line could fluctuate based on what happens in the Shanghai market. Hedge funds, lightly regulated investment pools that specialize in risky investments, hold stocks in China as well as New York. That has meant that an automatic sell-off of one fund could affect more than one market.

Economic success in China and other Asian countries has given the region large foreign reserves, producing a global money glut that has driven down interest rates and driven up the price of assets from San Francisco to Sydney to Shanghai, creating worries of an asset bubble in China and elsewhere. The Chinese government has been trying to address those imbalances, but it is unclear whether that can happen in an orderly way in an economy so heavily controlled by a Communist government.

An announcement by the Chinese government that it was cracking down on illegal trading contributed to the Shanghai stock exchange's dramatic slide on Tuesday.

Established in 1990, the Shanghai market has for most of its existence has been considered one of the world's worst stock exchanges.

From 2002 until the beginning of 2006, even as the Chinese economy grew 10 percent a year, the stock market fell. And as late as mid-2006, large Chinese companies would not list their stocks on the mainland markets as a matter of course. But Chinese policymakers pushed changes to improve the credibility of the market. Instead of requiring only annual or semiannual reports, for example, companies now have to release quarterly reports.

Three years ago, Chinese officials took control of five brokerages that had engaged in illegal trading. Last year, securities regulators freed the more than 1,300 listed companies to sell their state-owned shares over time, in effect putting $270 billion in government-controlled assets into the public sphere.

Analysts think that was at least partially responsible for setting off the recent stock market boom. Another factor was the increasing number of Chinese consumers borrowing against real estate and investing in stocks. State-owned enterprises and large Chinese investment firms control 40 to 50 percent of shares, with the rest owned by individual Chinese shareholders. This differs from the United States and other more mature markets, where institutions control 80 or more percent of shares.

DOJ_NMG_0140041

As of the end of 2006, 842 companies were listed on the Shanghai Stock Exchange. Its composite index was up 130 percent from the previous year, far outperforming the Dow Jones industrial average, which was up 16 percent.

In recent months, the Shanghai and Shenzhen exchanges have had a combined market capitalization of roughly $1.4 trillion, compared with the New York Stock Exchange's $20 trillion.

There are other indicators that the government influence on the markets is starting to recede.

Ninety to 95 percent of the companies listed, such as China Telecom, Baoshan Iron & Steel and the Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, remain state-owned. But in recent months, "we're finally seeing for the first time, good, big companies listing rather than heading straight for Hong Kong," said Peter Alexander, founder and principal of Z-Ben Advisors, an investment consultancy in Shanghai.

Many challenges to achieving a fully transparent and fair stock exchange remain, however.

Part of the difficulty is that the typical structure of Chinese companies listed on the exchanges differs from those of the United States in that most have state-owned parent companies that are not listed.

"There is a degree of interconnectedness among companies and parent companies and stockbrokers and securities companies that really is pretty much without parallel. There is a possibility for insider transactions is much greater in China than most places," said Barry J. Naughton, a professor of Chinese economy at the University of California at San Diego and a contributor to the Hoover Institution's China Leadership Monitor publication.

Still, UBS's Anderson said many investors stay in the stock market knowing full well that the system and companies may have some problems.

Take the case of Worldbest Pharmaceutical. Or that of Pudong Development Bank. In June, the bank announced that it was duped by a customer who used fake identity papers to apply for 126 million yuan in loans that he used to buy 91 luxury properties that had since fallen in value. Then, in September, it discovered that 12 bank employees from its wealth-management operations had misused 73 million yuan.

Share prices fell briefly after the two announcements but quickly rebounded. Today, the stock is up more than 140 percent from when first announcement was made, closing at 21.95 yuan a share on Friday.

Shanghai-listed Sichuan Mingxing Electric Power has been informing shareholders that its biggest shareholder, Zhou Yiming, had been effectively embezzling hundreds of millions of yuan in company assets by pledging them against loans. But the company's stock has soared 81 percent from 3.66 yuan a share since January 2006, when the company warned the scandal would affect its bottom line, forcing it into the red.

On Internet bulletin boards for the three stocks, investors dissect the companies' troubles but then say they will hold or buy anyway. One reason is optimism that China is growing so fast that any stock whose value depends on Chinese consumers -- medicine, banking services, or energy -- can only go up. Then there's a sense among some investors that if things go wrong the state will bail them out.

For example, Worldbest was flagged for "special treatment" by the stock exchange in April 2006. That is usually bad news, that trading may be suspended or that the stock may be delisted. But Worldbest investors figured that it meant the state had become aware of the company's problems and was preparing to step in. They took it as a buy signal.

"It's a recognition of reality that the Chinese government has the ability to move these markets. Nobody doubts that," Naughton said. But faith that the Chinese government, despite its deep pockets, will always be around to help is misplaced, he said. "They may have the ability to make the markets go up. But they don't have the ability to make them go up forever."

Shanghai What-If: How A Shock Can Become A Shock Wave (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

COULD this be the global financial meltdown? Less than a week ago, it might have seemed preposterous to suggest that a 9 percent fall in the Shanghai stock exchange could jolt markets across the world, triggering declines in everything from European stocks to American corporate bonds.

Yet such unlikely chains of events have been known to occur. Less than 10 years ago, the devaluation of the Thai baht on July 2, 1997, triggered a wave of currency collapses across East Asia and beyond.

By December of that year, the currencies of Indonesia, Korea, Malaysia and the Philippines had depreciated by about 75 percent, on average. Then the ruble fell. The Russian government defaulted on its domestic debt. By the time the dust settled, Brazil had devalued the real, Turkey had devalued the lira and the Argentine peso had collapsed.

Economies contracted from Ecuador to Singapore. And the high-flying hedge fund Long Term Capital Management, which had borrowed heaps of money to make risky bets across the globe, was only saved from the brink through a bailout organized by the Federal Reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0140042

"These panics can be set off by any number of things and spread in many wondrous ways," said Alan Blinder, an economist at Princeton University who was vice chairman of the Federal Reserve from 1994 to 1996. "Every one of these is different."

The world, of course, is a different place than it was in the late 1990s. Developing countries are in much better shape, mostly growing fast and running trade surpluses rather than deficits. Many have repaid much of their foreign debt. And they have piled up humongous reserves.

Moreover, despite a slowdown in the United States, the global economy appears to be doing swimmingly. Growth in Europe and Japan has picked up. The International Monetary Fund expects the world economy to grow around 5 percent in 2007, about the same pace as last year.

Even so, there are some dangers lurking, notably America's enormous trade deficit. But decisions by investors last week to dump risky assets like stocks in China or Brazil and instead buy safer bets like United States Treasury bonds actually makes it easier to finance America's shortfall.

Still, the financial commotion last week underscored the extent to which financial markets everywhere are propped up by the same shaky crutch that has played a prominent role in the events leading up to crises in the past: overconfidence. "It was a bit of a wake-up call to investors about the risks out there," said Kristin J. Forbes, an economist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who was on President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers from 2003 to 2005. "Up to now investors had become too complacent about risk."

Facing paltry yields on high quality assets like United States Treasury bonds, and diminishing returns on more stocks in industrial countries, investors have delved farther afield in pursuit of higher returns.

They rushed again into developing countries — pouring more than $500 billion into "emerging markets" last year and a similar amount in 2005. At its peak on Feb. 8, the Bombay stock market index was 49 percent higher than a year earlier. The Mexican market index was up about 55 percent in the year at its peak on Feb. 21. Even after the crack on Tuesday, the Shanghai stock market index is still twice as high as it was a year ago.

Investors have also rushed to buy dicey assets closer to home, like corporate bonds with a relatively high risk of default.

Last year, even as the housing market started tottering, investors snapped up $483 billion in bonds backed by sub-prime mortgages issued to the riskiest borrowers. The year before they bought over $500 billion worth of the shaky paper.

And many large investors, from pension funds to hedge funds, have doubled up their risk-taking not only by making these bets with borrowed money, but by borrowing it in Japan, where short-term interest rates have been exceptionally low. This could expose them to abrupt losses were the dollar to fall against the yen.

The question is, how does this all unwind?

According to the benign scenario, which most economists are betting on, including Ms. Forbes and Mr. Blinder, last week's financial troubles will be short-lived — merely an instance of investors recovering their sense of risk and pulling back from some of their crazier investments, but doing no harm to the real economy.

"So far the betting is this is more a healthy correction rather than a plunge," said William Cline, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics.

Still, crises move in mysterious ways. And there are plausible paths for the financial turbulence to worsen. As Ms. Forbes acknowledged, "The crisis of the future never looks like the crisis of the past."

Let's imagine, for instance, that one unlucky hedge fund borrowed oodles of yen to invest in sub-prime mortgage-backed bonds and Turkish debt.

Let's also say that the yen continued to rise, as it did last week, as more investors caught by the financial crunch sold their losing investments to buy yen in order to repay their Japanese borrowings.

Meanwhile, mortgage-backed bonds and Turkish debt continued to fall.

This could mean trouble for the hedge fund, which would find itself owing yen that were rising in value but owning assets that were falling in value.

That might mean trouble for the banks that lent it money. And if the hedge fund were forced into a fire sale of Turkish bonds, say because it needs more collateral to back up a loan, it could be a problem for Turkey, because the sudden flood of its bonds on the market would cause their prices to drop. And if the price of its bonds fell, Turkey would have a tougher time trying to raise the cash it needs to finance its current deficit.

If Turkey were to go ...

As Mr. Cline put it, "these things are so predictable in hindsight."

The Nuclear Threat From China (WP)

By Mark Helprin

DOJ_NMG_0140043

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Before rejoicing over detente with Kim Jong Il, it might be useful to remember that although agreements were reached in the past, his countrymen later built a number of nuclear weapons and carried out a test. Also, North Korea, with a rich chemical and biological arsenal having long ago neutralized American tactical nuclear weapons on the Korean Peninsula, has embarked solely on a program of survival by extortion and will gladly forfeit a power it does not need in exchange for recognition and some essential commodities. The Asian nuclear power of which we must take account is not North Korea but China.

The forerunners of China's government were able to defeat Chiang Kai-shek, fight the United States to a draw in Korea and, merely by means of their country's looming potential, help defeat America in Vietnam. This they did in chaos, poverty and without modern arms, but with strategy bred in the bone. Since 1978, using their extraordinary and sustained economic and technical growth to build military capacity, the Chinese have deliberately modeled themselves on the Meiji (who rapidly transformed feudal Japan into an industrial state able to vanquish the Russian fleet at Tsushima).

In altering their position relative to that of the United States, the Chinese have received generous assistance from the past two American presidents, who have accomplished first a carefree diminution of our orders of battle and then the incompetent deployment of what was left, in a campaign analogous to losing a protracted struggle with Portugal. China advances and we decline because, among other things, its vision is disciplined and clear, while ours is burdened by fear, decadence and officials who understand neither Chinese grand strategy nor its nuclear component.

This has led the United States unwittingly to encourage China to move toward nuclear parity. In the next five years, as we reduce our arsenal from 10,000 strategic warheads to 1,700, China's MIRV'd silo-based missiles and imminent generations of MIRV'd mobile and sea-based ICBMs will easily allow a breakout from warhead numbers now variously estimated to range from 80 to 1,800.

Once, the vast imbalance (in 1987, 500:1) might have discouraged China from such augmentation, but no longer. Our reductions and their growth provide fewer targets for more missiles and will create the possibility and therefore the temptation, however remote, of a first strike. As we have cut the stable sea-based leg of our nuclear deterrent from 37 ballistic missile submarines to 14, China works to build its own and a fleet that can provide protected bastions at sea as well as hunt down the small number of American boats on station.

Nuclear competition between mature and newly emerging powers is neither unprecedented nor unexpected, but the rule has always been that if nuclear potential exists it must be countered. Although we may no longer subscribe to this, China does. Aware that the United States planned to use nuclear weapons had China violated the Korean armistice, China would understandably seek nuclear balance, if not preponderance.

The danger lies not solely in quantitative instabilities but in potential nuclear strategies that technical evolution has elevated above Cold War paradigms. It is one thing for a few experts to foresee these strategies but quite another to obtain from a people no longer confident of its right to self-defense the political consensus, appropriations and authority to counter them. Consider just one scenario, highlighted by the recent successful test of China's anti-satellite weapon, part of a strategy to exploit technological asymmetries.

Given China's appetites and our alliances and interests, a war is not inconceivable in Taiwan, or in Korea. To remove American nuclear escalation from the equation, China would need not parity but only a deterrent such as it has long possessed. The Chinese, however, whose nuclear thresholds are dissimilar to ours, would have other options.

They know that every facet of America's economy, military and society depends on individual and networked electronic devices. Were these to fail all at once and irreparably, the nation would seize up, perhaps for years.

Faced with victory, or with loss, they might choose to -- and who would venture to guarantee that they would not? -- detonate half a dozen high-megatonnage nuclear charges in the mesosphere, in an electro-magnetic pulse (EMP) strike perhaps not even in American airspace, cooking almost every circuit and semiconductor, rendering the American government blind, deaf and dumber than it is already and the country unable to resist the inroads that would surely follow.

Though we would undoubtedly respond in kind, China is not as technically dependent as are we. Nor, given China's sufficiency for a counterstrike, could we deter an EMP attack with the prospect of massive retaliation, especially because an EMP strike, with no immediate casualties, would seem as peaceful as snow in still air.

The trick in nuclear strategy is to maintain stability by balancing potentials and thus to discourage events from converting the hypothetical to the actual. Required in this case -- only one of many -- is the electronic hardening, redundancy and redesign of essential systems and networks; and missile defense, which would not only close the first-strike window by shielding our second-strike capacity from destruction but protect against an EMP strike directly and dissuade China in the first place by making its deterrent less certain.

Were we to proceed along these lines, we could diminish the chances that China might in the not-so-distant future be tempted to win a nuclear war without fighting a nuclear war. But given that we have ignored explicit warnings of the congressionally chartered EMP commission, what are the chances that we will act on an opinion we dare not even form? In regard to war and the sometimes counterintuitive actions for avoiding it, we are no longer either confident or clearsighted. What a pity to have come so far to find that our rivals and enemies all over the world can run rings around us because half of our politicians have lost their intelligence and the other half have lost their nerve.

DOJ_NMG_0140044

Mark Helprin, a novelist, is a senior fellow at the Claremont Institute and a distinguished visiting fellow at Hillsdale College. This article will also appear in the Claremont Review of Books.

Russian Police Beat Democracy Activists (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Dozens Detained During March in St. Petersburg

ST. PETERSBURG, March 3 -- Police clubbed protesters and dragged them into waiting buses Saturday in response to a defiant demonstration against the Kremlin in the heart of President Vladimir Putin's home town.

Several thousand people chanted "Shame!" as they marched down St. Petersburg's main avenue to protest what they said was Russia's rollback from democracy. The demonstration, called the "march of those who disagree," was a rare gathering of the country's often fractious opposition.

St. Petersburg authorities had prohibited the march, granting permission only for a rally far from the city center, but the activists defied the ban and marched down Nevsky Prospekt, St. Petersburg's main street.

Riot police beat dozens of protesters with truncheons, but several thousand broke through police cordons. They marched toward the city center and rallied for about 40 minutes until police moved in again, detaining people and dragging them into buses.

Several activists attacked a law enforcement officer. Between 20 and 30 people were detained, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported, citing police officials.

Former world chess champion Garry Kasparov, who helped organize the event, said on Echo Moskvy radio that as many as 6,000 people participated, though the crowd appeared to be about half that number.

"The authorities are destroying . . . the constitutional structure, rights and freedoms," said former prime minister Mikhail Kasyanov, who now heads an opposition movement. "Unfortunately, we are going through a very difficult time in our country, but we will continue to fight for our rights."

The activists accused Putin's government of cracking down on the opposition, stifling freedom of speech and hampering democratic institutions by abolishing direct election of provincial governors and creating an obedient parliament.

Mayor Valentina Matviyenko, a close ally of Putin's, called the protesters "guest stars from Moscow" and "youths of extremist persuasion," accusing them of stirring turmoil ahead of elections for the city legislature this month.

The campaign has been marred by allegations of intimidation and harassment after the Yabloko party, one of the country's two main liberal parties, was eliminated from the ballot for what it called groundless technical reasons.

Police And Protesters Clash In St. Petersburg (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

ST. PETERSBURG, Russia, March 3 — An unusually large and unruly protest against the government of President Vladimir V. Putin ended here Saturday in clashes with the police and the arrest of opposition leaders. Rally organizers and the police said more than 100 people were arrested after a midafternoon scuffle between marchers and riot police on the main street, Nevsky Prospekt, in the heart of the city's tourist district. St. Petersburg, Russia's second-largest city, is Mr. Putin's hometown.

The rally was held in advance of local elections scheduled for March 11. Opposition events typically draw no more than several hundred people, but several thousand gathered for the rally in Vosstaniya Square.

Two leaders of what is left of Russia's liberal opposition, Garry Kasparov, the former chess grandmaster, and Mikhail A. Kasyanov, a former prime minister, spoke to the crowd. Then the protesters, accompanied by Mr. Kasparov, marched most of the length of the street, pushing through three police cordons as sirens wailed and Interior Ministry riot police scrambled to block their path.

The rally marked one of the higher-profile actions by Mr. Kasparov since he retired from professional chess to dedicate himself to opposition politics.

"This is our first real victory," Mr. Kasparov, speaking over a bullhorn, told the crowd on the muddy street, surrounded by rows of police. "I congratulate you for overcoming your fear. We will have victory when we get our Russia back. We have 364 days before the election in 2008."

DOJ_NMG_0140045

Minutes after Mr. Kasparov spoke and left the area, the police broke up the crowd, first arresting the speaker who had taken Mr. Kasparov's place.

Mr. Kasparov had handed the bullhorn to Sergey V. Gulayev, a member of an opposition faction in the local legislature in St. Petersburg.

"The government is afraid of the slightest wind," Mr. Gulayev he told the crowd. "The government is fragile, and afraid, and will collapse with one push."

As he spoke, riot police shoved through the crowd and grabbed the bullhorn from his hands, smashing it against the wall of a building. A policeman put Mr. Gulayev, grimacing, in a headlock and dragged him into a police vehicle as members of the crowd yelled "Shame! Shame!"

A wedge of police officers swinging nightsticks then divided the crowd and pushed it toward the sidewalks. Some protesters fought back and a melee erupted, lasting about a minute.

At one point, a black plastic riot helmet torn from a police officer was flung into the air and clanged onto the muddy pavement, as news photographers and other protesters scrambled away from the swirling fight.

On Friday, Mr. Kasparov, Mr. Kasyanov and Eduard Limonov, head of the National Bolshevik party, led a meeting of the United Civil Front opposition group in St. Petersburg. Mr. Limonov, whose party is aligned with the main liberal opposition, was arrested Saturday morning before the march. He said the group was close to nominating Mr. Kasyanov as its candidate for president in the 2008 elections.

A Russian Plea For Collaboration (WP)

By Sergey Rogov

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

My generation arrived in this world when Russia and America were engaged in a Cold War confrontation. I've spent 40 years -- all my adult life -- studying the United States and Russian-American relations, and now I'm afraid that when my generation leaves this world, America and Russia will be adversaries again. The Cold War ended nearly two decades ago. When communism collapsed, the expectations were high that former enemies would become strategic partners. But it never happened. Why?

Many people in Russia blame America. Many people in America blame Russia. Unfortunately, both are right. Nice but empty declarations cannot substitute for a clear strategy. Personal chemistry between presidents cannot substitute for institutionalized cooperation and common policies. Predictably, the backlash against the unfulfilled hopes and promises is strong today in both countries.

The 1990s were a very difficult time for Russia. Some in the United States saw the beginning of a golden age of democracy, but Russians saw and felt the disintegration of a former superpower. President Boris Yeltsin brought out tanks to fire on the parliament to impose his policy of speedy privatization of industry, business and natural resources, so a few became super-rich and many were pushed into poverty. My country nearly became a failed state. But the worst-case scenario was avoided. With a lot of help from high oil prices, Russia has managed to begin an economic revival. Today the standard of living is going up, and the threat of a civil war is gone. We still face a long and difficult path to a mature democracy and a modern market economy, of course. New mistakes can still be made, but Russia is on its way to recovery.

Meanwhile the United States has enjoyed the fruits of "victory" in the Cold War. Since the collapse of the Soviet Union, Washington's strategy has been to prevent the emergence of a new peer competitor and to extend "the unipolar moment" as long as possible into the 21st century. America has failed to resist the temptation of unilateralism and preemption. A new surge of the arrogance of power brought the United States into Iraq.

The relationship with Russia no longer dominates America's foreign policy. Washington has stopped treating Moscow as an equal player. Instead, Russians have been lectured on the need for domestic reforms, and sometimes given assistance when it directly served U.S. interests. But with the exception of the Nunn-Lugar program to help the former Soviet republics dismantle nuclear weapons, there has been no substantial assistance, no Marshall Plan for Russia.

In fact, Russia has had to repay all the Soviet sovereign debt plus International Monetary Fund and World Bank credits. The flow of capital from Russia (including official transfers and the much bigger illegal and unofficial flight of capital) has exceeded by many times all Western assistance and private investment in Russia. Even today, Russia helps to finance the U.S. federal budget deficit, holding hundreds of billions of dollars in foreign currency reserves (though not as much as China).

Ironically, while some Russian oligarchs make huge investments in America, the U.S. Congress has never repealed the 35-year-old Jackson-Vanik amendment, which treats Russia as a centrally planned economy undeserving of most-favored-nation trading status. This still stings in Moscow.

DOJ_NMG_0140046

On issues of international security, Russia has been treated as a second-rate power whose complaints can be ignored. At the end of the Cold War, President George H.W. Bush proposed a new security system "from Vancouver to Vladivostok," but this idea was quickly forgotten. So was NATO's promise not to expand its military infrastructure eastward beyond West Germany.

"The winner takes all" -- so despite Russia's objections, all former Soviet clients in Eastern Europe have been admitted into NATO, including three former republics of the Soviet Union. And two more former republics -- Georgia and Ukraine -- could be next. Russia's objections were also ignored when NATO started its first war in Kosovo.

At the same time, the old arms-control regime is half-dead. The two strategic arms-limitation agreements on the books will expire in 2009 and 2012. Today there are no serious negotiations between Russia and America about any new arms-control arrangements, and the Bush administration says that there is no more need for legally binding treaties. To demonstrate its point, the administration unilaterally withdrew from the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, ignoring Russian objections.

Now the United States wants to deploy the components of missile defenses (interceptors and a radar) in Poland and the Czech Republic. Now Russians are complaining that the deployment of American missile defense systems so close to Russia could undermine Russian nuclear deterrence.

Many in Russia say that the United States violates a commitment to avoid a "substantial deployment of forces" in Eastern Europe, which America and the West made, when the Russia-NATO Founding Act was signed in 1997. The perception of violated promises and mistrust of American intentions produced calls in Moscow to deploy nuclear and conventional medium-range missiles. This could lead to new tensions.

Unfortunately, Russia and America have never fully escaped from the Cold War doctrine of "mutual assured destruction." Both pretend that they may someday confront each other with nuclear weapons. Meanwhile, the nuclear club continues to grow ominously. It now has five official and three "de facto" members. North Korea and Iran could also join, if diplomatic efforts fail. A new wave of proliferators would surely follow. What used to be primarily a bilateral Soviet-American nuclear arms race during the Cold War already looks like a multilateral competition that might make a real nuclear war more possible. And with China's recent anti-satellite test, we are threatened with a new arms race in outer space.

After Iraq, the United States will not be able to act as the world's policeman. The American public does not want to play that role. To avoid chaos, there must be a workable, multipolar international system based on multilateral rules of the game that are accepted by all major players.

America and Russia have unique responsibilities here. If they revert to confrontation, we cannot expect, say, China or France to lead efforts to create a new world order and control the proliferation of nuclear weapons. Only Americans and Russians can lead the world away from the biggest dangers. To do so effectively, they must begin serious cooperation in three areas:

First, a real effort to reinvent arms control. I'm not suggesting the restoration of old treaties. Both countries should make a commitment to take seriously each other's security concerns and avoid actions that the other side might perceive as a threat. The dispute over anti-missile equipment in Eastern Europe should be resolved through a compromise, not a confrontation.

Even more important are Russian-American initiatives to invite other nuclear countries to demonstrate self-restraint and abstain from the unnecessary buildup of their nuclear arsenals. Joint brainstorming is needed to prevent the collapse of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which is at serious risk.

Second, Russia and the United States must cooperate on bilateral and multilateral efforts to manage regional conflicts. The success of the six-party negotiations on North Korea proves that when the United States gives priority to non-proliferation instead of a regime change, solutions are possible. The same approach should be applied to Iran.

Multilateral efforts must be expanded to prevent the Taliban from restoring its grip on Afghanistan. Russia, China and India can help NATO politically and economically, and even militarily, if Russia can overcome its "Afghanistan syndrome."

If the United States agrees that the way out of the Iraq quagmire requires multilateral arrangements, Russia also can help. And it can share responsibility for implementing the "road map" to an Israeli-Palestinian peace settlement.

Third are the problems of democracy and values. Russia and the United States face serious problems related to terrorist threats. It is premature to claim that either has found the best ways to expand human rights and democratic freedoms. America hardly occupies the high moral ground that would enable it to lecture others. Neither does Russia, which is debating a vague concept of "sovereign democracy," trying to understand how to apply universal standards of human rights and democratic procedures.

It would be a great blunder to revive the spirit of the ideological crusade that gave us the Cold War. Propagandistic campaigns should belong to history. While there are heated debates on these issues in each country, we need a Russian-American dialogue instead of mutual accusations.

Russia is back as an international player. While it is not a superpower (except in the number of its nuclear weapons) and is still amid a difficult internal transformation, no one should be surprised that Russia wants to protect its national interests. Russia should be treated as a responsible player, sharing the rights and the duties of membership in the community of democratic market economies in a globalized world. That was President Vladimir Putin's message in the speech he gave last month in Munich. And Russia, if necessary, should be criticized for her mistakes, as should America, or China, or other members of the international community. But the goal should be a new cooperation, not a new Cold War.

DOJ_NMG_0140047

Sergey Rogov is the director of the Institute of USA and Canada Studies of the Russian Academy of Sciences in Moscow.

American Troops In Kosovo May Lose Their Combat Status (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

Top Defense Department officials are considering a proposal to downgrade the combat status of U.S. forces who are part of the NATO peacekeeping mission in Kosovo, a decision that could cause the 1,500 U.S. soldiers currently deployed there to lose hundreds or even thousands of dollars each month in tax benefits and combat pay.

Such a decision, expected within the next month, would indicate that Pentagon officials do not believe Kosovo is still a combat zone, despite rising tensions in the Balkans over Kosovo's ongoing bid for independence and frequent U.S. missions that involve dangerous interdictions of smuggling rings, raids on armed extremist groups and encounters with improvised bombs.

It would also mean that hundreds of National Guardsmen and Reservists -- many from Virginia and Massachusetts who are on lengthy deployments away from their families and careers -- would lose a coveted tax exclusion that allows them to earn their pay tax-free while tacking on hundreds more in combat pay. They would also lose government-funded flights back to the United States when they take leave.

The issue puts a spotlight on soldiers who are part of a U.S. mission that began in 1999 but now receives little attention amid the worsening wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. In recent interviews, soldiers and officers with the Virginia Army National Guard there said they put their lives on the line every day as part of the Kosovo Force, or KFOR -- and believe they deserve the benefits of combat pay.

"I stand to lose a decent chunk of money, and it's hard to believe that if that came through we'd get paid the same amount as someone who gets to go home to their wife and kids every day, gets to have a beer with dinner, and we're away for a year and a half," said Cpl. Will Larsen, 22, of Fairfax.

Larsen, an assistant infantry squad leader, put his senior year at Virginia Tech on hold to deploy. "It's a very important time here, and it's a big deal. The extremist ends on both sides are angry. . . . There are a lot of people back home who don't even know we're here. I just don't want them to forget about us."

Defense officials said all areas designated as combat zones are under a periodic review and that early policy recommendations from the Pentagon are that all areas in the Balkans -- designated as a combat zone under presidential order since March 24, 1999 -- be downgraded because of improved security there. Top military officers in Europe have officially disagreed, but they have been told the change could come as early as April 1.

"Combat Zone Tax Exclusion and Imminent Danger Pay are both under review for all designated areas," Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman, said in an e-mail. "The Department will not comment beyond that until the reviews are complete."

John W. Warner (R-Va.), a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, on Friday sent a letter to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates urging him not to change the status of the more than 500 soldiers from Virginia who are deployed in Kosovo. Warner wrote that he thinks the soldiers "are performing dangerous missions on a daily basis."

"I respectfully request that you carefully consider the ramifications of any proposals that would adjust the combat zone designation for KFOR," Warner wrote, according to a copy of the letter provided to The Washington Post. "I am sure you agree that our soldiers and their families must receive appropriate compensation for their service."

The soldiers in Kosovo understand their work is not as dangerous as that of U.S. troops in Iraq, but they operate in a region where the government is shaky and where criminal enterprises use violence as a means of intimidation. Strife between Albanians and Serbs in Kosovo has calmed, but military commanders are concerned about the possibility for increased tension as a plan for Kosovo's statehood and separation from Serbia is scheduled to go before the U.N. Security Council next weekend.

[Yesterday, several thousand ethnic Albanians marched through Pristina, Kosovo's capital, and protested the proposed plan, saying it falls short of full independence, the Associated Press reported. No incidents were reported during the march, but last month a similar protest sparked a clash in which two demonstrators were killed by U.N. police.]

Brig. Gen. Douglas Earhart, commander of the 29th Infantry Division and leader of the Kosovo Multinational Task Force East, said that since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States, the Kosovo mission has gone from a major military operation to one out of the limelight. But Earhart sees his region as vulnerable to radical Islamists because of high unemployment and porous borders, combined with reports of armed extremist ethic groups forming camps in rural outposts.

DOJ_NMG_0140048

"This mission is absolutely critical now," Earhart said. "We stopped ethnic cleansing effectively. We started a peace-enforcement mission. We're doing now what we'd like to be doing in Iraq and Afghanistan."

His soldiers do daily patrols in local communities, seeking to get out in front of potential violence and to help foster tolerance between ethnic groups. Some soldiers have adopted a local school, organized ski trips for Serbian and Albanian youth, and helped fix crumbling infrastructure. They also conduct armed raids on smuggling hideouts and go after masked men who attack drivers at night.

Sgt. James Gerlinger, 22, of Lynchburg, Va., frequently works with children in Kosovo to help them set aside ethnic differences. Previously deployed for a year to the U.S. military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, he was told he was going into a combat zone for his deployment to Kosovo and is relying on the combat pay.

"We don't do this job for the money, and it's always mission first," Gerlinger said, adding that he is concerned about morale in his unit if the combat-tax exclusion is revoked. "I think a lot of times, any other mission than Iraq and Afghanistan is long forgotten. While it may not be as dangerous, the sacrifice here is still the same."

The Enlisted Association of the National Guard has contacted members of Congress because it is concerned that soldiers deployed to Kosovo could suffer financial hardship if they were to lose significant amounts of pay. "The families are counting on this every month to pay their bills," said Frank Yoakum, the group's legislative director. "And it's a morale killer. It says that what they were doing was important yesterday, but today not so much."

Should a status change occur, Staff Sgt. Stanley Britton, 34, of South Boston, Va., would probably lose about $1,000 of his monthly salary -- money he uses to support his wife and two daughters while he is away from his job as a sheriff's deputy in Halifax County. After a 2005 tour in Iraq, he said he enjoys helping the people in Kosovo because they trust U.S. forces and come to them for help. "It's an honor and a great opportunity to be a part of a team and to help people who are in dire need of assistance," Britton said. "And yes, I do think it's a combat zone here."

Again, Kosovar Albanians Demonstrate Against U.N. (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

PRISTINA, Kosovo, March 3 — For the second time in less than a month, thousands of ethnic Albanians took to the streets of this city on Saturday to protest a United Nations proposal for Kosovo's future — a plan that they say falls far short of their desire for an independent state.

Amid shouts of "U.N. out," the crowd, mainly young men, filed peacefully through the city, led by an advocacy group that seems to be emerging as the focal point for ethnic Albanian frustrations in this province, which is still officially part of Serbia.

The group, Vetevendosje, whose name means self-determination, has been gathering growing numbers during the continuing uncertainty over the future of the region.

According to a proposal announced in January by Martti Ahtisaari, the United Nations chief negotiator for the region, Kosovo would gain de facto nationhood — an army, a constitution and a flag — but still be overseen by the international community to provide protection for the province's ethnic Serbs, who are the minority. Officials in Mr. Ahtisaari's office said he would present his proposal to the United Nations Security Council this month for a vote, but the vote has not been scheduled.

The leaders of the protests on Saturday complain that Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal is merely a ruse to sustain foreign domination and give unacceptable rights to the province's Serbs.

"We are hostages of Serbia," said Glauk Konsjufca, one of Vetevendosje's leaders, addressing supporters gathered around a truck decked with loudspeakers. "We are hostages of just 5 percent of the population."

Local analysts say that Vetevendosje, while not a political party, has given voice to many ethnic Albanians tired of international supervision.

"I am fed up with the way the international community is treating us," said Perparim Rama, a 31-year-old architect who took part in the demonstration. "Initially the United Nations did a great job, but the whole process has been prolonged."

"U.N. employees sit on a different level," Mr. Rama said. "You see that in salary differences. They basically are not in touch with the population. Here, the economy is going down, and United Nations employees are traveling to Greece every weekend for breaks."

Kosovo, although still formally part of Serbia, has been administered by the United Nations since 1999. Serbian security forces, accused of committing widespread atrocities during a conflict with ethnic Albanian guerrillas, were forced to leave the region in June 1999 after a 78-day bombing campaign led by NATO.

Most of Kosovo's ethnic Albanian politicians say they support the United Nations' plan. However, the continued uncertainty surrounding the settlement — Russia has suggested it might not support the proposal once it reaches the United Nations Security Council — has caused growing tensions in Kosovo. Russia is an ally to Serbia, which wants to retain Kosovo.

DOJ_NMG_0140049

Last month, United Nations police officers using rubber bullets killed two protesters at an ethnic Albanian demonstration.

Some feared that Saturday's demonstration could turn violent, but protesters and heavily armed ethnic Albanian riot police officers kept their distance from each other.

Traffickers Re-route Drugs Through Central America (LAT)

By Hector Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Central America has become a crucial way station in the billion-dollar cocaine business, with traffickers shipping hundreds of tons northward from Colombia along the isthmus and increasingly infiltrating police and government agencies, U.S. and regional sources say.

The recent killings of three Salvadoran legislators in Guatemala underscored the shift, intelligence sources say. The lawmakers were shot and their bodies set ablaze last month, allegedly by a group of Guatemalan policemen working on behalf of Mexican drug traffickers.

Everyone from impoverished fishermen and small-town mayors to legislators and high-ranking police officials has been swept up in the drug trade as the smuggling routes have changed. In years past, the favored route was across the Caribbean to the southeastern United States. Now, with greater Mexican cartel involvement, the cocaine often moves up the coasts of Central America and overland through Mexico.

Although it remains unclear whether the dead Salvadorans were tied to traffickers, other lawmakers from the country have been linked to the trade. And Guatemalan officials have said the killings point to widespread infiltration of the country's police force by organized crime.

The four police officers charged in the killings, including the head of the country's organized-crime unit, later were slain in their prison cells, in a stunning raid by armed men who might have entered the facility with the aid of guards and prison officials.

An intelligence official working in the region said the slain police officers worked for a Mexican cartel that ships drugs along the Pacific coast of Central America. The officers were enforcers dedicated to "knocking down" rival traffickers, the source said.

"This is a crime that can best be understood as part of the dynamic that sees drugs flow between Mexico and Colombia," said a second intelligence official, referring to the killing of the legislators. The officials asked not to be named, given the sensitive political nature of the crime -- one of the victims was Eduardo Jose D'Aubuisson, the son of the founder of El Salvador's ruling party.

Although drug trafficking has long been common in remote areas of the region, such as the Caribbean coast of Nicaragua, the growing power of the Mexican cartels has increased the importance of Central America as a transshipment point.

Smuggling routes across the Caribbean have fallen out of fashion thanks to U.S. interdiction efforts there, and Colombian drug producers have ceded the bulk of the transportation business to Mexicans.

About 90 percent of the estimated 780 tons of cocaine entering the United States annually passes through the hands of Mexican drug traffickers, according to U.S. studies. Mexican traffickers see Central America as a natural hub between their Colombian suppliers and the smuggling routes the Mexicans control on the U.S. border.

The "Mexico-Central America corridor is ... the predominant transit route for cocaine destined for the United States," U.S. officials wrote in the 2007 National Drug Threat Assessment.

Michael A. Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said in a recent congressional hearing that, "The corrupting power of illicit drug trafficking organizations on the governmental institutions of Central America significantly increases the difficulty of successful drug interdiction efforts."

Central America will remain the primary transit zone for U.S.-bound drugs "for the foreseeable future," Braun added.

The growing trade has reached areas of Central America where drug trafficking was rare just a few years back. Police and military forces there are often undermanned and outgunned.

Nicaragua's small navy, for example, has only enough boats to patrol its coastline 12 days each month, officials say, a fact that helps shape the traffickers' strategy. "They know what our limitations are," said Capt. Roger Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy.

On the Pacific coast, the Nicaraguan navy has no craft larger than 40-foot-long "go fast" boats with outboard motors, vessels nearly identical to those the drug traffickers use. In fact, many of the craft used by the navy are boats that were discarded by smugglers, Gonzalez Diaz said.

Operatives of Mexico's Sinaloa cartel arrived on the Pacific coast two years ago, according to officials with Nicaragua's National Police.

With their Mexican accents, the men stood out. They were eager to buy old, abandoned farms along the beach. They didn't look like farmers, but they bought several tractors. They collected boats, too, but they didn't look like fishermen.

DOJ_NMG_0140050

"The tractors were to build new airstrips and also to rehabilitate old ones," said one Nicaraguan police officer who specializes in drug intelligence.

One of the men was Samuel "Sammy" Gutierrez, a Colombian with Mexican identity documents, police said. He and two brothers from Mazatlan, Jorge and Roberto Garcia Villasenor, were air and sea "transportation specialists," police said.

The cartel operatives soon found themselves in a cat-and-mouse game with police that included a plane crash on a rural highway and the arrest of a Mexican couple at a Managua airport with nearly $300,000 in cash.

"We confiscated three tons of cocaine," said an intelligence official with Nicaragua's national police. "We hit them hard."

Nearly all of the cocaine that enters the United States is produced in Colombia, according to studies by U.S. officials. Most of the cocaine enters the U.S. through a two-stage process in which it is off-loaded and stored at least once in Mexico or Central America.

Cocaine is shipped out of Colombia by sea and air, usually in amounts of a ton or more, through what U.S. officials call "the transit zone" -- the stretch of ocean between Colombia and Mexico. Sometimes the traffickers hopscotch up the coast from Colombia to Panama, Costa Rica and other countries in the "go fast" boats. Or they might take a more circuitous route that involves a larger ship that will travel around the Galapagos Islands in the Pacific southwest of the Colombian coast and later off-load to smaller vessels.

Once in Mexico, the drug traffickers benefit from well-traveled smuggling routes protected by corrupt state and local officials as their shipments move northward overland to the U.S. border. A war among competing cartels to control those routes, known as "plazas" in Mexico, led to more than 2,000 killings last year.

The various routes through the "transit zone" pass through the beaches of Belize, seaside villages in Honduras and ports along the Pacific coast of Mexico and many other places, according to data from the U.S. Government's Joint Interagency Task Force South, based in Florida.

U.S. officials said that Central American organized-crime groups, working with the Mexican and Colombian cartels under a subcontracting system, are reaping huge profits. That money, in turn, is fueling a crime wave, especially in Guatemala and El Salvador.

In El Salvador, sources pointed to a key killing that went largely unnoticed in the local media: the 2005 shooting death of Jose "El Cranky" Cortes outside a San Salvador nightclub.

According to a Salvadoran academic who has studied the drug trade, Cortes controlled the retail drug trade in an urban region of El Salvador and was assassinated for trying to make connections with Colombian suppliers without the permission of other gang leaders.

It was the first time officials had documented contacts between high-level Salvadoran gang leaders and Colombian traffickers, the source said.

Along the impoverished Pacific coast of El Salvador and Guatemala, mayors and other low-level officials in seaside towns find that the sums of money offered by the traffickers are often too tempting to resist.

"This guy tells you that you can make $60,000 easily, very quietly," said one intelligence official who asked not to be named because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

The same networks that smuggle drugs northward are responsible for shipping several billion dollars in cash southward, usually in $20 bills, according to DEA officials. So vast is the money flow that arrests of couriers carrying $1 million in cash or more have become routine in Central America.

The astronomical sums of money involved in the drug trade have ensnared top officials in El Salvador.

Last year, William Eliu Martinez, a Salvadoran congressman, received a 29-year prison sentence from a U.S. judge after being convicted in Washington, D.C., of smuggling more than 30 tons of cocaine into the United States.

If the privileged can be drawn into the drug trade, then what hope is there that a poorly paid policeman, soldier or sailor can resist the temptation?

Capt. Gonzalez Diaz of the Nicaraguan navy asks himself that question often.

"It's a constant struggle with our personnel," he said. "We tell them, 'Anyone would be tempted if they offered you $500 or $5,000. But for that, you're disgraced. . . . And if you owe them anything, they'll come after you or your wife and kids.'"

Mexico's No. 2 Party Gets A New Leader (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez, Cecilia Sánchez

The Los Angeles Times, March 4, 2007

Beatriz Paredes aims to steer the PRI toward the left and back to glory.

DOJ_NMG_0140051

MEXICO CITY — Former governor and federal lawmaker Beatriz Paredes today assumes leadership of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which in the span of a decade sank from Mexico's greatest political force to third-place finisher in last year's presidential election.

Paredes takes over a party that still holds a majority of local and state offices, but is fractured by competing interest groups and politicians, and broad discontent among its formerly loyal base, Mexico's 50 million poor.

Paredes, 53, said in an interview that she would lead a new, more democratic PRI, the initials the party is known by. She said she wanted to steer the PRI to the left, where presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador of the Democratic Revolution Party mined votes to come within a hair of winning the July election.

"You can't judge the PRI of the past against the PRI of today," she said. "My objective is to build a PRI of the 21st century."

Her promises of consensus and unity, analysts say, are more pragmatic than ideological: Neither she nor any other Mexican leader has the power to select presidents and governors with the pointing of a finger, once the PRI's prerogative.

The party began crumbling 10 years ago, when the PRI first lost its majority in Congress' lower house. In 2000, the party lost its first presidential election in seven decades to former President Vicente Fox and the National Action Party, or PAN.

But the party still matters. Mexican President Felipe Calderon, who completes his first 100 days in office Saturday, will need cooperation from PRI lawmakers to pass legislative reforms such as creating a new national energy policy before Mexico's oil runs dry, and figuring out how to get people to pay income taxes.

Mexico's Congress is roughly split three ways among the PRI, Calderon's PAN and Lopez Obrador's left-leaning PRD. Calderon and Paredes were both lower-house party leaders during the first half of the Fox administration, and she said she expected a cooperative relationship with him now.

"We've always had a good dialogue," she said.

During Fox's six-year term, the PRI sometimes used its congressional votes to block reform proposals. Other times, Fox lacked the political will or skill to complete them. Paredes focuses on the latter. "Fox never took responsibility for his failures," she said.

The PRI's obstructionist policy in parliament is credited to Roberto Madrazo, who took over as party president in 2002 and essentially spent the next four years running for office. He lost badly in the presidential race.

Madrazo failed largely because voters found him untrustworthy. He also played hardball with rivals, alienating some party leaders who responded with tepid support for his campaign. Madrazo accused one would-be PRI candidate of corruption, a charge that evaporated days after the man dropped out of the party's presidential primary.

"We've learned that a divided PRI is an electoral loser," said Mariano Palacios Alcocer, the outgoing interim party president.

Madrazo defeated Paredes for the PRI leadership in 2002. This time, she won easily with the help of many old-line party leaders in a vote last month.

In the aftermath of PRI's 2006 presidential trouncing, she's seen by many party loyalists as a negotiator skillful enough to steer the PRI to the center-left. They hope her skills will give the party a shot at picking up seats during the 2009 midterm congressional elections and finding a polished contender for the 2012 presidential race.

A party activist since age 20, she studied sociology at Mexico's National Autonomous University. She was governor of Tlaxcala from 1987 to 1992. Paredes served four terms in the lower house and one term in the Senate.

Among the groups she'll have to win over are the party's 17 governors, the most of any party. They hold much greater authority and influence than their U.S. counterparts. She also will have to build support in the party's congressional bloc, which is divided among regional, union and ideological interests. And Mexico's poor are angry about the country's move from an economy of price-controlled staples and government-subsidized enterprises to a more freewheeling, open-market system.

"The party presidency of Beatriz Paredes is not going to be easy," said Alfonso Zarate, a political analyst. "She's going to have to maintain a fragile equilibrium among these distinct political forces, as well as those who helped her win."

Sudan President: No Handover Of Citizens (AP)

By Mohamed Osman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 4, 2007

Sudan's president said again on Saturday that his country would not hand over for trial any citizen sought by international courts for crimes against humanity.

The International Criminal Court at The Hague, Netherlands this week accused a junior Sudanese Cabinet minister and a member of the security forces of war crimes and crimes against humanity for atrocities committed in Darfur, the conflict-ridden region in western Sudan. Sudan has denied the accusations.

DOJ_NMG_0140052

"(The) Sudanese judiciary is honest and qualified to try any Sudanese" who commit crimes against humanity, President Omar al-Bashir was quoted as saying by the official SUNA news agency. "The government will not hand over any citizen for trial outside the country."

In Sudan, "anyone who makes a mistake will be held responsible for it, but we are not going to take any dictates from abroad," the agency quoted al-Bashir as saying.

The ICC prosecutor accused a minister and a member of the security forces of a combined 51 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their actions in Darfur. Sudan's government has rejected the allegations and said it would not hand over the two men for trial.

The Darfur conflict began in February 2003 when ethnic African tribesmen took up arms against what they saw as decades of neglect and discrimination by the Arab government in Khartoum. The government responded with a counterinsurgency campaign.

Arab militias known as the janjaweed committed widespread rape, looting and killing. An International Criminal Court prosecutor said the janjaweed was armed and financed by the Sudanese government, a charge Khartoum has always denied.

More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million people have been displaced in four years of Darfur fighting.

Al-Bashir focused instead on the U.S. occupation of Iraq, saying he wanted people who "committed crimes against the Iraqi people — who are being killed, displaced and their infrastructure destroyed at the hands of the alliance forces ... to be brought before courts of law and find prompt justice."

The Sudanese leader's comments come a day after U.S. envoy to Sudan Andrew Natsios arrived in Khartoum for talks with officials on the Darfur crisis and how to draw into negotiations rebel factions who did not sign a peace deal last year in Abuja, Nigeria.

SUNA described Natsios' meeting Saturday with the No. 2 in the ruling National Congress Party, Nafie Ali Nafie, as reflecting "rapprochement of viewpoints between the two sides" to speed up the political process.

Nastios is expected to visit Darfur, as well as Juba, the southern capital, during his seven-day trip.

Despair In Darfur (WT)

By Bill Frist

The Washington Times, March 4, 2007

I have just returned from a medical mission trip to Sudan's Darfur region and I've found the world's effort to stop genocide there has run into serious trouble.

In the last few months, an all-out war has begun against the 13,000 foreign aid workers in Darfur. This has dried up humanitarian assistance flows on which Darfur depends. As many as 400,000 noncombatants have already died in Darfur. These new attacks could easily bring the toll above a million. Based on what I have seen and heard on the ground, I believe it's time for the United States and the rest of the developed world to take serious action and ensure the aid flow continues.

Even before the attacks on aid workers began, Darfur faced a grim situation. Since the conflict began four years ago this month, Sudan's government in Khartoum and its allied Janjaweed militias have massacred Fur, Masalit, and Zaghawa ethnic groups in Darfur. As a senator, I played a role in highlighting the genocide.

Subsequently, the State Department, our president and most nations in the developed world roundly condemned it and sent aid. Time and again (most recently in January) the Sudanese government has promised to stop the killing and Darfur-based rebel groups have sworn to lay down their arms. This has never happened.

But the very presence of international aid operations has made a truly awful disaster a tad less terrible. In every recorded genocide from the Nazi Holocaust to Rwanda, enormous numbers died due to starvation, disease, exposure and lack of sanitation. The risks in Darfur are particularly grave: Because of Darfur's climate, even a brief disruption of water supplies alone can kill children and any who already are sick.

While overall conditions for displaced Darfurians never became comfortable, the international aid flows largely deprived the Khartoum regime of the opportunity to carry out a silent genocide. Mortality and malnutrition rates in camps for displaced people in Darfur declined steadily from the beginning of major aid operations in 2004 until the attacks on aid workers began late last year.

But now, the perpetrators of the genocide appear intent on launching a systematic campaign of violence against humanitarian aid workers. Just last month in Nyala, South Darfur, government police beat five U.N. staffers and raped one of them. Late last year, a single day saw six targeted, violent attacks on humanitarian compounds. Hundreds of aid workers had to flee and more than 130,000 Darfurians went without aid. On another day in December, 30 civilians died when fighters attacked an aid-carrying truck with rocket-propelled grenades.

DOJ_NMG_0140053

The last six months have seen more attacks on aid workers than the previous two years. At least one organization has withdrawn and more may follow. Aid workers I met said they live in fear. Rebel groups fighting the government launch some of the attacks, but all have the same consequence: increased deaths for all Darfur.

New reports pour in all the time and, in the end, attacks on aid workers will only stop when both the government and all rebel forces lay down their arms. Because it provides more than all other nations combined, the United States needs to take a leadership role ending the attacks on aid workers and getting all factions to reach a peaceful, political settlement of their differences.

To move toward such a peace agreement, the United States needs to act resolutely and make Darfur a priority. To begin with, the current African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur needs more people and resources and a crystal-clear mandate to protect civilian aid workers. The Bush administration should lead efforts to provide this force what it needs through increased in-kind and monetary aid coupled with a management review. In particular, the U.S. should help the AU add Rwandan and other African troops to the peacekeeping force.

At the same time, the United States should push for deployment of the stronger, larger United Nations peacekeeping force that the Sudanese government has resisted. Such a force would integrate with that of the AU and might include additional support troops from outside Africa. Finally, the U.S. should work with its allies to establish a controlled no-fly zone over Darfur.

Quite simply, the attacks on aid workers in Darfur have made an already terrible situation even worse. If they do not stop, an already gruesome death toll will grow even higher. The United States needs to help.

Bill Frist, a Nashville surgeon, is former U.S. Senate majority leader from Tennessee. He has traveled to Africa yearly as a medical missionary.

Stricter Law Fails To Diminish The Demand For Child Laborers In India (NYT)

By Amelia Gentleman

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

CALCUTTA, India — Seven days a week, 8-year-old Jasmina K. rises before dawn to fetch water for the household where she works as a maid. She washes, sweeps and hauls until about 11 at night, when she lies down to sleep on the floor by the bathroom door.

Her employers have little patience with her exhaustion.

"I get tired and forget things, so they hit me," she said, her eyes cast down. "They want the shoes polished. If I don't do it fast enough, they hit me with a cooking spoon. They want to go to the toilet. If I don't get the water fast enough, I get a beating."

Jasmina has been a member of India's child labor force for more than a year now. After her father died, she said, her mother sent her and her sister from their West Bengal village to work as maids here. Each month, she is paid 100 rupees, or about $2.25.

India has no outright ban on child labor and had long allowed the employment of children under 14 in all but what are deemed "hazardous" occupations. But last October a stricter law took effect; it prohibits the employment of children under 14 in hotels and restaurants, and as domestic servants.

Five months later, children's rights advocates say, the law has had little effect. Under-age children, mostly girls, are as in demand as ever to be maids and nannies.

"Because of the booming economy and the spread of the nuclear family, we've seen a rise in demand for domestic help at a time when it's becoming more expensive to employ people," said Surina Rajan of the International Labor Organization. "So families are looking for a cheaper option."

Hiring an obedient 8-year-old, fresh from India's rural heartland, is a simple matter. Impoverished villagers willingly turn their children over to middlemen who promise a better life in the cities, children's advocacy groups say.

"Placement agencies in Delhi and Mumbai are growing like mushrooms," said Manabendra Nath Ray of Save the Children U.K. "It is an extremely lucrative business. This is a slave trade. Parents are, directly or indirectly, selling their children."

The Indian government estimates that 12 million children under 14 are employed; children's advocates say the figure could be closer to 60 million. It is unclear how many of these children work as maids.

Children's rights advocates fault the government for not cracking down hard enough on the recruiters of children and not helping parents to keep their children at home. They have called for more educational and job opportunities in the struggling countryside of West Bengal and the neighboring states of Bihar and Jharkhand, the source of most of the children in domestic service. "We are disappointed," Mr. Ray said.

Officials with the Ministry of Labor and Employment said it would take time before the effects of the law were evident. Shahid Meezan, director of the ministry's child labor division, said that dealing with under-age domestic servants was harder than, say, with under-age factory workers. “You can’t just start raiding people’s private homes,” he said. “You have to tread carefully.”

DOJ_NMG_0140054

Because the government is moving so slowly to require compliance with the law, advocacy groups have tried to at least encourage employers to treat the children they have illegally hired better. One program, for instance, demands that children be given time off for education.

Save the Children has also set up several antitrafficking committees in West Bengal to disrupt the supply network through grass-roots action, including educating parents about the risks to their children and urging the police to enforce the law.

At the weekly meeting of a committee in Rajbati, a hamlet of mud huts two hours’ drive southwest of Calcutta, a dozen teachers, parents and village officials said they were fighting a three-tier system, made up of child recruiters, middlemen and placement agencies in the cities.

Charts on the walls showed how nearby villages had been stripped of children. In Sankda, with 150 families, 70 children had been sent away to work; in Ajgara, home to 300 families, 105 children had left.

The recruiters who comb the villages, they said, are usually women whose extensive personal contacts in the region help them identify vulnerable targets: families with six or more children, single mothers, recently widowed fathers, the permanently unemployed and alcoholics.

They list the advantages of sending a girl into service: the child, they promise, will send back monthly earnings, do a bit of light housework and learn city ways, which will enhance her marriage prospects.

Often the recruiters are met with gratitude, children’s advocates say. Despite reports of abuse of children by employers and the failure of agents to send back the children’s wages, parents remain susceptible to the agents’ main argument that sending the child away to work will guarantee him or her a better life than staying in the village.

Karuna Mondal, a Rajbati resident who sent her teenage daughter, Soma, to Calcutta to work in a lawyer’s house, said it had not been a difficult decision. “I thought it would be a good opportunity for her,” she said. “She had dropped out of school. What was there for her to do here?” she asked, looking around at the family home, a bare, thatched shack without running water or electricity.

In the end, her daughter returned home with the help of a local charity, because the girl said she had been badly treated.

Even if a child does not send money, the family can be better off, said Asha Iyer of Save the Children. “It’s one less mouth to feed,” she said.

The recruiter also stands to profit, earning 3,000 to 10,000 rupees, about $65 to $225, per child, as well as a percentage of the child’s wages.

“The rate varies depending on the quality of the child,” Mr. Ray, of Save the Children, said. “Is she good looking? Does she have some basic education? Can she communicate well? They are treated as commodities. The really nice-looking girls get diverted into prostitution, which means a higher fee for the agent.”

Hemlata Mondal, a homemaker who lives near Rajbati and who used to scour villages for candidates, said she got into the business when she realized how lucrative it could be.

“No one has shunned me for the work I did,” she said. “I felt I was doing something good for the families.”

She stopped work last year after the police, under pressure from the activists, threatened her with arrest.

So far, the government’s focus has been on the employers rather than the suppliers.

“This is typically a middle-class issue,” said Sudha Pillai, a senior bureaucrat in the Ministry of Labor and Employment. “It is important to reach out to the newspaper-reading middle classes to make sure that they know that this is not innocuous.”

“A lot of euphemisms are used,” she said in an interview, adding that girls were sometimes called “playmates” for babies or household helpers. “We have to repeat the message that this is a crime,” she said.

Mohammad Ashraf Ali of Right Track, a charity based in Calcutta that combats children’s domestic work, said the government was not doing enough to get that message out. He said many employers were still unaware of the law or believed that it did not apply to them.

“Most argue that they are doing something noble by helping feed and clothe poor village children,” he said. “But the maids are usually badly dressed and hungry.”

Jasmina, the 8-year-old maid, knows nothing of the legislation that has made her job illegal and sees little prospect of respite from her drudgery. Interviewed on a rare free afternoon, granted by her employers under pressure from Right Track, she said she dreamed of another life. “I’d like to be at school,” she said with a crooked smile, swinging her spindly legs. “I want to be a teacher.”

Our Brit Poodle, Off His Leash (WP)

By Malcolm Rifkind

The Washington Post, March 4, 2007

The British have been puzzled about Tony Blair for some time. Americans, particularly the one who lives in the White House, must be beginning to share the same feelings.

Recently the prime minister announced the first major reduction of British troops in Iraq. He chose to do so at precisely the same time that President Bush, his close friend, is trying to convince Congress and the American people of the wisdom of a substantial increase in the U.S. troop commitment to the same country.

Not surprisingly, this has been a gift to Democrats and other critics of the president, and has made a difficult task all the more complicated. What happened to the idea of a friend in need?

The prime minister has, characteristically, tried to minimize the damage. He pointed out that Basra, where the British are based, is quite different than Baghdad. There are no Shiite-Sunni sectarian conflicts, as the region is overwhelmingly Shiite. Al-Qaeda and other international jihadists have made little impact. The bulk of British troops will, in any event, remain at least for another year.

These claims are justified but they conceal as much as they reveal. Basra and the south of Iraq is a serious mess despite the impressive and professional work of British forces over the past three years. The writ of the Iraqi government is weak. The reason there is little sectarian conflict is that most of the Sunni minority have been driven out through ethnic cleansing. The militias in Basra are all-powerful. The two main ones may both be Shiite but they spend most of the time battling each other for power in the region. They have regularly attacked British forces to show their prowess and because of their hostility to the presence of foreign troops. Blair himself told Parliament that British troops would not be leaving Basra in the condition in which they would like.

It is the timing of Blair's announcement of the British withdrawal that is most revealing. He could have delayed it for weeks if his interest had been to help the president. But his own domestic weakness dictated this timetable. As his prime ministership draws to a less-than-illustrious end, he has had to find a way to reassure the British public that his Iraq adventure will indeed end, too. There is now a widespread belief in the United Kingdom that Iraq has been the worst disaster in British foreign policy since 1956, when Britain and France invaded Egypt with Israeli help after Gamal Abdel Nasser nationalized the Suez Canal. British voters of all parties tend to agree that the prime minister must shoulder the blame for insisting on British support for the invasion of Iraq.

But in British eyes, the problem is far wider than the merits of the Iraq war. Much of the criticism that Blair has faced has been for the apparent unconditional support he has given Bush. That is not because of any serious anti-Americanism. The British are, traditionally, among the most pro-American groups in the world. They expect their prime ministers to be close to the U.S. president, and that has rarely been controversial.

Blair is, however, accused of being different than his predecessors, from both the Labor and Conservative parties, in appearing to support the White House through hell or high water. There is considerable truth in this charge. Winston Churchill often disagreed with Franklin D. Roosevelt over Soviet Union policy. Harold Wilson declined to send British troops to Vietnam despite Lyndon B. Johnson's repeated requests. John Major and Bill Clinton had severe disagreements over Bosnia.

Even Margaret Thatcher, who was close to Ronald Reagan, did not hesitate to say so publicly when she thought that U.S. policy was unwise. This happened when the United States invaded Grenada without informing Queen Elizabeth II, who happens to be Grenada's head of state. It also occurred when the United States put pressure on Britain not to trade with the Soviets over a proposed gas pipeline in the 1980s. Thatcher, politely but firmly, told Reagan that she would decide with whom Britain would trade.

Blair, in contrast, has been viewed as so loyal to the White House that he is regularly lampooned in the media as Bush's poodle. The charge may be unfair, but it has done him severe political damage in his own Labor Party and with the public.

Sir Christopher Meyer, a former British ambassador to Washington, has said that Blair has rarely used his relationship with Bush to press for substantial changes in U.S. policy. This was not just true on Iraq. When the president unexpectedly indicated that the United States was willing to support changes in Israel's frontiers to include some of the settlements on the West Bank, Blair announced his own support for the proposal without any discussion in the House of Commons or with Britain's partners in the European Union.

Bringing some of our troops back home has been one of the few welcome statements that he has been able to make on Iraq since the invasion almost four years ago. If it appeared to be at odds with U.S. policy, that will not have done him any harm. Blair will soon be a figure of the past, as he has promised to step down as prime minister by June at the latest. His successor is almost certain to be Gordon Brown, the chancellor of the Exchequer or finance minister, who has been the second-most-powerful member of the government for the past 10 years.

Brown is well disposed to the United States, but most of his close friends have been in the Federal Reserve Bank, the Finance Department and other economic institutions. Alan Greenspan has been an admirer, as have other important Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0140056

Brown has had little involvement or interest in foreign affairs and has made little contribution to these highly charged debates over the past 10 years. That has partly been because he was content to submerge himself in financial and economic policy. However, it reflects the deal he made with Blair when the latter became leader of the Labor Party in 1994. Brown had expected to become leader, but when it became clear that Blair had far more support, Brown offered to stand down if he was recognized as the number two in the land.

The result has made him as powerful in relation to Blair as Vice President Cheney has been to Bush. He has been very quiet on Iraq, in part because foreign policy was not his brief but also because he was highly sensitive to the unpopularity of the government's policy with his Labor colleagues.

If Brown becomes prime minister, he will have no intention of clashing with Bush or of pursuing an anti-American foreign policy. But there is little doubt that he will neither wish, nor be able, to replicate the umbilical link that appears to exist been Bush and Blair.

Brown is considerably brighter than Blair but he does not begin to have Blair's political skills or his ability to win the enthusiasm or affection of those who are not his natural allies. He has little charm, can be abrasive and demands total loyalty. To describe him as a cross between Cheney and Donald H. Rumsfeld might be appropriate, though it would probably offend all three of them.

Brown admires the United States and likes Americans. But his political survival in Britain will require him to have a correct rather than a warm relationship with Bush. Britain, under him, will continue to draw down its forces in Iraq while giving diplomatic support to Washington even if the president continues to fight on. This may not seem logical, but it will meet the political imperative. It will suit both the president and the new prime minister to stand shoulder to shoulder even if the body language is cool and the empathy less obvious than it has been in recent times.

The same will apply if the opposition Conservative Party, under new leader David Cameron, comes to power in the next general election. It is not due for two to three years. By that time, the United States will have a new president and Iraq will either be improving or have already collapsed into a vicious civil war. Whatever the controversies of the past, both a Brown and a Cameron government would recognize the need to rebuild stability and good governance in Iraq, and would recognize the need for American leadership in that endeavor.

The Conservatives, who originally supported the invasion of Iraq in 2003, have been distancing themselves from Blair since it emerged that there were no weapons of mass destruction, and as Iraq has slid into anarchy. (Some Conservatives, myself included, opposed the war from the beginning.) But the Conservatives, unlike some elements of the Labor Party, have no history of anti-Americanism and will want to work closely with either a Republican or Democratic administration. They already have close links with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and will be wishing to develop them with other presidential candidates. A handshake, however, with the current incumbent of the White House is, I'm afraid, no longer seen as an automatic vote-winner back home.

It would be wrong to ignore the fact that the Iraq war and the unilateral, Manichaean foreign policy of the Bush presidency has had a profound impact on British opinion. I represent Kensington and Chelsea in the House of Commons. They are the two wealthiest districts in the United Kingdom. Most of their residents are high-earners. Overwhelmingly they vote Conservative. By a margin of about 3 to 1, these instinctive pro-Americans have been highly critical of U.S. foreign policy over the past five years.

That mood is far from irreversible. The basic empathy with the United States remains. There is little evidence of British public opinion turning to the European Union as an alternative to the United States in its affections.

Many years ago, Churchill remarked that you can always rely on the United States to do the right thing -- after it has tried every other option. There is much hope, and some evidence, that that is where we may now be heading.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind is a former foreign secretary and a former defense secretary of the United Kingdom. He is member of Parliament for Kensington and Chelsea.

Aid Workers With Guns (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

CAMP LEMONIER, Djibouti

The U.S. has built a little-known military base here that represents one of our best strategies to fight terrorism in the coming years: The aim is to build things rather than blow them up.

This base in Africa, established in 2003, sits at the entrance to the Red Sea in the small Muslim country of Djibouti, next to Somalia. Security is as tight as the sun is hot, with lots of bomb shelters, but the most apparent threats are distinctly, well, African.

DOJ_NMG_0140057

"We've got two hyenas out there," said Cmdr. Darryl Centanni of the Navy, executive officer of Camp Lemonier, pointing to a jogging trail on which troops were running through the semidesert. "So the running gets pretty interesting."

He added that a pack of wild dogs also speeds up joggers but that the dogs mostly get food by catching fish in the sea. (I'm not sure I trust military intelligence on that one.)

After 9/11, the focus of America's response to terrorism has been mostly on using military force to destroy possible threats in places like Iraq and intimidate just about everyone. The ethos was borrowed from the ancient Romans: "Oderint, dum metuant" — "Let them hate, so long as they fear."

Yet all in all, that strategy has backfired catastrophically, particularly in Iraq, and turned us into Al Qaeda's best recruiter.

So that's why the softer touch in Centcom's strategy here is so welcome. It aims to help bring stability to northeastern Africa and to address humanitarian needs — knowing that humanitarian involvement will make us safer as well.

"The U.S. started to realize that there's more to counterterrorism than capture-kill kinetics," said Capt. Patrick Myers of the Navy, director of plans and policy here. "Our mission is 95 percent at least civil affairs. ... It's trying to get at the root causes of why people want to take on the U.S."

One humanitarian mission for which the U.S. military is superbly prepared is responding to natural disasters. While the U.S. has spent vast sums broadcasting propaganda to the Muslim world, the two most successful efforts at winning good will both involved the military. One was the dispatch of soldiers to help Indonesia after the 2004 tsunami, and the other was the use of U.S. forces to help Pakistan after the Kashmir earthquake.

The 1,800 troops here do serve a traditional military purpose, for the base was used to support operations against terrorists in Somalia recently and is available to reach Sudan, Yemen or other hot spots. But the forces here spend much of their time drilling wells or building hospitals; they rushed to respond when a building collapsed in Kenya and when a passenger ferry capsized in Djibouti.

Rear Adm. James Hart, commander of the task force at Camp Lemonier, suggested that if people in nearby countries feel they have opportunities to improve their lives, then "the chance of extremism being welcomed greatly, if not completely, diminishes."

The U.S. announced last month that it would form a new Africa Command, aimed partly at blocking the rise of ungoverned spaces that nurture terrorism. The new command offers tremendous humanitarian potential as well, for in some poor countries the most useful "aid workers" are the ones in camouflage carrying guns.

In the Central African Republic in September I visited a town with a lovely new hospital built as a foreign aid project. But the hospital was an empty shell, gutted by militias rampaging through the area. In places like that, there's no point in building schools or clinics unless you also help with security.

Some of the most successful aid projects in Africa have been the dispatch of armed peacekeepers to Mozambique and British troops to Sierra Leone. In both places, troops brought what the besieged population most desperately needed — order — and laid the groundwork for recovery. We should be far more aggressive about dispatching small numbers of troops to impose a no-fly zone over Darfur or to destroy Sudanese militias that invade Chad and the Central African Republic.

We can also do far more to train armies in Africa. The deal we offer African presidents should be along these lines: You run a country cleanly and tolerate dissent, and we'll help ensure that no brutal rebel force comes out of the jungle to create chaos and overthrow you.

Helping fragile countries with security is just as important as helping them with education and medical care. So let's hope that this new base in Africa is the start of a broad new policy that doesn't aim to make us hated or feared, but respected.

While Australia Burns (NYT)

By Iain McCalman

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

Canberra, Australia

THIS summer, Australia feels like a war zone. Cities and towns across the country are enveloped in a perpetual smoke haze, and the braying of fire sirens is as commonplace as birdsong. Every evening television commentators deliver grim-faced reports from the front lines. Tired farmers look dazedly into the camera. Firemen with soot-smeared clothes and chili-red eyes shake their heads and mumble that they have never known anything like it. As with every modern war report, helicopters make a ubiquitous backdrop. They dip down in front of shrinking reservoirs, then stagger toward the fire front, their water pouches swaying marsupial-like underneath their bellies.

"Why? Why, Kamarrang?" asks a tall, slightly stooped Aboriginal man from western Arnhem Land in the far north of Australia. He is Bardayal Nadjamerrek, an elder of the Mok clan, and he is talking to a grizzled "white fellah" named Peter Cook, an ecological scientist. They are discussing the disappearance of whole groups of animals from the plateau of Mr. Nadjamerrek's youth. He repeats the question, this time looking upward to address the "Old People" — his ever-present ancestors — with whom he habitually discusses such issues.

DOJ_NMG_0140058

This scene opens a nearly completed film, "Fire in the Land of Honey," of which I'm a producer. The work of the filmmaker Kim McKenzie, it is one of a trilogy of documentaries about Mr. Nadjamerrek and his native land, which his people call Ankung Djang. Collectively, the films will tell how some 50 years ago the Aboriginal people left this vast plateau, the size of Belgium, drawn by the lure of money, tobacco and other novelties offered by distant buffalo camps, mines, stock stations and missions. Today it is a lost world, emptied of people but filled with rock paintings so intricate, ancient and beautiful they take your breath away. He is among the last people to grow up on the plateau, to know its lore and habitat, and to speak its languages.

He has returned to Ankung Djang with his wife, Kalkiwarra, because he has a task. It is to show his own grandchildren, as well as Peter Cook and other scientists, how his people used to look after the country long ago. He is also telling Mr. McKenzie, the filmmaker, all that he remembers of the history and culture of this ancient place. They are recording his knowledge because otherwise Ankung Djang will cease to have a history. Mr. Nadjamerrek is over 80 and his memory is getting shaky; names and places are starting to fade like the old trails he traveled as a young man to gather spear-making materials.

But his most urgent quest is to find out why his country is out of kilter. Since his people left half a century ago, fire — a staple tool of Aboriginal life — has turned into an uncontrollable monster, careering across the landscape, devouring the plateau's trees, plants, birds, animals and insects (including Mr. Nadjamerrek's beloved native bees).

In truth, none of us can really answer his question: "Why?" We do know the controlled-fire regimens that Aboriginal people practiced for millenniums to nurture the land must be reinstated. But, like Mr. Nadjamerrek, we also suspect something larger is going on — we fear that Australia's soaring heat, vanishing water and rampant fires are connected to larger global patterns of climate change. Thankfully, we Australians at least have Bardayal Nadjamerrek and the Old People to advise us; the rest of the globe is not so lucky.

Losing Bangladesh, By Degrees (NYT)

By Tahmima Anam

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

Dhaka, Bangladesh

IMAGINE, if you will, a country marooned between a snowy mountain range and a churning sea. The country is small, a thumbprint on a vast continent. It holds the youngest and largest delta in the world. This means the landscape is fickle, the rivers often shifting and swallowing giant swaths of land.

It is cleaved by two of the world's mightiest rivers, the Ganges and the Brahmaputra. They perform vanishing acts and conjuring tricks. One day your house is dry and the chilis are airing in the courtyard. The next it has disappeared altogether. You do not want to rebuild so close to the river, but you do: there is no space; the country is full.

For whatever else it strains to hold, it is the crush of humanity that makes Bangladesh what it is: a calamitous country, a country so full of people that every slight shift in circumstance has dire consequences. The weather does not have to be extreme. It has only to be intemperate, and the country does the rest.

How does such a small place hold so much? You worry that it will burst. But your worry is misplaced. You should worry that it will sink. For as the sea level rises, its waters will flow upward like fingers into a glove, turning the sweet river water into salt. The salt will destroy the crops and kill the fish and raze the forests. At the same time, the Himalayan peaks will melt, and they, too, will flow into the country. The rising sea and the melting mountains will meet on this tiny patch of the world, and the people who strain at its seams will drown with it, or be blown away to distant shores, casualties and refugees by the millions.

Here in the capital, winter is a festive season. The cool weather allows women to wear their heaviest saris and wrap thick twists of gold around their necks. There is little rain, the ground is solid — good for high heels. Buildings across the city are draped with strings of lights. You can buy hot, crunchy jilapis by the roadside; the markets are full of winter vegetables.

One day this winter, I landed at Dhaka airport just before dawn. The fog that had delayed my flight clung to the ground and looked like snow; as it lifted, a milky haze took its place. On the way home I saw groups of men huddled over coal fires by the side of the road. They wore puffy jackets and acrylic sweaters, castoffs from the sweatshops that dot the highways between the airport and the city. When they blew on their hands, I saw clouds whistling out of their mouths. Their heads were wrapped in shawls and towels and mosquito nets. The sun did not make an appearance until noon that day, and even then it was only a heatless, watery orb.

In the evening I went to the other side of town, where my uncles live by the long, pencil-shaped Dhanmondi Lake. I watched from the window as the lake appeared to go still, as though deciding whether it was cold enough to freeze over, and there were tiny dots of fish moving toward the shore, not swimming but belly up, drowned.

DOJ_NMG_0140059

According to the United Nations, the temperatures this winter in some parts of Bangladesh were the coldest in 38 years. The last time it was this cold, Bangladesh was called East Pakistan. Looked at another way, however, the mean temperature was only two degrees below the average for January.

Yet in a country so precariously balanced, two degrees meant the difference between life and death. In the districts of Rajshahi, Nilphamari, Srimangal and Gaibandha, people died of the cold because they had no protection against the weather, no walls between them and the elements — not a long sleeve or a sock. Only two degrees, but instead of enjoying their jilapis and weddings and cauliflower, 134 people died. A mere two-degree rise in the global climate will cause large tracts of the delta to disappear, and two degrees after that, the rivers will be wider than the plains, and two degrees after that, the water will have swallowed Bangladesh.

Two degrees either way for this country is not two degrees: it is catastrophe itself, borne on the waves of our warming world.

Memories Of A Colder Iceland (NYT)

By Kristin Steinsdottir

The New York Times, March 4, 2007

Reykjavik, Iceland

WOULD it be possible to go skiing over the weekend? This was her first thought when she pulled the curtains in the morning. Last weekend had been unusual. It shimmered like a beam of light in her memory and sent warmth into every nerve of her body. White ski slopes, sunshine, laughter and joyful shouting. Wasn't it a bit like being a child again?

Such a weekend wouldn't have been unusual at all 30 years ago, but in the vicinity of Reykjavik, the skiing areas had been shut down one by one during the previous winters, and the little snow that actually fell was always blown away. Now she looked at the snow in the trees, vaguely remembering crawling through an upper-story window a long time ago to watch her father dig his way down to the front door. Or was it perhaps only a lapse of memory? After all, she had been a little girl at that time and in memory everything becomes larger than life.

After a mild and rainy fall in 2006 no one in the city expected snow. The rain had poured from the sky and run down the streets, gathering into large puddles, reminding her of lakes. This past October she felt that the rain was more frequent and heavier than the years before. Some people missed the old windy rain, spoke of "foreign rain," said the rain wasn't behaving as it used to, and that they needed to get an umbrella. Using an umbrella in Iceland is actually just a joke since the wind usually blows from all directions, flips over the umbrella and destroys it. No one uses an umbrella in Iceland except foreigners.

The fall went by and it started getting colder, but it was on and off, as it often is in Iceland. There is an old saying that people never know what to put on when they leave the house. The sun may be shining when you go out, but you return in the rain or even a storm — and vice versa. It is said that this is due to the shifting weather conditions. But weren't the weather conditions shifting even more now? Wasn't there more of everything this winter?

She furrowed her brow, looked over the garden and tried to answer herself: blocked roads, snowstorms and sudden snowfall in the city after many winters with hardly any snow at all ... rainfall above average in the same city ... an unusual surging of rivers all over the country just before Christmas. These days she also felt more often as if the roof of her house might get blown off in passing storms. Rescue teams were constantly being sent out; air travel was interrupted more and more.

People wondered. Were these interruptions the result of stepped-up safety measures? Was the roof just getting older? But what about the temperatures? Although January was cold, the last 10 years in Reykjavik were the warmest on record, at least since records have been kept.

She looked at the glacier through the window. It appeared in full view across the bay in the morning sun and reminded her of an old pyramid. The glacier Snaefellsjokull is supposed to be one of the seven sources of spiritual energy in the world. Many tap into its energy. Once the glacier had an even snow cap on all sides. Now the cap was uneven and here and there rocks were visible through the ice.

The glacier is melting like others of its kind in Iceland. When looking at it she was reminded of another glacier, Vatnajokull, one of the largest in Europe. It would be gone within the next 200 years, it was said.

When she drew the curtains in the evening it had started to rain.

DOJ_NMG_0140060

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, March 05, 2007 8:21 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, March 03, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070303.pdf; agnb070303.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Calls For Return Of Hicks Come From Across Australia's Political Spectrum 2
4th Circuit Upholds Dismissal Of al-Masri Suit Against CIA 2

Homeland Response:

Bush To Visit Tornado-Ravaged Alabama Today 3
New Orleans Seeks $77 Billion In Damages From Army Corps Of Engineers 3

War News:

Bodies Of 14 Iraqi Policemen Found Following Abduction 3
Anbar Sheik Battles Insurgents 4
More Women Moving Into Combat Roles 4
US Military Doctors Saving Lives In Iraq 4
Khalilzad Lauds Oil Deal As Template For Reconciliation 4
Senior Taliban Leader Arrested In Pakistan 5
NATO Still Short Of Troops In Afghanistan 5
Scholar Says US Must Destabilize Iran To Defeat Terrorism 5

DOJ:

White House Approved Firings Of Seven US Attorneys 5
Gonzales Touts Anti-Terror Efforts In California 6

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ Probing New Century Financial's Stock Sales, Accounting 7
Ethics Complaint Limits Attorney's Role In Enron Case 8

Criminal Law:

Libby Jury Seek Clarification On "Reasonable Doubt" Standard 8
Louisiana Leads Nation In Katrina Fraud Cases 8
Former DOD Official Pleads Guilty To Embezzlement 9
DOJ Meets With Internet Providers About Monitoring Users 9
Minnesota US Attorney Cracking Down On Child Porn 10
Director Spielberg Contacts FBI About Stolen Painting In His Collection 10
O'Malley Considering Compromise On Death Penalty Repeal 10
LATimes Says Police Are Curtailing High-Speed Chases 10

Civil Rights:

DOJ Drops Involvement In Virginia Church Zoning Dispute 11
Seale Attorneys Argue Judge Has Conflict Of Interest 11
Rights Group Pleased With Georgia Cold-Case Probe 11
Judge Halts New York Election 12
Cochran Law Firm Accused Of Racial Bias 12

Antitrust:

SEC Probing TXU Trading Ahead Of Deal 13
EMI Board Dismisses Warner $4.1 Billion Offer 14
Ashcroft Letter To DOJ Criticizes Sirius-XM Deal 15
US, EU Near Open Skies Agreement 15

Environment:

EPA Issues Tighter Restrictions On Diesel Engines 16
Judge Keeps Divine Strike Legal Issues Alive 17
Anadarko Revives Suit Over Royalties 17
Evangelical Leaders Condemn Peer For Global Warming Activism 18
DOE Routinely Misses Efficiency Standards Deadlines, GAO Finds 18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Faces Questions Over California Anti-Gang Funding 18
WTimes Praises DEA For Busting Mexican Drug Ring 19
Authorities Find Million Rounds Of Ammo At Southern California Fire 19
Hundreds Of Guns Tied To Ohio Police Officer 20
Washington ATF Center Curbing Crime Through Gun Tracking 20

Immigration:
Immigration Reform Seen As Necessary To Combat Farm Labor Shortage 21

Tax:
IRS Audits Marriott's ESOP-Related Deductions 21
Michigan Man Arrested In Tax-Evasion Scheme 21

Congress-Administration:
Army Secretary Ousted In Wake Of Walter Reed Scandal 21
Bush Urges Congress To Avoid "Watering Down" NCLB 23
Bush Aides Sought Ejection Of Attendees At 2005 Event 23
Justice Thomas Uses Rare Interview To Criticize Media 23
Livermore Chosen To Develop New Nuclear Warhead 23
NYTimes Urges Pelosi To Institute Independent Ethics Oversight 24
Ornstein Says Congressional Leaders Should Not Be In Presidential Succession Line 24

Other News:
Wall Street Staggers To End Of Dow's Worst Week In Four Years 24
New Jersey Jury Delivers Split Verdict In Vioxx Trial 25
Bush Raises $2.1 Million For McConnell, NRSC 25
Surveys Of Party Committee Members Give Clinton, Romney The Leads 25
GOP Hopefuls Woo Conservatives At Annual CPAC Meeting 26
McCain Wins Upset Victory In Spartanburg GOP Straw Poll . 27
Giuliani's Children Absent From His Campaign So Far 27
Fred Thompson Reportedly "Seriously Considering" Presidential Bid 27
Clintons, Obama To Attend Selma Anniversary March 27
Pakistani Host Of Clinton Fundraisers Sought By FBI 28
Obama Says US Middle East Policy Has Strengthened Iran .. 28
Dodd Urges Rivals To Take Part In April New Hampshire Debate 28
Vilsack Criticizes Early Iowa Polls 29
Bush, Brazil's Lula Will Push Western Hemisphere Ethanol ... 29
Treasury "Ready" To Release North Korean Assets 29
Pakistan Tests Nuclear-Capable Short-Range Missile 30
In Interview, Qaddafi Redefines Outlook But Stays Faithful To Doctrine 30
Sudanese President Backs UN Darfur Force In Writing 30
Morocco Promises Western Sahara Autonomy Plan Next Month 30
Tehran-Caracas Weekly Flights Highlight Alliance 31
Haitian Juvenile Justice System Reflects Nation's Poverty 31
Putin Ally Ratified To Lead Chechnya 31
Ex-Ambassador Decries Congressional Resolution On Armenian Genocide 32

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 32

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 33

TERRORISM NEWS:

Calls For Return Of Hicks Come From Across Australia's Political Spectrum. The New York Times (3/3, A6, Bonner, 1.16M) reports, "The decision by the United States military to charge an Australian citizen, David Hicks, with one terrorism-related offense comes as Prime Minister John Howard is under mounting pressure, even from conservatives in his own party, to have Mr. Hicks charged, tried and brought home. Mr. Hicks is the first detainee from the American base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to be charged under the Military Commissions Act of 2006. But the single charge, of providing 'material support for terrorism,' after Mr. Hicks has been held for five years in Guantánamo, has been met with skepticism, disbelief and some anger here, from conservatives and liberals alike."

4th Circuit Upholds Dismissal Of al-Masri Suit Against CIA. The Washington Post (3/3, B5, Markon) reports, "A federal appeals court yesterday upheld the dismissal of the case of a German citizen who says he was wrongfully imprisoned by the CIA." The Post continues, "Khaled al-Masri had sued former CIA director George J. Tenet and 10 unnamed CIA officials in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Sources have said that Masri was held by the CIA for five months in Afghanistan because of mistaken identity." The Post adds, "U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III last year sided with the Justice Department, which invoked a state-secrets privilege to argue for dismissing the lawsuit. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit upheld Ellis's decision."

El-Masri Seeks Apology From US Government. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (3/3, 850K) Khaled El-Masri, identified as a "a German citizen born in Lebanon," who "was a car salesman before he was detained in December 2003," writes, "On New Year's Eve in 2003, I was seized at the border of Serbia and Macedonia by Macedonian police who mistakenly believed that I was traveling on a false German passport. I was detained incommunicado for more than three weeks. Then I was handed over to the American Central Intelligence Agency and was stripped, severely beaten, shackled, dressed in a diaper, injected with drugs, chained to the floor of a plane and flown to Afghanistan, where I was imprisoned in a foul dungeon for more than four months. Long after the American government realized that I was an entirely innocent man, I was blindfolded, put back on a plane, flown to Europe and left on a hilltop in Albania — without any explanation or apology for the nightmare that I had endured. My story is well known. … Why, then, does the American government insist that my ordeal is a state secret?"

DOJ_NMG_0140063

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush To Visit Tornado-Ravaged Alabama Today. The AP (3/3) reports President Bush "heads to Alabama today to visit areas damaged by this week's vicious storms and deadly tornadoes. Among his stops will be the high school where eight students were killed Thursday when a twister demolished their school." The AP (3/2) reported earlier that on Friday, the President "offered condolences to victims" of the storms, saying he "he had spoken to Alabama Gov. Bob Riley on Thursday afternoon and Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue on Friday morning." Regarding his trip today, Bush said, "I go down with a heavy heart. I go down knowing full well that I'll be seeing people whose lives were turned upside down by the tornadoes. I'll do my very best to comfort them."

Reporting on the tornadoes dominated the broadcast network newscasts Friday night. ABC World News (3/2, Gibson, 8.78M) devoted its first eight minutes to the storms. The CBS Evening News (3/2, Couric, 7.66M) gave the story just under five minutes, and mentioned that "President Bush plans to visit this area tomorrow." NBC Nightly News (3/2, Savidge, 9.87M) gave the storms about four and one-half minutes, also reporting that "President Bush will tour the heavily-damaged region tomorrow."

New Orleans Seeks $77 Billion In Damages From Army Corps Of Engineers. The New York Times (3/3, A12, Eaton, 1.16M) reports the City of New Orleans "filed a $77 billion damage claim against the federal government on Thursday, joining thousands of residents who have flocked to the Army Corps of Engineers seeking compensation for their losses after Hurricane Katrina in 2005. The corps, which built and helped maintain much of the levee system that failed, has not tallied the number of claims or the total amount of money sought. It received 30,500 forms by late last month, a spokeswoman for the agency, Kathy Gibbs, said. … The claims were in part prompted by a ruling last month by a federal judge that raised the possibility that suits against the corps could proceed. Normally, federal law does not allow suits for damages resulting from the failures of flood-control projects. But on Feb. 2, Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of Federal District Court in New Orleans ruled that at least one flooding source, the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet, might be considered a navigation channel and not a flood-control project."

The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Simmons, 850K) reports New Orleans officials "did not specify the damages to be covered, but in a statement, City Atty. Penya Moses-Fields said the claim was 'prudent at this stage to file.' Entergy New Orleans, the city's electrical utility that went bankrupt after Katrina, is seeking $655 million in damages and losses, and New Orleans Sewerage and Water is trying to recoup about $460 million. The corps has argued that the 1928 Flood Control Act gives it immunity from lawsuits."

WAR NEWS:

Bodies Of 14 Iraqi Policemen Found Following Abduction. The AP (3/2) reports, "The bodies of 14 policemen were found Friday northeast of Baghdad after an al-Qaeda-affiliated Sunni group said it abducted members of a government security force in retaliation for the rape of a Sunni woman by members of the Shiite-dominated police. ... Earlier Friday, the Islamic State of Iraq said in a Web statement that it seized 18 Interior Ministry employees in Diyala in retaliation for 'the crimes carried out ... against the Sunnis.'" However, an Interior Ministry spokesman "cast doubt on whether the 14 slain policemen were the same men shown on the website photos" posted by the group. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Zavis, 850K) reports that the men were kidnapped even though they "had taken pains to travel inconspicuously, wearing civilian clothes and riding in sedans. ... It was unclear whether the officers were among the 18 blindfolded men pictured earlier on a website by a group calling itself the Islamic State in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0140064

Sunni Insurgents "Ascendant" In Iraqi Bloodshed. The Washington Post (3/3, A11, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "More than two weeks into a new Baghdad security plan, Sunni insurgents are asserting responsibility for an increasing number of violent attacks against U.S. and Iraqi security forces and civilian targets, while Shiite militias are lowering their profile. In recent months, al-Qaeda in Iraq and other Sunni groups have begun to use more sophisticated tactics, downing U.S. helicopters and staging large attacks that have claimed the lives of hundreds of Iraqi civilians."

First Post In Sadr City Established By US, Iraqi Forces. AFP (3/2) reports that US forces "will gain their first foothold in Baghdad's Sadr City this week, a fortified joint security station from which to patrol the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr, a senior US military official said Friday." Talks are still under way "with the mayor of Sadr City…and the US military will begin building the security station this week in the populous Shiite district in east Baghdad, said Brigadier General Joseph Anderson."

Anbar Sheik Battles Insurgents. The New York Times (3/3, A8, Wong, 1.16M) reports on Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi, the "public face of the Sunni Arab tribes in lawless Anbar Province who have turned against the Sunni jihadists of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, many of whom belong to other, sometimes more militant Iraqi tribes. ... There is talk that the sheik has received large amounts of money from the Iraqi government or the Americans. His face has been shown in anti-insurgent commercials on the government-run Iraqiya television network." But he "complains that he does not get nearly enough financial or military support." Anbar residents "say the split in the Sunni insurgency is widening, with moderate tribal leaders and nationalist guerrillas pitted against fundamentalist warriors and rival tribes. That has led to a sharp increase in Sunni-on-Sunni violence across Anbar, especially in the past week, deepening the chaos of Iraq's civil war."

More Women Moving Into Combat Roles. The Dallas Morning News (3/3, Kovach, 500K) reports, "More women than ever are close to combat or have actual combat roles, and the government and military leaders continue to struggle with the question of where and how to set limits." This is the "first war in which female U.S. troops have been authorized to shoot back. And they have -- as helicopter gunners, military police, and even truck drivers forced to defend themselves on a battlefield with no clear frontlines." Their service has aroused conflict between those who consider them "vital" and those "who believe the armed forces have already pushed them too far. ... More than 70 women service members have died in Iraq since the start of the war."

The CBS Evening News (3/2, story 6, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight, the sacrifices made by American servicemen and women. Two more American soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb outside Baghdad today. The US death toll in Iraq is now at least 3,166, and that includes 71 women."

US Military Doctors Saving Lives In Iraq. In a sympathetic report, NBC Nightly News (3/2, story 6, 3:15, Brown, 9.87M) profiled "the brave American medical teams that work so hard to save the lives of those wounded in Iraq." NBC (Bazell): "On the roof of the Baghdad combat hospital during a quiet evening, the medical team comes to unwind." Dr. Darrell Pugh: "We never saw anything like this when we were training in the United States. There have been a couple of times when I have had to step back and say, how am I going to deal with this?" Bazell: "We weren't allowed to photograph it, but every time an American service person killed in action is transported out of here on a helicopter, the entire hospital staff lines up to show its respect."

Khalilzad Lauds Oil Deal As Template For Reconciliation. In an op-ed in today's Washington Post (3/3, A15, 690K), US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad says Iraq's oil agreement "points the way forward," will "enable oil wealth to "serve as a vehicle to unify Iraq," and "will give all Iraqis a shared stake in their country's future." He calls the deal "a significant achievement for Iraqis' national reconciliation" and "central to overcoming internal divisions in Iraq." The "effective and equitable management of these resources is critical to economic growth as well as to developing a greater sense of shared purpose among Iraqi communities." Khalilzad says the new law achieves its authors' goals and "is a great success," and concludes, "This is the first time since 2003 that all major Iraqi communities have come together on a defining piece of legislation. … The agreement on the oil law should give us confidence that Iraqis are willing and able to take the steps needed for Iraq's success."

DOJ_NMG_0140065

Senior Taliban Leader Arrested In Pakistan. The Washington Post (3/3, A11, Witte, Khan, 690K) reports, "The arrest of a senior Taliban leader in a Pakistani city long reputed to be a haven for the group kindled guarded hope among Western and Afghan security officials Friday that the government here plans to move more aggressively against insurgents taking refuge on its territory." It "marks the first time since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks that authorities here have acknowledged apprehending or killing a senior Taliban commander on Pakistani soil." Obaidullah Akhund, "arrested hours after Vice President Cheney made a visit to Islamabad this week, is a former Taliban defense minister and is viewed in intelligence circles as one of the highest-ranking figures in the Islamic movement."

Roadside Bomb Injures Pakistani Judge. The New York Times (3/3, A7, 1.16M) reports in a three-sentence article, "A bomb rigged to a bicycle exploded near a car carrying a judge to his court in central Multan, seriously wounding him and killing his driver, a policeman and a third man. The judge, Mian Bashir Bhatti, often hears cases against suspected militants and terrorists."

NATO Still Short Of Troops In Afghanistan. The Washington Post/AP (3/3, Baldor) reports in a pessimistic article, "Signs of a new spring offensive by Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan have begun to emerge, but NATO commanders are still short more than 1,000 combat troops, despite repeated requests to allied nations, the top commander said Friday." US Gen. John Craddock said that his forces were "losing the counter-narcotics war, and more work and greater coordination is needed in the reconstruction effort." He added that NATO would never "prevail" as long as Pakistan failed to exercise "greater control of the border areas."

Scholar Says US Must Destabilize Iran To Defeat Terrorism. In an op-ed in today's Wall Street Journal (3/3, A9, 2.04M), the American Enterprise Institute's Michael Ledeen says it "is a good thing" that the Administration is "clearly paying much more attention to Iran than" it did previously. "To restrict our national debate to Iraq and Afghanistan alone is to accept the failure of strategic vision that has plagued us from the war's earliest days." He says it "isn't good enough" to "fight in one place at a time, secure that area, and then move on." Noting that America's "primary enemies are states, which provide the jihadis with much of the wherewithal for their operations," Ledeen calls Iran "by far the most important," with Syria and Saudi Arabia also supporting terrorism. Tehran remains "the keystone of the terrorist edifice," and "it doesn't require more boots on the ground or bombing raids. It requires a traditional American policy: support for democratic revolution against our tyrannical enemies." Ledeen concludes, "We are engaged in a global war, and while we have done well in many respects, we have thus far refused to recognize the real nature of the fight."

DOJ:

White House Approved Firings Of Seven US Attorneys. The Washington Post (3/3, Solomon, Eggen, 690K), in a front-page article titled, "White House Backed U.S. Attorney Firings, Officials Say, reports that the White House "approved the firings of seven U.S. attorneys late last year after senior Justice Department officials identified the prosecutors they believed were not doing enough to carry out President Bush's policies on immigration, firearms and other issues, White House and Justice Department officials said yesterday. The list of prosecutors was assembled last fall, based largely on complaints from members of Congress, law enforcement officials and career Justice Department lawyers, administration officials said." The Post notes that "one of the complaints came from Sen. Pete V. Domenici, who specifically raised concerns with the Justice Department last fall about the performance of then-U.S. Attorney David C. Iglesias of New Mexico. … Iglesias has alleged that two unnamed New Mexico lawmakers pressured him in October to speed up the indictments of Democrats before the elections." The Post adds that "officials acknowledged that the ousters were based primarily on the administration's unhappiness with the prosecutors' policy decisions and revealed the White House's role in the matter. 'At the end of the day, this was a decision to pick the prosecutors we felt would most effectively carry out the department's policies and priorities in the last two years,' said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. Officials portrayed the firings as part of a routine process, saying the White House did not play any role in identifying which U.S. attorneys should be removed or encourage the dismissals."

The AP (3/3) reports, "The former U.S. attorney for Nevada said he declined an invitation to testify voluntarily before a congressional panel investigating the removal of at least eight federal prosecutors around the nation. … But Daniel Bogden, who has said he was not given a reason for his removal this week, said he would appear if compelled by subpoena to appear before the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on commercial and administrative law." The AP continues, "Bogden did not immediately respond Friday to requests for comment. The 51-year-old prosecutor is one of several federal prosecutors removed in recent weeks by the Justice Department. His last day was Wednesday. No successor has been named. … On Thursday, Bogden told reporters that he remained unsure why he was removed." The AP adds, "Bogden told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that Michael Battle, director of the executive office for U.S. attorneys, did not provide a reason when he asked Bogden on Dec. 7 to step down from the post he had held since 2001. … Bogden said other Justice Department officials told him that the decision was reached at the highest levels of the department. … 'I was given an explanation that seemed to me to be political in nature, that had nothing to do with any issues with my performance or issues with the performance of my office,' Bogden said. … He noted that Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty on Feb. 6 told the Senate Judiciary Committee and the dismissals of federal prosecutors were performance-related."

The Albuquerque Tribune (3/3) reports, "A brief news conference called today by Rep. Heather Wilson on veterans affairs devolved into a grilling over questions about former U.S. Attorney David Iglesias." The Tribune continues, "Wilson, after meeting with officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, spoke to about four or five reporters about treatment of veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan. … After a couple of questions on that issue, the reporters turned their questioning to Iglesias - specifically, whether Wilson called him in the weeks before the Nov. 7 election to inquire about a high-profile corruption case being investigated by his office. … 'I have said very little about that, and I won't make any additional comment at this time,' the Albuquerque Republican told reporters gathered at the Veterans Administration Hospital." The Tribune adds, "She referred to Iglesias' ouster as she has before, as a personnel issue within the Department of Justice. … When asked how an alleged phone call to a U.S. attorney could be construed as a personnel matter, she replied that she 'did not have any additional comment at this time.' … Wilson offered the same response to a number of other questions on the same topic. … She would not comment on a report published Thursday identifying her and Sen. Pete Domenici as having called Iglesias in October."

Gonzales Dismisses Emanuel's Outside Counsel Suggestion. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (3/3) writes that Gonzales "has indicated he is too busy to answer letters from Democratic congressional leaders about" the firings "though a lower-level Justice Department official rejected their proposals." Rep. Rahm Emanuel "had written Gonzales two letters suggesting that he name Carol Lam, fired as U.S. attorney in San Diego, as an outside counsel to continue her pursuit of the Duke Cunningham case. … Richard A. Hertling, the acting Justice Department lobbyist, responded Wednesday, 22 days after Emanuel's letter. He contended 'the Justice Department would not ever seek the resignation of a U.S. attorney if doing so would jeopardize a public corruption case' and rejected naming Lam as a special prosecutor."

WPost Plays Down Controversy. The Washington Post (3/3, A14, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "The Justice Department's firing of a group of U.S. attorneys is neither as sinister as critics suggest nor as benign as the department would have you believe, at least on the basis of the evidence revealed so far. But it is, both sides agree, highly unusual and warrants further inquiry. … Pending further investigation, the episode seems to reflect an unusual reaction to the normal tension between Justice headquarters and the would-be autonomous U.S. attorneys, in this case involving disagreements over how much to focus on immigration cases or when to seek the death penalty. Prosecutorial independence is important, but the president is entitled to have prosecutors who reflect his law-enforcement priorities and to replace those who balk at complying."

NYTimes Calls For Appointment Of "Impartial Investigator." The New York Times (3/3, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, suggests Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "should appoint an impartial investigator to get to the bottom of this unfolding scandal." According to the Times, the Bush administration "trampled on prosecutorial independence."

Gonzales Touts Anti-Terror Efforts In California. The Sacramento Bee (3/3, Korber) reports, "For U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, every day is Sept. 12. … 'My No. 1 priority is protecting our nation and our citizens from another attack,' Gonzales said in a talk Friday at McGeorge School of Law in Oak Park. 'That is what drives me.'" The Bee continues, "While dozens of raucous protesters demonstrated outside, the nation's top cop spoke to a quieter audience of dignitaries and students who attended the invitation-only lecture at the school. … Gonzales' half-hour talk, read rapidly from notes, was a passionate defense of the Bush administration's anti-terrorism strategy on several fronts: domestic surveillance, the detention of foreign terror suspects at Guantánamo Bay, and the importance of the USA Patriot Act." The Bee adds, "Gonzales, who was sworn in as attorney general two years ago, previously served as President Bush's White House counsel. He recalled being with the president on Sept. 11, 2001. … 'I carry the memory and pain of that day -- the brutal murder of fathers and mothers, sons and daughters,' he said. 'Our enemies are smart. They are adaptable. And they are very, very patient. We must anticipate what our enemy is going to do next.' … To that end, he said, the administration must have new tools and rethink some old rules. He quoted a British report that described parts of the Geneva Convention as out of date, and he spoke of clarifying and modernizing those international standards of wartime behavior. … 'This is a new threat that requires a new way of thinking,' he said." The Bee notes, "At the end of his talk, Gonzales was asked how he thought history would judge him. … 'I will let history write that story,' he said. 'I can't worry about my legacy. I can't spend the next two years fighting defensive battles. I have an obligation to take the majestic powers of the Department of Justice and do good for the American people.' … Protesters outside the lecture hall -- primarily law students and some of their professors -- accused Gonzales of ignoring the Constitution in his pursuit of terrorism. They raised issues that have dogged Gonzales since his nomination, including his approval of an administration memo that condoned harsh treatment of suspected terrorists."

DOJ_NMG_0140067

CBS 13 Sacramento (3/3) reports, "Protestors made a run for it over to McGeorge School of Law today to speak their mind on the war on terror. The target of their anger-- U.S. Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales who was invited to speak at McGeorge." CBS continues, "With a glance and a wave, It didn't take long for the attorney general to figure out he wasn't exactly being welcomed by some in a group of McGeorge students. … These protestors --many of them law students from McGeorge cut to the chase as they told us, in dramatic fashion, why they were here. CBS adds, "Rights being violated, this group would argue, by the U.S. Attorney General's office: … As they carried signs targeting the man who hired Gonzales-- President Bush. … Protestors ripped the administration and the Attorney General on how they handle so called enemy combatants; the guys at Guantanamo. But that was not all. … The tactics for handling the media's coverage of the attorney general's speech was a bit puzzling today. At first, CBS13 was told we'd be allowed in. Then, they shut all media out."

KNBC-TV in Los Angeles (3/2, 5:05 pm PT) broadcast, "US Attorney General Gonzalez in Los Angeles today touring one of the city's most successful gang prevention and intervention centers. Gonzalez and LA Mayor Villaraigosa toured Homeboy Industries. It's a silk screening business that gives jobs to at-risk youth and former gang members."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Probing New Century Financial's Stock Sales, Accounting. The New York Times (3/3, Bajaj, Creswell) reports, "Federal prosecutors and securities regulators are investigating stock sales and accounting errors at the New Century Financial Corporation, the biggest mortgage company that specializes in lending to people with weak, or subprime, credit, the company disclosed in a corporate filing yesterday. … The company also warned that a delay in filing its financials may put vital financing into jeopardy." The Times continues, "The troubles at New Century are the latest sign of the deterioration in subprime lending — until recently the fastest-growing segment of the mortgage business. The market has been struggling to contain the fallout from rising default rates and weakening home prices. Late last year, some smaller lenders started going out of business and last month several bigger companies, including New Century, started reporting problems. … Another large lender, the Fremont General Corporation, said yesterday that it planned to sell its subprime mortgage business after reaching an agreement with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to restrict its activities in that area. As part of the agreement, Fremont will be able to continue taking deposits." The Times adds, "The investigations into New Century, which is based in Irvine, Calif., and wrote $33.9 billion in mortgages last year, started after the company said on Feb. 7 that it would restate earnings for three quarters, which sparked a huge sell-off in its shares. Yesterday, it said its problems had prevented it from filing its annual report, which was to be released Thursday. The board is conducting an investigation of the accounting problems. … The company's shares have fallen more than 53 percent since the start of the year — before the most recent announcement, which came after the stock market closed. Its shares were down $3.73, or 25 percent, to $10.92, in after-hours trading. … On Feb. 22, the company said the regulatory arm of the New York Stock Exchange contacted it about sales in the company's securities before that announcement. On Wednesday, it received notice from the United States attorney's office in Los Angeles that it was conducting a criminal investigation. Federal prosecutors are looking into trading in New Century securities and errors in how the company accounted for home loans that it was forced to buy back from Wall Street firms that buy its loans and package them into bonds. Also, the Securities and Exchange Commission has requested a meeting with its executives."

DOJ_NMG_0140068

Ethics Complaint Limits Attorney's Role In Enron Case. The Houston Chronicle (3/3, Hays) reports, "One of the lawyers who represents Enron shareholders in a $40 billion lawsuit bound for trial next month in Houston has informed the judge he is facing an ethics complaint from the Washington, D.C., Bar Counsel." The Chronicle continues, "The lawyer, G. Paul Howes, told U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in a letter Friday that he will address the matter at a hearing before a committee of the District of Columbia Board of Professional Responsibility on April 11, the week before jury selection is scheduled to begin in the Enron case. … He also said that because of the complaint, he will have a nonspeaking role in the Enron trial and will help the lead trial lawyer, Patrick Coughlin." The Chronicle adds, "The allegations include that in 1993-94, during Howes' 11 years as a federal prosecutor in Washington before he went into private practice in 1995, he made improper voucher payments to witnesses when prosecuting two murder cases. … The Justice Department investigated the allegations and did not file criminal charges against Howes. But the agency said in a 1998 report that he had improperly distributed witness vouchers. The Justice Department forwarded its findings to the D.C. Bar Counsel, which filed the complaint last month. … Howes said in the letter that he has 'always accepted responsibility for my conduct and that of the police officers who worked with me' on extensive investigations that began in 1988. He declined comment beyond the letter."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jury Seek Clarification On "Reasonable Doubt" Standard. The Washington Post (3/3, A4, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "Jurors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby asked the presiding judge for help yesterday defining a core issue in their deliberations: how to set a standard for determining whether the vice president's former chief of staff is guilty beyond a 'reasonable doubt.' At the end of its eighth day of deliberations, the foreman of the 11-member jury sent U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton a two-sentence note. 'We would like clarification of the term 'reasonable doubt," the note said. 'Specifically, is it necessary for the government to present evidence that it is not humanly possible for someone not to recall an event in order to find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt?' … According to jury and evidence experts, the question…signifies that at least one juror is concerned how strictly to define reasonable doubt."

The New York Times (3/3, A11, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "The question suggested that at least some of the jurors are wrestling with the imprecise and often vexing definition of reasonable doubt, as well as how to decide whether a false statement should be attributed to faulty memory or willful deception, the issue at the center of the case."

Louisiana Leads Nation In Katrina Fraud Cases. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/3, Alpert) reports, "In her application for federal emergency help, Tina Marie Gilmore told officials how she watched hopelessly as her two daughters, ages 5 and 6, were swept through the rushing floodwaters after Hurricane Katrina and was so distraught several months later that she couldn't function -- couldn't drive a car or even be in the same room with children. … But after mailing her a check for $4,358, the Federal Emergency Management Agency learned that not only did the 34-year-old woman not live in New Orleans when Hurricane Katrina devastated the city, but she also didn't have any children. Even her last name was a fake. The government said it wasn't Gilmore, but Winston. … Last month, U.S. District Judge William Stiehl sentenced the Belleville, Ill., woman to four years in jail. 'She took advantage of the taxpayers of this country under very tragic circumstances,' Stiehl said." The Times-Picayune adds, "Winston is one of about 600 people in 19 states and the District of Columbia who have been indicted for making fraudulent hurricane claims. Louisiana has the most cases, 140, followed by Mississippi, with 105, and California, 71. … One of the most prevalent schemes, according to the government, involved false claims for emergency $2,000 allocations from FEMA, money intended to pay emergency living expenses after Katrina forced hundreds of thousands of people from their homes. … But some of the scams were far more audacious. … U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said he isn't surprised that the Eastern District of Louisiana, which covers metropolitan New Orleans, is on the low end of fraud cases given that the devastation of the storm meant most of the area's residents suffered at least some damage during Katrina. … According to the Justice Department, the Eastern District had 18 cases, although Letten believes the actual number is in the 30s. Still, that's fewer cases than reported for the Eastern District of California, the Northern District of Alabama and middle district of Louisiana, which includes Baton Rouge."

DOJ_NMG_0140069

Former DOD Official Pleads Guilty To Embezzlement. The Washington Times (3/3, Seper) reports, "A former Defense Department official yesterday pleaded guilty in federal court to charges of embezzling more than $100,000 in funds destined for use by government intelligence agents, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said." The Times continues, "John Taylor, who worked at the department as an intelligence contingency-funds officer, admitted in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia that he stole the money while assigned to the 500th Military Intelligence Brigade as part of the U.S. Army Intelligence and Security Command at Camp Zama, Japan." The Times adds, "In his Defense Department role, Mrs. Fisher said, Taylor was responsible for budgeting, disbursing and accounting for intelligence contingency funds for the official duties of government intelligence agents. She said he also was required to manage classified bank accounts and supervise agents engaged in classified intelligence-gathering activity. … As part of a plea agreement in the case, she said, Taylor admitted that from 2003 through January 2006, he used his official position to steal at least $106,000 in department funds designated for intelligence-related activities. … She said Taylor embezzled the money by withdrawing cash from a government bank account whose funds were intended for intelligence agents. To conceal his acts, she said, Taylor falsified Defense Department accounting vouchers and forms."

DOJ Meets With Internet Providers About Monitoring Users. CNET News.com (3/3, McCullagh) reports, "The Bush administration has accelerated its Internet surveillance push by proposing that Web sites must keep records of who uploads photographs or videos in case police determine the content is illegal and choose to investigate, CNET News.com has learned." CNET continues, "That proposal surfaced Wednesday in a private meeting during which U.S. Department of Justice officials, including Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, tried to convince industry representatives such as AOL and Comcast that data retention would be valuable in investigating terrorism, child pornography and other crimes. The discussions were described to News.com by several people who attended the meeting." CNET adds, "A second purpose of the meeting in Washington, D.C., according to the sources, was to ask Internet service providers how much it would cost to record details on their subscribers for two years. At the very least, the companies would be required to keep logs for police of which customer is assigned a specific Internet address. … Only universities and libraries would be excluded, one participant said. 'There's a PR concern with including the libraries, so we're not going to include them,' the participant quoted the Justice Department as saying. 'We know we're going to get a pushback, so we're not going to do that.'" CNET notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has been lobbying Congress for mandatory data retention, calling it a "national problem that requires federal legislation." Gonzales has convened earlier private meetings to pressure industry representatives. And last month, Republicans introduced a mandatory data retention bill in the U.S. House of Representatives that would let the attorney general dictate what must be stored and for how long. …. Supporters of the data retention proposal say it's necessary to help track criminals if police don't immediately discover illegal activity, such as child abuse. Industry representatives respond by saying major Internet providers have a strong track record of responding to subpoenas from law enforcement. … Wednesday's meeting represents the latest effort by the Bush administration to increase the ability of law enforcement and intelligence agencies to monitor Internet users. Since 2001, the administration has repeatedly pushed for more surveillance capabilities in the form of the Patriot Act and a follow-up proposal that--if it had been enacted--would have given the FBI online eavesdropping powers without a court order for up to 48 hours.""

Minnesota US Attorney Cracking Down On Child Porn. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/3, Browning) reports, "Bruce Betcher says he began searching the Web for sexually explicit photos of children in 2003, a predilection that led him to photograph two relatives -- both under 12 -- and three of their best friends in lascivious poses. … When he appears in federal court in Minneapolis on Tuesday, Betcher, a 53-year-old Burnsville property appraiser, could be sentenced to up to life in prison -- a longer term than if he had been convicted of first- or second-degree murder." The Tribune continues, "Extraordinary prison sentences for first-time offenders and a willingness of prosecutors to throw the book at them are evidence of an expanding crackdown by the federal government on anyone caught producing, possessing or distributing child pornography. Mandatory minimum sentences have been lengthened twice in the past three years, and a year ago the Department of Justice launched Project Safe Childhood, a no-holds-barred enforcement initiative that has made prosecution of child porn a top priority." The Tribune adds, "Rachel Paulose, the new U.S. attorney for Minnesota, helped draft that initiative and promised vigorous enforcement of existing laws. … A review of Minnesota cases brought by the government in the past year shows that it isn't prosecuting people who accidentally tripped across a photo or two. The cases thus far range from an international Internet consultant snared at the airport with child sex photos on his laptop to the father of three young girls who recorded himself raping and sodomizing them. … One man prosecuted in Minneapolis recently had more than 350,000 images of pornography, some of which included sexual penetration of toddlers. In another case, a Richfield man who worked as a pharmacy assistant sent child porn to an undercover agent and said he could drug young girls so they wouldn't remember being assaulted and photographed. … Though many of the cases were already underway when Paulose took office in February 2006, she's promising to bring more. Several recent search warrants indicate that she means it. … 'You will, over time, see an increase,' Paulose said." The Tribune notes, "Betcher's lawyer, Thomas Shiah, and other defense attorneys worry the federal sentencing guidelines are too harsh, particularly for first-time offenders like Betcher. … But in Betcher's case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Erica MacDonald urged the judge to follow the sentencing recommendation of life in prison. 'The lives of five little girls and their families were irreparably damaged by this man and his deviant behavior,' she said in a memo filed Friday. … Paulose, too, is unsympathetic to any pleas for mercy. … 'To be blunt, no sentence would ever be long enough for a person who takes the innocence of a child,' she said."

Director Spielberg Contacts FBI About Stolen Painting In His Collection. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Krikorian, Khalil) reports, "A Norman Rockwell painting stolen from a Missouri gallery 34 years ago was recovered and authenticated Friday in the collection of movie mogul Steven Spielberg." The Times continues, "Spielberg's spokesman, Marvin Levy, said the director's staff contacted the FBI several weeks ago after seeing a bulletin from the agency's Art Crime Team seeking clues about the theft of the 'Russian Schoolroom' oil painting. … 'The second anybody said, "I think we have that painting," [our] office got a hold of the FBI,' Levy said." The Times adds, "Special Agent Chris Calarco of the FBI's Art Crime Team and Jessica Todd Smith, curator of American art for the Huntington Library, inspected the painting Friday afternoon at Spielberg's offices on the Universal Studios lot. The filmmaker was not present. … Calarco declined to speculate on the painting's value, but two sources close to the investigation said it is worth between $700,000 and $1 million. … The painting, depicting schoolchildren in a classroom looking at a bust of Soviet leader Vladimir Lenin, was stolen during an exhibit at a small art gallery in Clayton, Mo., in June 1973. … According to the FBI, its whereabouts were unknown until 1988, when it was sold at an auction in New Orleans for about $70,000."

O'Malley Considering Compromise On Death Penalty Repeal. The Washington Post (3/3, B2, Wagner, 690K) reports Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, "who testified last month in favor of repealing Maryland's death penalty, has started exploring a compromise with lawmakers that would limit the possibility of execution to just a few types of offenders, such as inmates who kill prison guards. Aides to O'Malley (D) say that such a deal might be the best hope for passing legislation that would tighten the scope of the state's death penalty. But that could put the governor at odds with advocates of a repeal, who say that the strategy could backfire and result in a bill that differs little from current law."

LATimes Says Police Are Curtailing High-Speed Chases. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, 850K)

DOJ_NMG_0140071

editorializes that "if you worry...about the dangers of high-speed police chases, don't expect the U.S. Supreme Court to impose new limits on the practice. This week, several justices reacted skeptically to the claim of a Georgia man that he should be allowed to sue a deputy sheriff because he was paralyzed after a police car rammed his vehicle. Fortunately, in Los Angeles and elsewhere, police forces are acting on their own to limit the dangers such chases pose to police, suspects and the public."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Drops Involvement In Virginia Church Zoning Dispute. The Roanoke Times (3/3, Ribeiro) reports, "The Justice Department has dropped an inquiry into whether Bedford County violated a church's rights by limiting their ability to worship in a Moneta barn." The Times continues, "The Rev. Ray Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia made the announcement at a news conference Thursday. In a phone interview, he said he's 'puzzled, but not upset' about the agency's decision. … Controversy surrounded the Cowboy Church for months. Services temporarily ceased at the Moneta barn last spring when Bedford County cited violations to a zoning and safety ordinance." The Times adds, "Services resumed last summer after advocates flooded county officials with phone calls. The Constitution guarantees people the right to worship and assemble, supporters have argued -- and that includes followers of the cowboy culture who hold their weekday services on a farm. … A Feb. 16 letter to Bell from the Justice Department states: 'We carefully reviewed the information that you have provided and determined that no further action by the Department is warranted.' … Bell had provided information on the issue to the Justice Department, but only after the agency asked for it, he said. He did not personally request an investigation, Bell said."

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (3/3, Faulconer) reports, "Six months ago, the department began investigating whether the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act was violated. Bell has opposed the county's requirement that a special-use permit be obtained to hold religious services, claiming it violates the separation of church and state."

Seale Attorneys Argue Judge Has Conflict Of Interest. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (3/3, Mitchell) reports, "U.S. District Judge Henry Wingate and U.S. Magistrate Judge Linda Anderson should step down from the case involving the 1964 slayings of two black teenagers, the attorney for reputed Klansman James Seale said Friday." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "Wingate and Anderson happen to be the only African-American judges in the Southern District of Mississippi, but Federal Public Defender Dennis Joiner made no mention of that fact. Instead, he argued the judges have a prior association with the U.S. attorney's office and the case had been assigned to another judge and magistrate judge initially. … In January, Seale pleaded innocent to the federal kidnapping and conspiracy charges in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction of Henry Hezekiah Dee and Charles Eddie Moore, reportedly by Klansmen. The teenagers were hitchhiking in Meadville when they were grabbed and beaten before being drowned in the Mississippi River, according to FBI reports." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Seale, now 71, faces an April 2 trial. If convicted, he could receive life in prison. … Joiner accused U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton of manipulating the system to have these judges hear the case. … 'The U.S. Attorney has had the sole ability to select which specific district court judge he wants to sit on any criminal case in the Jackson Division,' Joiner wrote. 'He does this by asking the grand jury to return an indictment during a month assigned to a particular judge.' … Joiner pointed out Wingate and Anderson both have served at the U.S. attorney's office - Anderson during the time the case was reinvestigated. Wingate was appointed to the bench in 1985. … It will be up to Wingate to rule on the matter."

Rights Group Pleased With Georgia Cold-Case Probe. The Savannah Morning News (3/3) reports, "A civil rights group that has pushed for years to reopen state and federal investigations into the decades-old lynching at Moore's Ford Bridge near Monroe said Friday they are pleased that the U.S. Department of Justice has decided to take another look at the case. … 'You just feel like the rule of law is going to prevail,' said state Rep. Tyrone Brooks, D-Atlanta, who is president of the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials." The News continues, "The group has pushed since at least 1998 for new investigations into killings of two black couples - Mae and George Dorsey along with Dorothy and Roger Malcom - in the summer of 1946. … Brooks said his group has been aware for more than a year that the FBI was probing the Moore's Ford case again but kept the information quiet to avoid interfering with the probe.

DOJ_NMG_0140072

… But during a press conference Tuesday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller announced that the Justice Department was reopening the investigations of some Civil Rights Era killings, including the Moore's Ford case. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation reopened its investigation several years ago on the orders of then-Gov. Roy Barnes." The News notes, "Brooks said local activists have kept up with at least five living suspects who were identified in the original FBI report following the 1946 killings. Brooks' group and local organizations also have been talking to witnesses. … 'We're going to be making an appeal to the suspects to turn themselves in and avoid a long ordeal,' Brooks said."

Judge Halts New York Election. The New York Times (3/3, Whitaker) reports from White Plains, NY, "A federal judge on Friday stopped March elections for two seats on the Port Chester Board of Trustees, finding there was sufficient evidence to make the case that the village's at-large system for voting discriminates against Hispanic residents." The Times continues, "In a 32-page ruling read from the bench, Judge Stephen C. Robinson of Federal District Court found merit in virtually every argument made by Justice Department lawyers seeking an injunction to stop the March 20 elections. The village, however, may still hold a mayoral election scheduled for the same day, the judge ruled. … 'I think what we heard in court says everything,' said Cesar Ruiz, a Hispanic man who filed a complaint with the Justice Department after an unsuccessful bid for village trustee in 2001. 'I'm very pleased.'" The Times notes, "The village trustees scheduled an executive session for Saturday morning to discuss the case and decide whether to continue its fight against breaking the village into six voting districts, one of which would be predominantly Hispanic, to replace its at-large system. …. Anthony G. Piscionere, who is representing the village in the case, said he believed that the village still had a chance of winning, particularly if the case went to appeal. A trial date has been set for April 16 through April 20. … The lawsuit, filed by the Justice Department in December, charges that the at-large system — meaning that all residents of the village vote for all candidates on the ballot — is unfairly weighted against Hispanic residents, a violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. According to the lawsuit, the system allows for white bloc voting, which inhibits Hispanic voters' ability to elect their preferred candidate."

The New York Journal News (3/3, Sadler) reports, "In an oral decision, U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson cited evidence of racial polarization in Port Chester's at-large election system. He said that if the case goes to trial, the U. S. Justice Department was likely to succeed in its claim that the current election system dilutes the Hispanic vote in violation of the federal Voting Rights Act. … 'It is clear to this court that Hispanic voters in Port Chester prefer different candidates, and that non-Hispanic voters generally vote as a bloc to defeat the Hispanic-preferred candidate,' Robinson said, capping a two-week hearing on whether the current election system discriminates against Hispanics. It is the first time a judge has stopped an election in Westchester County." The News adds, "Village officials expressed disappointment, but most declined to comment on whether they wanted to continue to fight the lawsuit. The board will meet with its lawyers today to discuss the next steps. It may choose to settle with the Justice Department and adopt voting districts or go to trial. The village also can appeal the injunction to the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. … It has already spent some $472,000 on lawyer fees and other legal expenses, draining what was a $2.5 million fund balance and raising some questions about whether to proceed. … U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement: 'In bringing this suit, the Justice Department sought to vindicate the voting rights of minority citizens in the village of Port Chester. I am pleased that Judge Robinson ... found that the United States is likely to succeed on the merits of its claim that the village of Port Chester's system for electing its Board of Trustees violates Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.'"

Cochran Law Firm Accused Of Racial Bias. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Garrison) reports, "For decades, the law firm founded by the late Johnnie L. Cochran Jr. has been renowned as a black-run institution fighting for civil rights and against police abuse — not to mention getting O.J. Simpson acquitted of murder charges. … But now, in a development that has dismayed some in Los Angeles' African American community, attorney Shawn Chapman Holley has sued the firm, claiming, among other things, that its leaders discriminated against her because she is black." The Times continues, "Holley said that after Cochran's death in 2005, leadership of the firm was turned over to white men who began to discriminate against black lawyers and black clients. … Neither she nor her attorneys would comment on the suit, although she released a statement through her lawyer: … 'In deference to the memory of Johnnie Cochran and in deference to his family, I do not intend to engage in a public airing of our disagreements. The lawsuit speaks for itself, and this matter will be litigated in the courts.'" The Times adds, "Randy H. McMurray, a partner in the firm, denied Holley's charges. … 'We probably have the most diverse law firm in California. I don't know what race we would be discriminating against,' he said, noting that he and another partner in the L.A. office, Brian Dunn, are black. … News of the suit raised eyebrows among some members of the city's black establishment. … 'Racial discrimination at the Cochran firm?' asked public affairs consultant Kerman Maddox. 'When you think Johnnie Cochran, you think best and brightest in the black community. … I'm shocked. If true, that would be a devastating blow to the legacy of Johnnie Cochran.' … Cochran, the great-grandson of slaves, founded his firm in 1965. He was best known nationally for his successful defense of Simpson against charges that he murdered his ex-wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and her friend Ronald Lyle Goldman. … But for decades before those 1994 killings, Cochran was well-known in Los Angeles for a string of cases in which he won historic financial settlements and helped bring about lasting changes in police procedure."

DOJ_NMG_0140073

ANTITRUST:

SEC Probing TXU Trading Ahead Of Deal.

The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A3, Berman) reports, "On Feb. 23, rumors began circulating in Washington that Texas utility giant TXU Corp. was close to striking an agreement with environmentalists opposing the company's plans to build new power plants. The company's shares surged 4% that day, as did trading in its options. … There was a deal, in fact. It was to sell the entire company. And, according to a Securities and Exchange Commission complaint filed late Friday, someone apparently already had begun trading illegally on the information." The Journal continues, "The SEC issued a temporary restraining order on certain unknown accounts Friday, for trading in call options that first began on Feb. 21, two days before word leaked that the utility was to be sold to private-equity firms. These unknown traders -- the SEC plans to identify them in further litigation -- scored $5.4 million in profits, the agency alleges. … Such activity has been at the center of suspicious market moves around a number of recent mergers and acquisitions. The total dollar value of these moves, however, far exceeds the figures involved in this case, which was brought in a U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois." The Journal adds, "In the days leading up to the deal, TXU's buyers were in discussions with a number of outside parties. Their hope was to convince both environmental groups and Texas lawmakers about the merits of its offer. … Such discussions are usually governed by strict confidentiality agreements, which is supposed to guarantee negotiations go on in secret. These agreements are supposed to protect sellers from leaks that might affect its stock price."

The Financial Times (3/3, Grant, Kirchgaessner) reports, "US federal regulators on Friday secured a court order freezing more than $5m in assets belonging to unknown traders who bought TXU call options a few days before the $45bn sale of the US utility to private equity groups." The Times continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission said the buyers of the options 'engaged in illegal insider trading'. The SEC said the "highly profitable and suspicious purchases" were made through overseas accounts late last month ahead of the deal announced on February 26. … In a sign of the global scope of the case, the SEC was helped by the UK's Financial Services Authority and Swiss counterparts. It comes in the same week that current and former employees of three top Wall Street banks were charged by federal prosecutors with insider trading." The Times notes, "Regulators uncovered the use of overseas accounts to trade options at the Chicago Board Options Exchange in advance of the announcement of TXU's purchase by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts, Texas Pacific Group and Goldman Sachs. … The SEC said unknown traders made purchases of call-option contracts three times last week through accounts at Credit Suisse in Zurich, broker Fimat in Frankfurt and UBS in London."

The New York Times (3/3, Dash) reports, "Federal investigators hope to track down the traders by untangling a web of transactions that passed through offshore accounts of several large banks and brokerage firms. … In papers filed yesterday in Federal District Court in Chicago, the S.E.C. froze more than $5.3 million that may be held in the domestic accounts of UBS Securities, Credit Suisse and Fimat Banque Frankfurt. It hopes to recover any gains linked to insider trading. Without the identities of any suspects, the commission said that it would need help from its counterparts overseas." The Times notes, "Yesterday's action comes as securities regulators have been signaling their intent to crack down on insider trading. On Thursday, the S.E.C. and the Justice Department accused more than a dozen people and hedge funds of making more than $15 million from an insider trading ring. … It is unclear whether the Justice Department is pursuing its own insider trading case related to TXU. A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Dallas, Kathy Colvin, declined to comment about whether it is investigating. … But federal securities regulators said they were trying to track down the traders who placed big bets before reports of the TXU deal. Activity in the options market surrounding the stock was unusually high days before the takeover; TXU's shares jumped more than 13 percent the day the deal was announced."

DOJ_NMG_0140074

Green Groups Feud Over TXU Buyout Terms. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A1, Smith, Carlton) reports, "Just days after two of the nation's leading environmental groups blessed an investor plan to buy TXU Corp. and take the controversial Texas utility in a new and 'greener' direction, a battle has broken out in the environmental community over the terms of the deal." The Journal continues, "The Natural Resources Defense Council and Environmental Defense claimed victory Monday when a holding company formed by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and other investors announced the biggest buyout in history, a plan to take over TXU for $32 billion plus the assumption of around $12 billion in debt. The environmental groups, two of the most powerful and best-funded in the U.S., said they had extracted a pledge from the investors to cancel a slew of coal-fired power plants, cut emissions and back federal global-warming legislation. … But now, opponents of the deal, in a blizzard of emails and Internet posts, have put the two organizations on the defensive by accusing them of settling for too little. The critics, who encompass a broad range of smaller environmental groups and individuals, say TXU should have been forced to give up all, not just some, of its future plans involving coal-fired power plants. The plants release substantial amounts of carbon dioxide, a heat-trapping gas blamed in part for climate change." The Journal adds, "Even worse, some believe that the environmental interests were snookered. Since the buyout was announced, it has become apparent that some of the concessions involve projects that TXU was already planning to shelve for a variety of reasons. And TXU has fueled the skepticism further in recent days by outlining new loopholes in the pledge. … NRDC and Environmental Defense 'should be hung for what they've done,' fumed Tim Hermach, executive director of the Native Forest Council, a group in Eugene, Ore., whose main mission is protecting public forests from commercial logging and other industrial practices."

EMI Board Dismisses Warner $4.1 Billion Offer. The New York Times (3/3, Leeds) reports, "The EMI Group of Britain, which releases music by the Beatles and Bob Seger, rejected a $4.1 billion takeover proposal yesterday from the Warner Music Group, signaling the latest turn in a long merger dance." The Times continues, "EMI said its board decided against Warner Music's cash offer, which was subject to "numerous assumptions and conditions," because it was not in the best interests of shareholders and placed too low a value on the company. … EMI, which has issued two profit warnings this year and is undertaking a broad restructuring, also said the offer carried regulatory uncertainty and 'unacceptable operational risk at a critical time' for the company, which has been grappling with weak CD sales and sluggish industrywide sales of digital music. … EMI also said the bid of 260 pence a share, or $5.07, represented an 'inadequate' offer considering the risks and the potential cost savings of a merger. The offer reflects a 17 percent premium over EMI's share price at the time it last announced it had been approached by Warner Music."

The Financial Times (3/3, Terazono, Van Duyn) reports, "The latest twist in the protracted merger talks comes as the European Commission this week launched an in-depth investigation into the merger of Sony and Bertelsmann's recorded music businesses." The Times adds, "Warner submitted its proposals on Thursday evening. EMI's board met on Friday and quickly moved to reject the offer. It said Warner's proposals – which would depend on regulatory clearance – were 'subject to numerous assumptions and conditions', adding that 260p a share was inadequate. … EMI and Warner have been trying to create a combined group since 2000. After several failed attempts, talks revived last year, but were in effect put on ice when a European court ruled that the European Commission had made 'manifest errors' in approving the Sony-BMG deal in 2004, and ordered a new probe on competition grounds. A final decision is expected by July 2."

Bloomberg (3/3, Smith, Jeffrey) reports, "The rejection extends the maneuvering between two companies struggling with declining music sales and piracy. EMI and Warner abandoned $4.6 billion offers for each other in July on concern a combination would be blocked by European Union regulators." Bloomberg continues, "The combined company would have a quarter of the global market, moving ahead of Sony BMG Music Entertainment to rank second worldwide behind Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group. … EMI's rejection follows yesterday's decision by European Union regulators to begin a new investigation of the merger that created Sony BMG Music. A European court's rejection of that combination led EMI and Warner to abandon their bids last year."

DOJ_NMG_0140075

Ashcroft Letter To DOJ Criticizes Sirius-XM Deal. Market Watch (3/3, Boles) reports, "Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, hired by opponents of the deal, has blasted the proposed merger of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. , saying their merger would leave only one provider in the market." Market Watch continues, "Ashcroft, who served as head of the Justice Department for four years until January 2005, was hired by the National Association of Broadcasters to examine the merger scenario. … The NAB, which represents traditional radio broadcasters, has been a fierce critic of the $13 billion merger since it was announced last week." Market Watch adds, "In a letter sent on February 27 to his replacement as attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, Ashcroft concludes '...the proposed Sirius/XM merger, which reduces the number of competitors from two to one, raises most serious competition concerns.' … Ashcroft compared the current merger to the attempted takeover by satellite provider Echostar Communications Corp. of Hughes Electronic Corp. In that instance, he said, a merger would have reduced the competitors in the satellite television market in many areas from three to two. … 'The Department recognized that reducing competition from three to two was anticompetitive and opposed the transaction, which was eventually abandoned,' he said. … He also draws comparisons with the attempted tie-up between Echostar and DirectTV Group Inc. , in which the FCC reaffirmed its rule of not granting a single commercial license for satellite TV. That deal also wasn't allowed. … 'I would submit that a thorough study of consumer demands and preferences would show that terrestrial radio stations should not be considered part of the satellite radio market for the purposes of the review of the current merger...,' said the letter."

Ashcroft Shopped Services To XM Before Signing With NAB. Dow Jones Newswire (3/3) reports, "Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, who sent a letter this week to his successor Alberto Gonzales blasting the proposed merger of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. (SIRI) and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc., approached XM in the days after the merger was announced offering the firm's consulting services, a spokesman for XM said Saturday. … The spokesman said XM declined Ashcroft's offer to work as a lobbyist for the company." Dow Jones continues, "Ashcroft was subsequently hired by the National Association of Broadcasters, which is fiercely opposed to the merger. On its behalf he conducted a review of the effects on competition if the two satellite radio companies were allowed to merge. … In a letter sent to Gonzales Feb. 27, Ashcroft concluded the merger would have a significant negative impact on competition in the market and urged the current Attorney General to withhold approval for the merger. … 'After the merger was announced, Mr. Ashcroft's firm contacted us about hiring him to assist us,' said Nathaniel Brown, a spokesman for XM. 'We declined. Apparently the National Association of Broadcasters opted to pay him to parrot their views.' … Dennis Wharton, the NAB's executive director, said Saturday, 'NAB approached former Attorney General Ashcroft to review the proposed XM-Sirius merger and offer his honest opinion as an antitrust expert. We are not aware of any alleged previous discussions between Mr. Ashcroft and officials at either satellite radio company.'" Dow Jones notes, "A revelation that Ashcroft was shopping his services to both sides of the debate over the merger may raise doubts in the eyes of some as to the rigor of his review conducted on behalf of the NAB. … The letter was forwarded by the NAB to lawmakers on the House and Senate Judiciary Committees."

US, EU Near Open Skies Agreement. The AP (3/3, White) reports, "EU and U.S. negotiators made 'decisive progress' in talks to lift restrictions on what trans-Atlantic routes airlines can offer, the European Union said Friday, a move that could mean lower prices for air travelers. … The pact will allow European airlines to fly from anywhere in the EU to any point in the U.S. without strict rules that dictate ticket prices." The AP continues, "The EU said this would bring economic benefits of up to euro12 billion (US$15.8 billion) in five years and create as many as 80,000 jobs in Europe and the United States. … Air travel in Europe and the United States accounts for 60 percent of global air traffic, and an ambitious EU-U.S. open skies deal could allow more airlines to fly the lucrative trans-Atlantic routes, possibly offering cheaper tickets." The AP adds, "Within five years, the deal could put an extra 26 million people on trans-Atlantic flights, the EU said. Just under 50 million travelers now make that trip every year. … But the deal may also mean the EU would be allowed to restrict U.S. investments in European airlines — a tit-for-tat move that follows the U.S. administration's failure to lift a 25-percent ceiling on foreign ownership of U.S. carriers. Dropping the restriction has been among the EU's key demands."

DOJ_NMG_0140076

The Financial Times (3/3, Bounds) reports, "The European Commission said it would submit the agreement to EU governments this month after 'a breakthrough' in meetings in Brussels. However, there is expected to be fierce debate when transport ministers meet on March 22, as the US has given little ground on loosening restrictions on foreign ownership of its airlines." The Times adds, "The quest for an 'open skies' agreement has eluded the two sides since talks were launched four years ago. A 2005 deal foundered in December because of congressional opposition to easing the regulations limiting foreign investment in US airlines, which the EU made a condition of the deal. Foreign companies and individuals can own only 25 per cent of voting stock and a further 24.9 per cent of non-voting equity. … The draft agreement merely sets out in writing existing US policy, critics say. In 2004 the Commission sent a similar deal for EU approval, only to see resistance from the UK and Germany sink it." The Times notes, "The UK has in the past been determined to resist the loosening of restrictions on the lucrative market between London's Heathrow airport and the US, without reciprocal US concessions. Only British Airways, Virgin Atlantic, United Airlines and American Airlines have the right to direct fights on these routes. … The UK has 40 per cent of the transatlantic market. Its transport department refused to comment yesterday."

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA Issues Tighter Restrictions On Diesel Engines. The Washington Post (3/3, A2, Eilperin, 690K) reports the Environmental Protection Agency "issued stringent new rules yesterday curbing harmful emissions from diesel locomotive and marine engines. Over the next quarter-century the regulations…will cut these engines' annual emissions of nitrogen oxide, a key ingredient in smog, by 80 percent and fine particulate matter, or soot, by 90 percent. EPA officials estimated that by 2030 the health benefits associated with the new standards will outweigh the costs by 20 to 1, preventing 1,500 premature deaths and 1,100 hospitalizations a year. 'By tackling the greatest remaining source of diesel emissions, we're keeping our nation's clean-air progress moving full steam ahead,' EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson told reporters in a telephone news conference yesterday." According to the Post, "Environmentalists praised the administration's decision."

The New York Times (3/3, A12, Barringer, 1.16M) reports Johnson "said environmentalists, engine manufacturers like General Electric and railroads like CSX had widely differing opinions about the standard. 'Some were concerned about technology not being available in the time frames we were talking about,' Mr. Johnson said. 'Others believed it would be.' … Frank O'Donnell, president of Clean Air Watch, said the proposed rules were 'the final frontier when it comes to the really big sources of pollution.'"

Administration Report On Anticipated Emissions Levels Draws Criticism. The New York Times (3/3, A1, Revkin, 1.16M) reports the Bush administration "estimates that emissions by the United States of gases that contribute to global warming will grow nearly as fast through the next decade as they did the previous decade, according to a long-delayed report being completed for the United Nations. The document, the United States Climate Action Report, emphasizes that the projections show progress toward a goal Mr. Bush laid out in a 2002 speech: that emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases grow at a slower rate than the economy. … Kristen A. Hellmer, a spokeswoman for the White House on environmental matters, said on Friday, 'The Climate Action Report will show that the president's portfolio of actions addressing climate change and his unparalleled financial commitments are working.' But when shown the report, an assortment of experts on climate trends and policy described the projected emissions as unacceptable given the rising evidence of risks from unabated global warming."

Pelosi Seeks "Greening" Of Capitol Hill Buildings. The Washington Times (3/3, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Congressional Democrats "called for the 'greening' of buildings on Capitol Hill, saying politicians have the responsibility to preserve the planet." Speaker Nancy Pelosi and "other top Democrats" wrote a letter "to the chief administrative officer of the House asking him to embark on a 'Green the Capitol' initiative. 'The Capitol complex should lead the nation in preserving our planet for future generations,' the Democrats wrote to Daniel P. Beard yesterday. … The Democrats asked Mr. Beard to provide them with a preliminary report by April 30 and a final report by June 30 on ways to conserve energy inside the Capitol and its adjoining congressional offices."

DOJ_NMG_0140077

Congress Credited With Inducing Industries To Support Carbon Caps. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A7, Timiraos, 2.04M) reports, "A growing number of businesses are calling for federal caps on greenhouse-gases, which could spur Congress to action. … In the past few weeks, three industry trade groups that have long fought such regulation, the Edison Electric Institute, the American Gas Association and the Electric Power Supply Association, dropped their opposition to a cap. That coincided with calls for an emissions cap by the two private-equity firms bidding for Texas utility TXU Corp. Earlier this year, 10 corporations, including Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and General Electric Co., announced their support for mandatory curbs on greenhouse gases. The shift underscores a growing belief that Congress eventually will pass mandatory emissions caps. Many business leaders have concluded it would be better for it to happen now rather than later, eliminating the current uncertainty. Moreover, they fear absent federal government action they'll be left to deal with a patchwork of state regulations. And they believe that by endorsing emissions caps, they'll be given a seat at the table in the negotiations over how such a cap would work."

WSJournal Questions Corporations' Motives For Embracing "Cap-And-Trade." The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A8, 2.04M) editorializes, "There's no market here unless the government creates one, and who has the profit opportunity depends entirely on who the government picks as the winners and the losers in designing this market in the first place. So it's no wonder that almost any business that has ever put an ounce of CO2 into the atmosphere is rushing to show its cap-and-trade bona fides. … The emerging alliance of business and environmental special interests may well prove powerful enough to give us cap-and-trade in CO2. It would make Hollywood elites feel virtuous, and it would make money for some very large corporations. But don't believe for a minute that this charade would do much about global warming."

NYTimes Highlights New Research On Drought Cycles In Southwest. The New York Times (3/3, A14, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "In the American Southwest, climatologists have found a surprisingly detailed record of weather patterns — especially patterns of moisture — in tree rings that show that prolonged periods of drought there are normal. Those findings immediately raise questions about how water is being used in the Southwest, and particularly about the Colorado River Compact, the 1922 legal agreement that governs water distribution in the vast Colorado River basin."

Judge Keeps Divine Strike Legal Issues Alive. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/3, Rogers) reports, "Plans for the massive non-nuclear Divine Strake blast at the Nevada Test Site are dead but legal issues surrounding the controversial bunker-buster experiment were resurrected Friday." The Review-Journal continues, "Eight days after a Pentagon agency canceled its plans for the Divine Strake detonation, Senior U.S. District Judge Lloyd George scheduled a status report for April 30. … George anticipates that motions will be filed by U.S. attorneys who want to dismiss a case by downwinders and some members of the Winnemucca Indian Colony challenging the test." The Review-Journal adds, "Opponents fear that the government will conduct smaller blasts that, while not as large as Divine Strake, could still stir up potentially deadly radioactive dust that lies on the ground of the test site and could be blown to their homes. … The opponents' lawyer, Robert Hager, of Reno, wants to keep the case alive by forcing the government to formally define the smaller scale "confirmatory" experiments that a Pentagon agency has said it intends to conduct in lieu of Divine Strake's cancellation. … In his words, George decided to 'keep it on the calendar so we can finally conclude this matter with satisfaction to everyone.' … 'You file whatever motions you choose to file,' he told Hager and Justice Department attorney Caroline Blanco, who presented their respective positions in a conference call at the Lloyd George U.S. Courthouse, named after the judge. … Referring to a Feb. 22 press release from the Defense Threat Reduction Agency canceling the test amid widespread opposition from downwinders and some politicians in Nevada, Utah and Idaho, Hager said he doesn't understand what agency director James Tegnelia meant by 'confirmatory experiments at a much smaller scale" will instead be conducted.'"

Anadarko Revives Suit Over Royalties. The New York Times (3/3, Andrews) reports, "One of the nation's biggest oil producers in the Gulf of Mexico is pressing ahead with a lawsuit that could, if successful, allow energy companies to avoid as much as $60 billion in royalties to the government over the next two decades." The Times continues, "Anadarko Petroleum, based in Houston, is suing the Interior Department to overturn regulations that force companies that drill in publicly owned waters to pay full royalties on oil and gas they produce during times of high energy prices." The Times adds, "Anadarko, which earned $4.8 billion in profit last year on sales of $10.2 billion, is arguing that Congress guaranteed oil companies a special incentive for drilling in deep water under which the companies could avoid paying the standard royalty on much of what they produced in the Gulf of Mexico. The Interior Department has adamantly argued that the incentives were never supposed to apply when oil prices climbed above about $34 a barrel. … The suit itself was filed a year ago by the Kerr-McGee Oil and Gas Corporation, which Anadarko acquired last year for $21 billion. But Anadarko put the suit on hold last year and began court-supervised mediation talks with the Interior Department." The Times notes, "On Thursday, a federal judge in Louisiana, Patricia Minaldi, declared that the mediation talks had failed and ordered both sides to start filing arguments in late May. The failure of the mediation poses a major problem for the Bush administration, which is already trying to prevent the loss of $10 billion in royalties as a result of a huge leasing error made during the Clinton administration. … If Anadarko is successful, the government would lose many more times that. The Government Accountability Office, the Congressional watchdog agency, estimated in January that the government would lose about $60 billion over 25 years. … The federal government leases millions of acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas producers. Companies are required to pay a royalty of 12 to 16 percent of their sales from the leases, but the government also offers royalty holidays as an incentive for deepwater drilling. …. The Interior Department contends that companies are not entitled to such royalty relief if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel, as they have for the last three years. … But Anadarko, in its lawsuit, argued that Congress never authorized that kind of restriction and had 'guaranteed' the incentives for any leases signed from 1996 through 2000."

DOJ_NMG_0140078

Evangelical Leaders Condemn Peer For Global Warming Activism. The Washington Post (3/3, A4, Cooperman, 690K) reports Focus on the Family's James Dobson and "other conservative Christian leaders" are calling on the National Association of Evangelicals "to silence or fire an official who has urged evangelicals to take global warming seriously. In a letter this week to the board of the NAE…Dobson and his two dozen co-signers said the Rev. Richard Cizik, the NAE's vice president for government relations, has waged a 'relentless campaign' that is 'dividing and demoralizing' evangelicals." The NAE's president, the Rev. Leith Anderson, "defended Cizik as 'a great asset.' He also said that the Dobson letter was released to the news media before it was received by the board. 'I guess that says it all,' he said."

The New York Times (3/3, A9, Goodstein, 1.16M) reports that Dobson's co-signers include Gary Bauer, president of Coalitions for America; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council; and Paul Weyrich, a longtime political strategist who is chairman of American Values. The Times goes on to report that Evangelicals "have recently become a significant voice in the chorus on global warming. Last year more than 100 prominent pastors, theologians and college presidents signed an 'Evangelical Climate Initiative' calling for action on the issue. Among the signers were several board members of the National Association of Evangelicals."

DOE Routinely Misses Efficiency Standards Deadlines, GAO Finds. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Hotz, 850K) reports, "Over the last three decades, the federal government has missed legal deadlines for setting stricter efficiency standards for common appliances, resulting in billions of dollars in higher utility bills and millions more tons of the greenhouse gases that fuel global warming, congressional investigators reported. All told, the Department of Energy has missed every one of 34 mandatory rule-making deadlines for setting minimum energy efficiency standards…analysts at the Government Accountability Office reported. The delays ranged from a few months to 15 years, according to the GAO report made public this week."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Faces Questions Over California Anti-Gang Funding. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Mcgreevy) reports, "After huddling with visiting U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales on efforts to keep kids out of gangs, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said Friday that the city would increase dramatically the number of jobs offered to young people this year, to 10,000 — four times the number provided two years ago." The Times continues, "The mayor announced the increase after he and Gonzales toured a silk-screening plant run by Homeboy Industries in South Los Angeles. … The nonprofit group, which received a $650,000 federal grant, hires former gang members who are trying to lead law-abiding lives. … 'Young people, when they feel there are no options, when there are no job opportunities, when they don't have the skills to make it, they lose hope,' Villaraigosa said. 'We are both committed to the idea that in a great and beautiful country like America we can invest in young people, that we have to address the issues of prevention and intervention.' … However, Gonzales' agency faced criticism from one city official Friday for delays in delivering on past promises." The Times notes, "The attorney general had been in Los Angeles nearly a year ago to announce a separate $2.5-million federal grant for gang intervention, suppression and prevention programs in South Los Angeles, but officials conceded recently that the money has not yet gone out to local programs. … 'We have waited too long for federal dollars that were promised almost a year ago,' said Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents the area. … 'We know that money is voted for, appropriated and spent much quicker on the war on Iraq. This war on gangs is no less urgent,' she said. … George Cardona of the U.S. attorney's office said federal officials had been meeting with community leaders to discuss the best way to spend the money. He added that the first installment of the funds probably will arrive before May. … Gonzales had been in Los Angeles last March to announce that the city was one of six awarded Justice Department grants, each consisting of $1 million earmarked for gang prevention, $1 million devoted to law enforcement and $500,000 to provide transitional housing and job placement help for released convicts. … Gonzales had said at the time that the money would be focused on a section of South Los Angeles that includes the Imperial Courts, Nickerson Gardens and Jordan Downs housing projects. … 'I don't know the specifics,' Gonzales said Friday when asked about the money. 'The way these things work is that we expect the state and local communities to develop a plan, hopefully an innovative plan that is focused on the needs of the community.'"

WTimes Praises DEA For Busting Mexican Drug Ring. In its "Nobles And Knave" editorial column, the Washington Times (3/3) praises the Drug Enforcement Agency "for busting a major Mexican drug-trafficking ring. … DEA agents arrested 66 persons on Wednesday, bringing the total number for their 20-month investigation of the Victor Emilio Cazares-Gastellum (also known as Victor Emilio Cazares-Salazar) drug-trafficking empire to 400. Agents seized more than 18 tons of marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine and heroin, along with $45.2 million and various weapons and vehicles, according to the DEA Web site." The Times adds, "The Mexico-based group would smuggle the narcotics from Colombia and Venezuela through Mexico, then into the United States via points along the Southwest border. They even "built a bridge made of sandbags across the Colorado river near Yuma, Az., which allowed them to simply drive across the waterway," ABC News reported. Once in the United States, the drugs would be distributed to U.S. cells scattered across the country. … The investigation, known as 'Operation Imperial Emperor,' was led by the DEA but included the FBI, ICE and the IRS, among others. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has praised the officers and agents for working together 'against a common foe.' DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy said Wednesday that 'we ripped out this empire's U.S. infrastructure from its commanders and transportation coordinators to its local distribution cells across the country ... and tossed it in the dustbin of history.' … For keeping 18 tons of illegal drugs out of the United States, the DEA is the Noble of the week."

Authorities Find Million Rounds Of Ammo At Southern California Fire. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Abrams) reports, "Firefighters responding to a house fire in a Norco (CA) neighborhood were greeted with a dangerous surprise: gunfire. Lots of it." The Times continues, "Authorities on Thursday found a cache containing more than 1 million rounds of ammunition and 75 firearms, ranging from small handguns to assault rifles, throughout the burning home and in a shaft and tunnel under the garage. … The firefighters realized the stockpile was inside when rounds started going off. No injuries were reported. … 'The Fire Department knew exactly what was going on when they heard the sounds,' said Riverside County Sheriff's Sgt. Dennis Gutierrez." The Times adds, "The stockpile of ammunition is probably the largest ever confiscated in Riverside County, said Gutierrez. … A neighbor reported the fire Thursday afternoon and had dragged the homeowner, whom deputies did not identify, from the house, Gutierrez said. … Authorities are checking the serial numbers of the remaining firearms. … 'He could have gotten them from anywhere — a reputable gun store or a shooting range, but who knows?' said Susan Raichel, spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives."

DOJ_NMG_0140080

The Contra Costa Times (3/3, Flaccus) reports, "The day after the fire, an incongruous scene played out in the windy hilltop neighborhood of older middle-class tract homes set against a backdrop of the snow-capped San Bernardino Mountains -- part of a quiet semirural community that bills itself as 'Horsetown USA.' … Riverside County sheriff's deputies and federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents carried charred boxes and pieces of furniture out of the house, stacked numerous boxes of ammunition in the driveway and examined seized rifles." The Times adds, "Two weapons were assault rifles that were illegal, and the man had no permit for 75 pounds of black gunpowder that was found, said sheriff's deputy Juan Zamora. … The tunnel, stretching from an entry in the garage 8 to 10 feet into the backyard, yielded three 25-gallon containers of fluid that was being analyzed by hazardous material experts, said Norco fire Battalion Chief Ron Knueven."

The AP (3/3) reports, "On Friday, sheriff's deputies and agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives combed the house for evidence. … Dozens of metal and cardboard boxes filled with ammunition for shotguns, small handguns and assault rifles sat in a driveway. Two of the assault rifles were illegal, Zamora said. … The man had no permit for 75 pounds of black gunpowder that was also recovered, Zamora said. … No arrests had been made. The man, whose identity was not released, was taken to a hospital where he will receive a psychological evaluation, Zamora said."

Hundreds Of Guns Tied To Ohio Police Officer. The AP (3/3, Cohen) reports from Columbus, OH, "There were 501 guns in all, the government says - revolvers and pistols, Glocks and Rugers, a few rifles, too, a giant cache of firearms suitable for sport or self-protection. … Or felonies. … Or terrorism." The AP continues, "Five hundred one guns, tied to one man - 35-year-old Mark Nelson, a former Columbus cop who masterminded a conspiracy that flooded the streets with weapons. … Nelson insists he didn't knowingly do anything wrong. But prosecutors say he enlisted his family and others (including a drug dealer) to illegally acquire 501 guns, then directly - or indirectly - sold many of them. And soon after - within days, in a few cases - some of these guns began turning up in the wrong hands and the wrong places:" The AP adds, "A Raven Arms .25-caliber pistol used in a Brooklyn, N.Y., shooting. A Ruger 9 mm handgun found on a man charged with crack possession in Washington, D.C. A Smith & Wesson .40-caliber pistol recovered in Youngstown, Ohio, in a car driven by a man inexplicably wearing a bulletproof vest and carrying a winter face mask - in May. … It's all part of the shadowy world of gun trafficking, where lies, stealth and cold cash make it alarmingly easy for deadly weapons to be bought and sold - and surface days, months, even years later in crimes. … This is the story of how one trafficking case unfolded and how a handful of people, bogus paperwork, the lure of a profit and the constant demand for weapons combined for a black-market scheme that could haunt investigators for decades. More than 300 guns remain missing."

Washington ATF Center Curbing Crime Through Gun Tracking. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (3/3, Gutierrez) reports, "When a corroded 9 mm handgun surfaced last year in a brushy West Seattle yard, police suspected it had been used nearby to kill a 14-year-old boy three years earlier. … But they needed proof." The P-I continues, "Using the gun's serial number, they traced it through the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to a man who had bought it from a licensed gun dealer. That man turned out to be related to Demeko B. Holland, who police already considered a main suspect. … Information from the gun trace, which helped lead to a first-degree murder charge against Holland, is collected in the ATF's database. That database, with its lists of crime guns, suspects and firearms dealers, is central to the ATF's Regional Crime Gun Center, which opened last August in Seattle." The P-I adds, "The center is a clearinghouse for weapons that city and state police recover at crime scenes, or simply find in the streets. Its main purpose is to identify trafficking, and to determine how suspected criminals, especially felons such as Holland, get their weapons. … It's also helped identify some key trends in Washington. … One of those is that the state has become a leading source for guns being used in crimes in Western Canada, which has far more restrictive gun laws than the U.S. … 'If you purchase a gun here in Washington for $100, you could sell that for $300 in Canada -- that's U.S. not Canadian (dollars),' said supervisory special ATF agent Doug Krough. … Local police hope the center also will help curb a recent rise in gun violence in the Seattle metro area."

DOJ_NMG_0140081

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Reform Seen As Necessary To Combat Farm Labor Shortage. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (3/3, 850K), David Mas Masumoto, an organic farmer and fellow at the Kellogg Foundation, writes, "Last year, pears in California rotted on trees; two years ago, my raisin harvest was endangered, and for the last three years, I've struggled with peach harvests, terrified that just as the fruit was at the peak of perfection, I wouldn't have enough workers. … The agricultural industry supports federal legislation for a guest-worker program that would bring in temporary farm laborers when shortages arise. This remedy would fix short-term problems. However, a long-term solution lies in immigration reform that could change the nature of farming, especially when it comes to specialty crops and small-scale operations like mine. Without sufficient labor, organic and sustainable agricultural methods are jeopardized."

TAX:

IRS Audits Marriott's ESOP-Related Deductions. The Washington Post (3/3, D6) reports, "The Internal Revenue Service is auditing Marriott International's federal tax returns for fiscal 2000 through 2002 over $1 billion in deductions the hotel chain took related to its employee stock-ownership plan." The Post continues, "Bethesda-based Marriott said it received 'notices of proposed adjustment' from the IRS on Thursday that challenged most of the federal income tax deductions related to the plan, and the government agency proposed 'substantial excise taxes and penalties.' … 'We believe the IRS' proposed adjustments are incorrect, intend to vigorously defend our positions and are examining various procedural alternatives for resolution of this matter,' Marriott said in a filing yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Post adds, "Thomas Marder, a spokesman for the company, said he couldn't provide guidance on the size of the proposed adjustment. When asked if the situation could significantly affect Marriott's bottom line, he referred to a regulatory filing from late last month, which came before the company received the proposed adjustment notice and said no material impact was expected. … He also said companies have used this type of tax transaction for more than 30 years." The Post notes, "The IRS is reviewing the ESOP feature of the company's 'Employees' Profit Sharing, Retirement and Savings Plan and Trust' implemented on June 13, 2000."

Michigan Man Arrested In Tax-Evasion Scheme. The Battle Creek (MI) Enquirer (3/3) reports, "U.S. Marshals on Thursday arrested Charles Conces of Battle Creek, the Justice Department announced." The Enquirer continues, "The arrest resulted from a federal judge's Feb. 23 order finding Conces in civil contempt of court for failing to obey a court order entered on Feb. 8. … Conces, who lives in Pennfield Township, has run for Michigan attorney general and secretary of state as a member of the U.S. Taxpayers Party and has staged public protests against county judges outside the Calhoun County courthouse in Battle Creek." The Enquirer adds, "The Feb. 8 order compelled Conces to disclose to the government the identities of certain persons for whom he drafted or provided advice regarding federal income taxes, the identities of the persons who are responsible for his Web site, and all documents that he drafted or assisted in drafting for these persons no later than Feb. 16. … Conces refused to disclose the identities and documents as ordered by the court. … On Feb. 23, the court held Conces in civil contempt and ordered him to report to the U.S. Marshal no later than noon on March 1, 2007. Conces reported to the U.S. Marshals and was taken into custody. According to the court's Feb. 23 order, Conces will remain in the custody of the U.S. Marshals until he complies with the order to disclose these identities and documents. … 'The Justice Department is not only committed to shutting down the tax scams that cheat the federal treasury and the taxpayers who pay into it, but also ensuring that such tax scams do not resurface later,' said Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the federal Justice Department's Tax Division, in a press release."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Secretary Ousted In Wake Of Walter Reed Scandal. Secretary of the Army Francis Harvey became the second top official to abruptly leave office in the wake of the scandal over conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. The story led two of the three broadcast network newscasts Friday night, with ABC, CBS, and NBC devoting a combined nine minutes to the subject. Television and print reports make it clear that both President Bush and

DOJ_NMG_0140082

Defense Secretary Robert Gates are furious over the conditions at Walter Reed and the Army's response. The CBS Evening News (3/2, story 2, 1:00, Couric, 7.66M) said Bush "is very angry about all of this," with correspondent Jim Axelrod adding, "A former Pentagon official close to the situation says the President is so angry, quote, 'His hair is on fire.'"

ABC World News (3/2, story 6, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that the "major shakeup at the Pentagon" comes following the revelation of "outrageous conditions" at Walter Reed. Bush "ordered a sweeping review of the medical care provided to all veterans and wounded troops." ABC (Karl): "Defense Secretary Robert Gates left no doubt" why Harvey "is out." Gates: "I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed." Karl: "Pentagon officials say Gates was upset by how the Army responded to the squalid conditions exposed by the Washington Post, which found some injured soldiers living in a building infested with mold, mice and cockroaches. Gates was said to be especially irritated when the Army named Kevin Kiley yesterday as the temporary commanding general at Walter Reed. Kiley had dismissed the Washington Post story as one-sided and inaccurate. Today, after only one day on the job, Kiley was replaced by Major General Eric R. Schoomaker." President Bush will "use his radio address to announce the thorough review of all medical facilities serving active-duty military personnel and veterans." Bush: "This is unacceptable to me, it is unacceptable to our country, and it's not going to continue." The CBS Evening News (3/2, story 2, 1:00, Axelrod, 7.66M) said that on the day the story broke, President Bush "told Gates to, quote, 'Fix it,' but the decision to fire the Secretary of the Army was apparently made by Gates, not the President. Still, the White House is well aware of the PR nightmare that it faces. The last thing this Administration can afford is another Katrina."

The CBS Evening News (3/2, lead story, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) called Harvey "another casualty of the Walter Reed scandal" as the President "promises an investigation of conditions at military hospitals everywhere. … Firing the general in charge of the Army hospital did not end the national outcry over the shoddy conditions there, not after the Secretary of the Army replaced that general with another one who was just as deeply involved in the scandal. The outcry just got louder today, and tonight the secretary of the Army got the boot." CBS (Martin) said, "Fed up with what he considered the Army's indifferent reaction to the scandal," Gates "demanded and got the resignation of the secretary of the Army. Then he publicly read the Army the riot act." Gates: "I am disappointed that some in the Army have not adequately appreciated the seriousness of the situation pertaining to outpatient care at Walter Reed. Some have shown too much defensiveness and have not shown enough focus on digging into and addressing the problems." Martin: "Gates' swift sword was immediately cheered by veterans' organizations." Paul Rieckhoff, Iraq-Afghanistan Veterans Of America: "We see massive and catastrophic leadership failures, and it's good to see people being held accountable. And I think it should also illustrate to people that this is a problem that extends beyond Walter Reed."

NBC Nightly News (3/2, lead story, 3:00, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said that "from the very day this scandal broke," Gates "has been demanding accountability and today he got it. Gates himself made the announcement in the Pentagon briefing room." NBC also says Gates saw Kiley "as part of the problem," and "reportedly felt the army's decision to put Kiley back in charge showed a lack of judgment that led to today's firing of Harvey." But Senate Armed Forces Committee member Jack Reed said "the bigger problem is that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have produced so many wounded soldiers, Walter Reed was simply overwhelmed." Reed: "We're assessing responsibility. Now we've got to fix the problem and the problem is more resources in terms of personnel for Walter Reed."

The Washington Post (3/3, Abramowitz, Vogel, 690K) says in its front page report that Harvey was "fired," reporting that the Bush Administration "scrambled to contain fallout from the scandal." Kiley's selection "had angered soldiers and family groups -- and, more important, Gates -- because of their belief that he had been aware of problems at the hospital and done little to address them." Friday's events "highlighted the anger at the highest levels of the administration over the problems at Walter Reed, as well as the political danger for the White House. Veterans groups remain among the few strong supporters of the war." BBC.com (3/2) says "America's wounded veterans are regarded by most people in the country as truly heroic, so the fall-out has been considerable."

On its front page, the New York Times (3/3, A1, Cloud, 1.16M) says Gates was "grim-faced" in announcing Harvey's "dismissal," adding that "Gates's aggressiveness in addressing the problem has surprised many Pentagon officials who are still getting used to his style more than two months into his service. ... The scandal at Walter Reed is particularly embarrassing to the administration because many top officials have visited injured troops there." An anonymous Pentagon official said that Gates thought that Kiley's comments earlier "demonstrated a certain insensitivity" and that Gates would have accepted "almost anybody but Kiley" as temporary commander. The Chicago Tribune (3/3, Madhani, Biemer, 617K) also says Gates was unable to accept the Kiley appointment.

DOJ_NMG_0140083

McClatchy (3/3, Hutcheson, Adams) says Gates "blamed the problems on Walter Reed's leadership, not its doctors, nurses and other health-care workers." The AP (3/3, Burns) calls it the "most dramatic move in an escalating removal of officials." Harvey "said he offered Gates his resignation because he believed the Army let the wounded soldiers down. ... His last day in the job will be March 9." CNN.com (3/2) says Gates "accepted no questions after his announcement, and didn't explain why Harvey resigned."

Gates Response Said To Differ From Rumsfeld Precedents. The Washington Post (3/3, A8, Ricks, Tyson, 690K) writes that "Harvey's firing sent a strong message across the top of the military establishment that the new Pentagon chief, though a newcomer to the world of defense, would not be a passive manager and would hold senior leaders accountable for their actions." The Post contrasts Gates with former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, saying that while Gates "did not explicitly mention his predecessor, the new defense secretary's approach" has contrasted with the way the Rumsfeld Pentagon "handled allegations of wrongdoing. In the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, Pentagon officials were quick to point the finger at low-ranking soldiers, and only one officer who worked at the prison has faced court proceedings, even after numerous investigations found high-level problems with interrogation policies." Along similar lines, the Los Angeles Times (3/3, Barnes, 850K) reports, "Military officers said the swift response by Gates and his willingness to move against top Army commanders and civilians was partly meant to differentiate him" from Rumsfeld.

Bush Urges Congress To Avoid "Watering Down" NCLB. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports President Bush "urged Congress to avoid broad changes" to the No Child Left Behind Act, saying Friday that "'watering down'…the Act 'would be doing thousands of children a disservice.' 'It's working,' Bush said. 'We can change parts of it for the better, but don't change the core of a piece of good legislation that's making a significant difference in the lives of a lot of children.'" Bush "spoke to a crowd in the gymnasium of an elementary school in New Albany, Ind." According to the Times, the president "has not said what changes he would accept. But he opposes relaxing testing requirements or requiring a national test to replace state exams. He said Friday that he also favored speeding up the process through which parents learn about a school's test results to make it easier for them to decide whether to seek additional help for their children."

Bush Aides Sought Ejection Of Attendees At 2005 Event. The Washington Post (3/3, A7, 690K) reports, "A volunteer said Friday that he was acting on orders from White House staffers when he helped eject three people from a taxpayer-funded event President Bush was attending, according to the man's attorney. The volunteer, Michael Casper, said in a deposition that two White House employees told him to throw out the three after Casper saw them behaving suspiciously, lawyer Sean R. Gallagher said. Casper named the White House employees as Steven A. Atkiss, deputy director for travel, and Jamie O'Keefe, lead advance staffer for the 2005 event, Gallagher said. … Leslie Weise and Alex Young, two of the three people who were thrown out, filed a federal lawsuit against Casper and Jay Bob Klinkerman, both volunteers with the event's host committee."

Justice Thomas Uses Rare Interview To Criticize Media. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Savage, 850K) reports that in a "rare interview," Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas "bitterly rejected the idea that he benefited from affirmative action because he was black. 'That was the creation of the politicians, the people with a lot of mouth and nothing to say, and your industry,' Thomas told a writer for Business Week magazine. 'Everything becomes affirmative action.' … Thomas expressed disdain for the news media several times during the interview. 'One of the reasons I don't do media interviews is, in the past, the media often has its own script,' he said. 'The media, unfortunately, have been universally untrustworthy because they have their own notions of what I should think or I should do.'"

Livermore Chosen To Develop New Nuclear Warhead. The Washington Post (3/3, A8, Pincus, 690K) reports the National Nuclear Security Administration "has selected a design from Lawrence Livermore and Sandia national laboratories that could become the basis for the first new nuclear warhead produced by the United States in more than 20 years. The purpose of the new Reliable Replacement Warhead is to provide, beginning in 2012, a new generation of secure nuclear warheads -- initially for submarine-launched missiles -- that would provide a credible deterrent well into the mid-21st century."

DOJ_NMG_0140084

The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Vartabedian, 850K) reports the Bush administration "said the program would improve the U.S. stockpile's reliability, security and safety and would allow for a reduction in the thousands of weapons held in reserve for a potential war. Critics reacted sharply, saying the program sent the wrong international message when the U.S. was trying to stop the spread of nuclear weapons. Key members of Congress said the program was moving too fast. 'I have serious concerns with the process leading up to today's announcement, and with the priorities of the Department of Energy,' said Rep. Peter J. Visclosky (D-Ind.), chairman of the appropriations subcommittee that would pay for the program."

The San Francisco Chronicle (3/3, A1, Sterngold, 384K) reports the Energy and Defense departments "have chosen the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory to design the country's first new nuclear warhead since the Cold War, giving the Bay Area institution the central role in a program that could involve billions of dollars. The decision, announced Friday, was a clear victory for Livermore, which bested its storied sister lab, the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico, in a competition to lead the research." The AP (3/2, Hebert) reports, "One of the assurances given by defense officials to Congress is that the new warhead will not have to undergo actual testing." BBC.com (3/3) reports, "Critics have complained it sends the wrong signal at a time when the White House is leading efforts to curb Iran and North Korea's nuclear ambitions."

NYTimes Urges Pelosi To Institute Independent Ethics Oversight. The New York Times (3/3, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "As the House's special task force considers whether Congress needs an outside monitoring panel to help enforce stronger integrity standards, we suggest that it start with an in-depth briefing on the Abramoff-Ney downfall — complete with cash-flow charts and poll data on how the scandal has tainted the public's view of lawmakers. … The Democratic Senate has already run away from a proposed integrity office. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, deserves credit for ordering consideration of the sensitive subject of an outside watchdog. But the study group must not be shrouded in secrecy nor its work be allowed to drag on beyond May 1. For all the tenderness of the task, lawmakers should focus on where and how Mr. Ney went wrong and try to ensure that it does not happen again."

Ornstein Says Congressional Leaders Should Not Be In Presidential Succession Line. In a Washington Post (3/3, A15, 690K) op-ed, Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute, senior counselor to the Continuity of Government Commission, considers whether the Speaker of the House should "even be in the line of succession" to the presidency. Ornstein details several constitutional flaws in a line of succession that goes through Congress, but says "having congressional leaders in the presidential line of succession is wrong for more than constitutional reasons." Congressional leaders frequently "are of the opposite party and viewpoint of a president; if a president and vice president were to die at the beginning of a term, the country would have four years of a president representing the opposite of what it voted for," and "congressional leaders have a built-in conflict of interest," since they can impeach and remove those above them in the succession line. Ornstein says a "better option would be to include top Cabinet members, such as the secretaries of State, Treasury and Defense, and then allow a president to designate several others -- all requiring Senate confirmation."

OTHER NEWS:

Wall Street Staggers To End Of Dow's Worst Week In Four Years. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, B1, McKay, 2.04M) reports on the end of "a tough week" on Wall Street that saw the Dow Jones drop 4.2%, "the biggest weekly percentage drop since March 2003, ending at 12114.10. The blue-chip average is now off 2.8% this year and more than 670 points below its record close less than three weeks ago." On Friday, "the market's newfound volatility remained on full display. The Dow opened lower, rose to show a gain of more than 13 points prior to midday, but finished near its intraday lows. In the end, the Dow stumbled 120.24 points, or 1%, on the day." The S&P 500 "fell 1.1% Friday, or 16.00 points, to 1387.17, off 4.4% on the week and down 2.2% this year," while the Nasdaq "shed 1.5%, or 36.21 points," and "is now down 2% in 2007."

DOJ_NMG_0140085

The Washington Post (3/3, D1, Tse, 690K) headlines its report "Dow Ends Its Worst Week Since 2003," and the AP (3/2, Paradis) also says it was the "worst week in over four years." ABC World News (3/2, story 8, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) NBC Nightly News (3/2, story 5, :15, Brown, 9.87M) briefly reported on the numbers.

The Financial Times (3/3, Brown-Humes, Davies, Beales) says the "turbulent week…more than eradicated all this year's gains, leaving investors on edge over the outlook for next week." The New York Times (3/3, C6, Peters, 1.16M) says "s investors and economists look to the week ahead, they see signs of encouragement but also some uncertainty about what could happen. Starting with a survey on the strength of the service sector on Monday and ending with the Labor Department's monthly employment report, investors will have a buffet of data to soothe or fray their nerves." The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A2, Whitehouse, 2.04M) also says investors "will get something big to chew on" in the form of the employment report.

Crude Oil Ends Week At $61.64 Per Barrel. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, B4, Chambers, 2.04M) reports, "The crude-oil futures market, which usually has an inverse price influence on shares, is closely eyeing U.S. stocks, as traders log their concern over the damage a slowdown in U.S. and Chinese growth could do to oil demand." Crude ended the week in New York "just 50 cents, or less than 1%, higher at $61.64 a barrel."

Bernanke Says Globalization May Have Increased US Inflation. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A4, Ip, 2.04M) reports that in remarks "prepared for delivery Friday night to the Stanford Institute for Economic Policy Research in California," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said globalization "hasn't had a significant impact on reducing inflation in the U.S. and may have raised it."

New Jersey Jury Delivers Split Verdict In Vioxx Trial. The Wall Street Journal (3/3, A4, Tesoriero) reports, "A New Jersey state court jury delivered a split verdict in the first phase of the latest Vioxx trial, finding that Merck & Co. adequately warned doctors of the drug's heart-attack risks in the case of one plaintiff but not of another." The Journal continues, "The eight-person jury found that in the case of both plaintiffs the drug maker violated a state consumer-protection statute by misrepresenting the drug's cardiovascular risks in marketing. … The case of Frederick 'Mike' Humeston, 61 years old, of Boise, Idaho, now will move into a second phase to determine whether or not Vioxx was a cause of his heart attack -- and what damages, if any, should be awarded. … Mr. Humeston's case was tried previously in 2005, and Merck prevailed. New Jersey Superior Court Judge Carol Higbee later ordered a new trial after new evidence emerged." The Journal adds, "The other plaintiff in this trial, Kathleen Messerschmidt, sued Merck over the fatal heart attack of her brother, Brian Hermans, who died on Sept. 15, 2002. The Vioxx label was changed to include further cardiovascular risk information in April 2002, making it harder to prove that Mr. Hermans was the victim of a failure on Merck's part to warn doctors. But the jury will now hear evidence to determine whether damages for consumer fraud should be awarded to Ms. Messerschmidt. … Merck withdrew Vioxx from the market in September 2004 following a study that linked the drug to an increased risk of heart attacks and stroke. The company has been hit with some 28,000 lawsuits and has said it intends to fight each case. Since the first trial in the summer of 2005, the Whitehouse Station, N.J., company has won eight trials and lost four."

Bush Raises $2.1 Million For McConnell, NRSC. The Washington Post (3/3, A6, Fletcher, 690K) reports President Bush headlined a Louisville fundraiser for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell and the National Republican Senatorial Committee netting $2.1 million. Organizers "called it the largest fundraiser in state history. … The event was the second GOP fundraiser in a week for Bush, who continues to be a major Republican draw despite his dismal approval ratings. On Monday, he spoke at a Washington event that raised $10.4 million for the Republican Governors Association."

Surveys Of Party Committee Members Give Clinton, Romney The Leads. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Barabak, 850K) reports on its front page that Sen. Hillary Clinton and Mitt Romney "have emerged as the leading presidential favorites among party insiders, according to a new Los Angeles Times Poll, which found deep partisan divisions over the country's direction and top issues in the 2008 campaign." The survey showed John Edwards "in second place among Democratic Party leaders, ahead of Sen. Barack Obama," and "pointed up danger signs for Sen. John McCain," who trailed Romney and Rudy Giuliani. It also

DOJ_NMG_0140086

"signaled GOP concerns about holding the White House for another four years -- 42% of party leaders said it would be tougher to elect a Republican after eight years under President Bush, and just over half said the GOP nominee should campaign on moving the country in a new direction." The survey of 133 of the 165 Republican National Committee members found Romney backed by 20%, with Giuliani 14%, McCain 10%, and Newt Gingrich 8%. And in a "potentially worrisome sign for McCain, just over 1 in 10 RNC members said they would not support him if he won the party's nomination." Among the 313 of 386 Democratic National Committee members surveyed, Clinton was backed by 20%, Edwards 15%, Obama 11%, Al Gore 10%, and Gov. Bill Richardson 9%.

Advertising, Money Look Like Keys To 2008. On its front page, the Washington Times (3/3, Dinan, 88K) looks at the "long-haul strategy for '08," saying that "with a giant set of primaries increasingly likely for Feb. 5, the 2008 nomination will depend far more on television ads, and candidates will need a large bank account to compete."

GOP Hopefuls Woo Conservatives At Annual CPAC Meeting. Reports from the annual Conservative Political Action Conference meeting in Washington cast the mood of the attendees as low, with Democrats in power on Capitol Hill and no clear-cut conservative in the upper tier of Republican presidential candidates. The Washington Post (3/3, A4, Kornblut, 690K) says that at a traditional card game between "a handful of icons of the American conservative movement," the "mood around the poker table could hardly have been more glum. 'Nothing focuses the mind like an impending hanging,' said longtime conservative fundraiser Richard A. Viguerie, paraphrasing the English essayist Samuel Johnson. 'And Republicans feel an impending hanging with Hillary looming on the horizon.'" And while the "possibility of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton as president was bad enough," even worse "is the absence of a Republican candidate to rally around." American Conservative Union Chairman David Keene said the "movement's leaders 'are all pretty much agreed that there is no clear conservative choice…or even an unclear conservative choice."

ABC World News (3/2, story 7, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported it was the "first important gathering of Republican Presidential candidates. … Some conservative Republicans said they are not sold on any frontrunners." The Politico (3/3, Martin) headlines its write-up "A Mood Of Gloom At CPAC."

The Washington Times (3/3, Hallow, Dinan, 88K) focuses its more-upbeat front-page report on the GOP hopefuls who did try to convince the crowd of their conservative credentials, leading by saying Mitt Romney "delivered a faultlessly tailored appeal to more than 1,000 grass-roots conservative activists hungry for a renewed commitment to limited government," standing out "from the pack of Republican presidential aspirants that included Rudolph W. Giuliani and Mike Huckabee by promising to end taxes on earnings from interest, dividends and capital gains, and to cap federal spending and veto every attempt to break that cap -- whether proposed by a Republican or Democratic Congress." Giuliani drew "nearly as much applause but not the repeated standing ovations Mr. Romney received" when he spoke.

The New York Times (3/3, A11, Nagourney, 1.16M) says Romney and Giuliani "approached the task" of winning over the conservatives "in similar ways: by presenting themselves as devotees of Ronald Reagan who had tamed Democratic excesses in their communities. Mr. Giuliani talked about cutting crime, welfare and taxes; Mr. Romney talked of cutting taxes and the size of government. Yet they parted company on how they dealt with the more difficult question of their positions on social issues." Romney "portrayed himself as someone who stood at the barricades as his state sought to permit same-sex marriage and to remove restrictions from abortion and stem cell research." Giuliani "made no mention of his support for gay rights, abortion rights and gun control. Instead, he suggested that he and his audience had many more agreements than disagreements." Gannett (3/3, Raasch) says Giuliani, quoting Reagan, "said 'an 80% friend is not your 20% enemy.' Invoking Reagan's optimism and applying it to the war on terrorism, he said victory was inevitable -- if difficult -- because 'the human soul and the human heart is moving in our direction.'"

The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) says "four GOP candidates with more solid conservative credentials but lesser national identities" -- Sen. Sam Brownback, Huckabee, Rep. Duncan Hunter, and Tom Tancredo -- also addressed the crowd. Sen. John McCain was "noticeably absent." McCain "has sought to overcome opposition from the party's conservative base that helped doom his campaign in 2000. But McCain has made little discernible headway among the activists at Friday's event and he skipped it to campaign in Utah and his home state." In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (3/3) writes that McCain "was at a Salt Lake City lunch Thursday and a Phoenix reception Friday." The Denver Post (3/3, Mulkern, 256K) reports on Tancredo's speech, in which he "said it's imperative to crack down on illegal immigration and reject 'the cult of multi-culturalism' that he says is destroying American values."

DOJ_NMG_0140087

The Los Angeles paper is alone among major dailies in mentioning in its main report that at the end of her speech, commentator "used a slur to refer to Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards." UPI (3/2) quotes Coulter saying, "It turns out you have to go into rehab if you use the word 'faggot,' so I'm kind of at an impasse -- I can't really talk about Edwards." The Washington Post (3/3, A2, 690K) does mention the comment in a Dana Milbank write-up that generally focuses on Romney.

McCain Wins Upset Victory In Spartanburg GOP Straw Poll. In an upset, Sen. John McCain "won a Spartanburg, South Carolina straw poll Friday, an early sign of how conservative South Carolinians might view the GOP presidential field," CNN.com (3/2, Mooney) reports. McCain received 164 votes, Rudy Giuliani 162, Rep. Duncan Hunter 158, Sen. Sam Brownback 85, Mitt Romney 80, Mike Huckabee 21, Rep. Tom Tancredo 10, John Cox 4, Rep. Ron Paul 4, Jim Gilmore 1, and Tommy Thompson 1. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice received two write-in votes. South Carolina's The State (3/3) writes that McCain "was third when tallying was suspended Thursday. But by Friday afternoon, McCain had leapt into first in the final vote."

Ridge Says McCain "Prepared To Lead." Former Homeland Security secretary and Pennsylvania governor Tom Ridge discussed his reasons for supporting McCain on MSNBC's Hardball (3/2, Matthews), saying, "I have always admired his courage, his conviction. He doesn't seek to curry favor. A lot of people may disagree with him. He and I disagreed from time to time on issues. But he's not judgmental about other people's point of view. I think from day one he is prepared to lead. He has been conditioned and informed based on his variety of experiences he has had as a soldier, as a prisoner of war, as a congressman, as a senator. I think he's well-respected around the world, not just in this country. And I think he is ready to lead from day one."

Giuliani's Children Absent From His Campaign So Far. The New York Times (3/3, A11, Buettner, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) reports that "as he embarks on a campaign for the presidency," Rudy Giuliani "is going forward without two people who once played supporting roles in his political life: his children, Andrew, 21, and Caroline, 17. Andrew Giuliani has been at his father's side in campaign commercials and inaugurations since he was a toddler, famously bounding across the stage in a rambunctious manner and mimicking his father's rhetorical flourishes during Mr. Giuliani's 1994 mayoral inauguration." But the candidate's relationship with his son "has grown strained and distant since his very public and bitter divorce from Andrew's mother, Donna Hanover, and his marriage to Judith Nathan," and a similar distance "appears to have developed between Mr. Giuliani and his daughter."

Fred Thompson Reportedly "Seriously Considering" Presidential Bid. Fox News (3/2, Cameron) reported, "The name of a new potential Republican presidential candidate surfaced today at the Conservative Political Action Conference in D.C. Amid some GOP dissatisfaction that the current field is not conservative enough, Fox News has learned Hollywood actor and former US Sen. Fred Thompson of Tennessee is seriously considering a run. He chaired the Senate Government Affairs Committee that investigated questionable Clinton campaign fundraising in the 1990's, rose to prominence as a GOP lawyer during the Watergate hearings, credited with urging lawmakers to ask the famous question, 'What did the President know and when did he know it?' Now he stars in the award-winning TV series 'Law and Order.' Supporters say Thompson has star power, and a consistently conservative record on such core issues as God, guns, gays, and abortion. Sources say no timetable for a decision has been set, but basic planning has begun in anticipation of an increasing conservative dissatisfaction with the GOP field and a Thompson candidacy."

Clintons, Obama To Attend Selma Anniversary March. CNN.com (3/2, Snow) reports, "As they battle for support in the black community in their quest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama will attend Sunday's commemoration of the historic 1965 Selma voting rights march. However, Clinton will bring along a not-so-secret weapon -- her husband, former President Bill Clinton." Democratic strategist Jamal Simmons said, "There is no white politician in America who is more popular in the African-American community than Bill Clinton. So she has a very strong card to play." Gannett (3/3, Radelat) says Obama spokeswoman Jen Psaki "said the senator -- who was 3 years old when the historic march took place -- wanted to make a 'personal trip' to the famed civil rights site. … But after polls this week showed Obama gaining popularity in the African-American community, Clinton raised the stakes by announcing that her husband" would march with her.

DOJ_NMG_0140088

President Clinton's Impeachment Trial Defender Backs Obama. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (3/3) writes, "Greg Craig, a Washington super-lawyer with close ties to the Clintons, is supporting Sen. Barack Obama for President." Craig, a White House special counsel defending President Bill Clinton in the Senate impeachment trial," called Obama "unique and added: 'I've never seen anyone who has made the impact on people and on me.'"

Pakistani Host Of Clinton Fundraisers Sought By FBI. The Los Angeles Times (3/3, Fields, Neubauer, 850K) reports Abdul Rehman Jinnah, "a Pakistani immigrant who hosted fundraisers in Southern California for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton," is being sought by the FBI "on charges that he funneled illegal contributions to Clinton's political action committee and Sen. Barbara Boxer's 2004 reelection campaign. … A federal law enforcement source said prosecutors had not dealt with the political committees in conducting their investigation and had no evidence that the committees knew the contributions were illegal. Officials for both committees said they were unaware of the investigation or indictments until they were contacted by The Times, and said they would not keep the donations." Jinnah and his family "donated more than $100,000 to the Democratic Party and Democratic candidates. Now friends say they believe Jinnah has returned to Pakistan."

Obama Says US Middle East Policy Has Strengthened Iran. The Chicago Tribune (3/3, McCormick, 617K) reports Sen. Barack Obama, "seeking to woo Jewish votes and contributions," told a Chicago audience that he "considers Iran 'one of the greatest threats to the United States, Israel and world peace' and pledged he would try to end that nation's uranium enrichment program. As he criticized the Bush administration's Iraq policies, the Democratic presidential candidate suggested that the danger posed by neighboring Iran has grown in recent years because of U.S. policy in the Middle East." Obama told an American Israel Public Affairs Committee regional meeting, "One of the most profound consequences of the administration's failed strategy in Iraq has been to strengthen Iran's strategic position, reduce U.S. credibility and influence in the region, and place Israel and other nations friendly to the United States in greater peril." The AP (3/2) headlines a report "Obama Blames U.S. For Stronger Iran," saying Obama "blamed Bush administration failings in Iraq for strengthening the strategic position of Iran, which he says must be stopped from acquiring nuclear weapons."

Genealogists Say Obama's White Ancestors Owned Slaves. The New York Times (3/3, A11, Swarns, 1.16M) follows up on a Friday Baltimore Sun report that Obama's "white maternal ancestors once owned slaves." Genealogists have discovered that Obama's great-great-great-great grandfather and great-great-great-great-great grandmother each owned two slaves.

Dowd Wonders If Obama Is Tough Enough For Campaign. In her New York Times (3/3, A15, 1.16M) column, Maureen Dowd writes, "As I sit across from Barack Obama in his Senate office, I feel like Ingrid Bergman in 'The Bells of St. Mary's,' when she plays a nun who teaches a schoolboy who's being bullied how to box. I'm just not certain, having watched the fresh-faced senator shy away from fighting with the feral Hillary over her Hollywood turf, that he understands that a campaign is inherently a conflict. The Democrats lost the last two excruciatingly close elections because Al Gore and John Kerry did not fight fiercely and cleverly enough. After David Geffen made critical comments about Hillary, she seized the chance to play Godzilla stomping on Obambi. As a woman, she clearly feels she must be aggressive in showing she can 'deck' opponents, as she put it -- whether it's Saddam with her war resolution vote or Senator Obama when he encroaches on areas that she and Bill had presumed were wrapped up, like Hollywood and now the black vote. If Hillary is in touch with her masculine side, Barry is in touch with his feminine side."

Dodd Urges Rivals To Take Part In April New Hampshire Debate. The New Hampshire Union Leader (3/3) reports Sen. Christopher Dodd "urged all his opponents for the Democratic Presidential nomination to participate in the April 5 political debate in Manchester. 'New Hampshire voters deserve a chance to see Presidential candidates on one stage answering tough questions,' said

DOJ_NMG_0140089

Beneva Schulte, communications director for Dodd." While several Democratic candidates "have committed to participating in the debate, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama have not.

Dodd Seeks Funds From Banking Industry, Lobbyists. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (3/3) writes that the "long shot" campaign of Senate Banking Chairman Dodd "solicited banking industry executives and lobbyists -- Democrats and Republicans alike -- for a fund-raising reception Wednesday. Melanie Wong, an experienced Democratic fund-raiser who identified herself as Dodd's 'mid-Atlantic regional finance director,' sent the invitations. They addressed lobbyists by their first names, even those she had never met and who had never contributed to Dodd."

Vilsack Criticizes Early Iowa Polls. The Des Moines Register (3/3, Beaumont, 160K) reports Tom Vilsack "criticized public opinion polls Friday and said his presidential campaign was running stronger in Iowa than early surveys reflected before he gave up his bid for the 2008 Democratic nomination a week ago. I don't want to sound like sour grapes, but you should not pay attention to early polls,' Vilsack said during taping of 'Iowa Press,' a public affairs program on Iowa Public Television." He said, "Iowa polls are not accurate in terms of caucus support. … We were absolutely convinced, and I remain convinced and will as long as I live, that I would have won the Iowa caucuses based on the information that we had that is legitimate."

Bush, Brazil's Lula Will Push Western Hemisphere Ethanol. A lengthy front-page New York Times (3/3, Andrews, Rohter, 1.16M) story reports President Bush, "hoping to reduce demand for oil in the Western Hemisphere, is preparing to finish an agreement with Brazil next week to promote the production and use of ethanol throughout Latin America and the Caribbean." That deal "could lead to substantial growth in the ethanol industry in Brazil as technology and manufacturing equipment developed there is exported to other countries in the region." The Times notes that sugar cane ethanol "is far cheaper to produce than the corn-based ethanol that has been nurtured by protective tariffs and government mandates in the United States." Officials "contend" that "the program could also reduce the influence of Hugo Chavez, the president of oil-rich Venezuela." The US-Brazil deal "calls for cooperation between the countries on research and common standards for biofuels, as well as on helping other countries replicate Brazil's expertise in producing ethanol from sugar," but Times sources claim "the agreement is largely a framework and provides few details."

Treasury "Ready" To Release North Korean Assets. The AP (3/3, Gearan) notes Washington "will soon recommend releasing a significant amount of frozen North Korean bank accounts, officials say, which diplomats hope will keep North Korea from reneging on its pledge to scrap nuclear weapons." The Treasury Department "could announce as soon as next week that several million dollars connected to North Korea are not tainted by links to rogue nuclear proliferation or allegations of counterfeiting, smuggling and other crimes." An unnamed source said "the U.S. move is expected to prompt overseas bank regulators to unfreeze between $8 million and $12 million from about $24 million in blocked assets." Treasury Under Secretary Stuart Levey is quoted saying yesterday, "We intend to handle this matter in a straightforward way based on the evidence and the law. As we have always said, the designation of Banco Delta Asia as a primary money laundering concern is separate from the nuclear talks."

South Korea Conditions Aid Resumption On Complete Dismantling Of Nuclear Program. On its front page, the Washington Times (3/3, Sands, Salmon, 88K) notes South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon "said yesterday that North Korea must abandon all aspects of its nuclear endeavors, including a suspected uranium enrichment program, as part of a deal to solve the peninsula's nuclear crisis, even if the program has barely gotten off the ground." However, he "sidestepped new questions over the state of Pyongyang's uranium-enrichment program, the key charge in the Bush administration's case that the North had violated past agreements to halt its nuclear weapons programs." Song "said he planned to coordinate closely with Washington as the nuclear deal moves ahead." The Times also reports that Seoul "refused to restore full aid shipments until the North's main nuclear reactor facility had been shut down."

The Washington Post/AP (3/3, A12) keys on the aid announcement, saying Seoul "added pressure on North Korea to comply with an international disarmament agreement, refusing the impoverished nation's demand to restore full aid shipments until after its main nuclear reactor is shut down." The New York Times (3/3, A7, Onishi, 1.16M) notes briefly that both Koreas "wrapped up high-level talks, agreeing to resume reunions of families separated by the Korean War and to test-run a cross-border train in the first half of this year."

DOJ_NMG_0140090

Pakistan Tests Nuclear-Capable Short-Range Missile. The AP (3/3) reports Islamabad today "successfully test-fired a short-range missile capable of carrying a nuclear warhead." The launch of the "Haft-II Abdali missile, which has a range of 120 miles, was conducted from an unspecified location inside Pakistan, the military said." The AP notes that "relations between Pakistan and India have improved since they began a peace process in 2004 to resolve all their issues, including Kashmir. They will hold the fourth round of peace talks in Islamabad March 13-14."

In Interview, Qaddafi Redefines Outlook But Stays Faithful To Doctrine. The New York Times (3/3, A3, Slackman, 1.16M) details yesterday's press availability with Libyan leader Muammar el-Qaddafi. "After decades of international isolation, Libya may be changing. But there are very clear limits. A slightly newer and perhaps mellower version of Colonel Qaddafi was on display on Friday for the correspondents, as part of the celebration of the 30th anniversary of the system of government he instituted." The Times says he used "revolutionary words" to describe Libya's role in the world. He "is the same eccentric figure as always, dressed in elaborate Libyan robes jazzed up with striking colors and a modern flair. He still offers unusual ideas, like when he said all the nations of the world would someday meld into seven or eight blocs, and that all formal governments, parliaments, ministries and militaries would be dissolved. Only then, he said, would there be world peace." His remarks suggest "a man thinking about his legacy, and how to retool a system of governance that has failed to adequately administer the state. … He maintained a quiet, almost distant composure through much of the discussion. Occasionally he picked up a pen and jotted down notes, but he mostly spoke in a low voice. What has not changed, and what he made clear, is the core of what he believes."

BBC.com (3/2) keys on a statement by Gaddafi that Libya "has not been given adequate compensation for its decision to renounce nuclear weapons in 2003." He "said the failure by the West to reward Libya meant Iran and North Korea were reluctant to follow Tripoli's lead. He insisted there would be no return to the confrontation of the past, however."

Sudanese President Backs UN Darfur Force In Writing. The AP (3/2, Olson) carries a diplomatic statement that Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "is sending a letter to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon expressing his commitment to the deployment of several thousand U.N. peacekeepers to help end the violence in Darfur." The AP says that "deployment would be the second step of a three-stage U.N. plan that would culminate in a 22,000-strong joint UN-African Union peacekeeping mission." Bashir "has given conflicting signals about his commitment to the plan, and Ban asked him earlier this year to state his acceptance of the second phase in writing." Yesterday, "the U.S. State Department called on both Sudan and the United Nations to speed up the deployment of the full joint AU-UN force." Assistant Secretary McCormack "issued the appeal as U.S presidential envoy Andrew Natsios arrived in Sudan's capital, Khartoum, for a 10-day visit that will include stops in the western Darfur region and southern Sudan." McCormack "said the U.S. administration is not satisfied with the yearlong U.N. time frame for the deployment and that not enough countries are pledging troops for the mission."

Oil Could Aid Rebuilding But May Delay Peace. On its front page, the Los Angeles Times (3/3, Sanders, 850K) discusses the short- and long-term challenges of likely oil deposits beneath Darfur. "While exploration may bring needed investment in Sudan, some say it only exacerbates the fighting." Khartoum "is quietly escalating oil exploration inside the Darfur region, a step that has led to protests from rebel leaders in a volatile area where more than 200,000 people have been killed during three years of fighting." The Times adds that some experts believe the "untapped oil reserves might have been an underlying factor in the Darfur conflict all along, explaining why a seemingly barren wasteland of western Sudan would spark such a bitter tug of war between government forces and rebels, eventually drawing the intervention of international players such as the United States, Libya and the United Nations."

